Inaugural Speech of President Corazon C. Aquino

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On her Inauguration as President of the Philippines

[Delivered at Club Filipino, San Juan on February 25, 1986]

My brothers and sisters:

I am grateful for the authority you have given me today. And I promise to offer all that I can do to serve you.

It is fitting and proper that, as our people lost their rights and liberties at midnight fourteen years ago, the people should formally recover those lost rights and liberties in the full light of day.

Ninoy believed that only the united strength of the Filipino people would suffice to overturn a tyranny so evil and so well-organized. The brutal murder of Ninoy created that unity in strength that has come to be known as “Lakas ng Bayan”—people power.

People power shattered the dictatorship, protected those in the military that chose freedom, and today, has established a government dedicated to this protection and meaningful fulfillment of our rights and liberties.

We became exiles, we Filipinos who are at home only in freedom, when Marcos destroyed the Republic fourteen years ago.

Now, by God’s grace and the power of the people, we are free again.

We want to make a special appeal to those who have not yet joined us. Do not engage in any further action against the people and instead, be among those who will lend a hand to rebuild the country.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Philippine Military Academy (PMA) Graduation Rites

At graduation exercises of the Philippine Military Academy, President Aquino shares her thoughts on the proper relationship between army and state: A soldier's role is not in politics. He is the guarantor of the people's security and the protector of the people's government. But that role can only be properly exercised under the supervision of a government the people have chosen and recognized.

She also pledged, as Commander-in-Chief, that the Armed Forces will never again be misused the way it was by former President Marcos.

You, the finest of our military youth, have reason to be the proudest graduating class in PMA history. By your actions in the final days of the people's revolution, you went through a graduation ceremony of far greater importance than any held on this field.

Your defection made you the first graduating class of the people's army. This new army was forged in a moment of national crisis when every Filipino had to search his and her heart for the courage to face death. Our institutions, such as the Armed Forces, had to decide: Were they for a man or for a people? Were they for a small clique of crooks clinging to power, or for country? Would they open fire on the people, or finally add their strength to the near unanimous resolve of our people to end 14 years of shame?

You, this graduating class, made the same choice as some of your brothers in the military, including your new Chief of Staff and the Minister of Defense: You opted for the people, and the President the people had chosen and the Batasan had ignored. You opted to be a part of the people's revolution.

In the classrooms of this academy you were lectured on the proper relationship between army and state. The life of a democracy depends on civilian supremacy over the military. It requires that the military stay out of politics yet in February you faced a dilemma that no textbook prepared you for: What do you do when the civilian authority is itself the threat to democracy? Where lies the loyalty of the officer corps and the troops? With nations and state or with the government of the day?

As you prepare for a life of military service let me share with you my thoughts on the proper relationship between army and state. A soldier's role is not in politics. He is the guarantor of the people's security and the protector of the people's government. But that role can only be properly exercised under the supervision of a government the people have chosen and recognize. During the long years of the Marcos regime, our armed forces shared the agony of every Filipino. The shame and dismay of having at the head of our proud nation a man whose greed humbled our pride and whose cruelty put Filipino at war with Filipino.

Just as we owe it to every Filipino to restore a government they can be proud of, so we owe it to our young soldiers to restore a government they can be proud to defend. Military honor and pride in service of the state cannot be separated from the kind of government that a soldier is required to serve.

But it is not soldiers who can make a government fit for themselves and the people. It is only the people that can do that. For the soldier must serve the people's government; not the people a soldier's government. Your strength lies in having a Commander-in-Chief who is the people's choice and not yours. Your honor lies in the fact that she was your choice as well.

You and many of your colleagues rose not to overthrow a President but to protect one: the President the people had elected and that the Batasan had cheated of her proclamation. Your actions were not a revolt against, but a restoration of legitimate government. And you did it with the people and not against them. That is what validated what you did.

There, in the streets around Crame and Aguinaldo, we saw the rebirth of the proper partnership of trust and respect between army and people. As the Marcos generals poised their confused and wavering troops to strike at the soldiers with Messrs. Ramos and Enrile, we saw the yellow shirts of our followers, the white frocks of our priests, and the grey habits of our nuns mingle their colors with the khaki green of your colleagues. As we emerged from the dark night of dictatorship, there was a new rainbow of colors across our land: the yellow of courage, the grey of faith, and the green of duty united in the willingness to work together, bury past conflicts, and begin the healing of our nation's wounds.

The Armed Forces had begun to resume its proper place in the service of a government that belonged to the people. The reward for that lay, not just in the physical protection those nuns and yellow legions gave your colleagues but in the new respect for you that their decision to do so represented. When Cardinal Sin called on the people to go to Aguinaldo and Crame and when the people responded in their hundreds of thousands, a vast act of reconciliation had begun. You, who had seen your noble profession brought low by those who commanded it, were being welcomed back into the fold of the nation.

Peace and reconciliation are now the most powerful weapons in our nation's armory. But, just as they were the strength of our revolution, so will they be the basis of our government. We came to power through peace and I mean to govern in peace. After years of brutal repression, the craving of our people is for peace and dignity. Our government and our army must hold out their hands to our opponents as citizens and nuns did outside Crame, in friendship and peace.

We must seek an end to the divisions that have threatened to pull our nation apart. An army ordered to wage war on its own people is an army betrayed. A war can only be just if it is waged under a leadership representative of the people, and a leadership, moreover, that had earnestly sought peace through honest political means before trying to impose order through force. The former government turned its back on reconciliation and was, through its goons, warlords, and cronies, the most effective recruiter of the New People's Army. I will not have this again.

I, as your Commander-in-Chief pledge before you today that the Armed Forces will not again be misused in this way. This is because I mean to wage a campaign for peace. I wish to persuade those insurgents who went to the hills because of despair, rather than ideology to return because now there is hope: Hope that they can be a part of a society based on a respect for human rights, welfare, and dignity. And pride in taking part in the building of a new Philippines.

To our brothers and sisters in the hills and the underground I have this to say: You waged war against Mr. Marcos because he was the embodiment of the worst injustice, greed and cruelty. I fought Marcos for the same reasons. We had a common stand and an overriding purpose: the end of tyranny and shame and the beginning of hope and pride. This is why I ordered the immediate release of political prisoners.

Now that the evil has fled from the land, I shall soon call on you to come out and rejoin your people in rebuilding our country. There should be no more reason to continue fighting. Our other differences can be settled through participation in peaceful process.

Yet let nobody mistake the importance we attach building a strong and disciplined Armed Forces. These are times of national crisis. It is still too early to claim with any assurance how many of those in the hills will heed our call and return to us. Those who do not will face a reformed and reinvigorated fighting force, dedicated to the protection of democracy and the honor of our country.

As your President and Commander-in-Chief I shall have no hesitation in calling on you to protect your government and state from any threat, be it internal or external. Equally I shall ask of your generals that they be vigilant in ensuring that our armed forces are well-led and well-armed. I should like to see a modern disciplined fighting force dedicated to the goals of a democratic state. As the Marcos maneuvers against the rebellion in EDSA demonstrated, a crook not only makes a corrupt general but a bad one too.

Too many good officers were held down by what was happening at the top of our Armed Forces. Now we have freed our army from that grip. Every member of the Armed Forces can now be judged by their qualities of bravery, integrity, competence and loyalty. Our Armed Forces, like the rest of our nation, has been liberated. Gone are the shackles on your performance, but gone too are the excuses. As your Commander-in-Chief I shall only be satisfied with the best. Yours will be an army that is as proud of itself as the nation is proud of it.

Let me be clear about one thing: I mean to fulfill my responsibility as Commander-in-Chief. My military staff, General Ramos and his service chiefs, will report directly to me. My Minister of Defense will monitor closely your performance. Neither errors of policy nor gross misconduct will long escape my attention and rebuke.

Like all our countrymen I have held my head high at the role played by the officers and members of the Reform Movement. Much credit for the renewal that is now underway goes to them. Indeed, today is the first anniversary of the We Belong Movement. It was founded in the hallowed grounds of this academy to reembody the ideal of professionalism and democratic commitment in the military. Those who took the brave step a year ago of forming the movement could not have guessed how much would have been achieved a year later. But their standards of professionalism and commitment are now the norm that I shall expect of everybody who is privileged to serve in our Armed Forces. You hold a sacred trust. It will not be abused.

What began in Crame and Aguinaldo must be taken much further. The general staff and I will work together to ensure this country has the armed services it deserves. We must purge our Armed Forces of all that has dishonored them in recent years. Your role in our nation's life is too great to allow us to overlook what happened in the final years of Marcos.

The army is the servant of its government and cannot be held accountable for the sins of the politicians, except for those who have illegally enriched themselves or have violated human rights. Let me be frank with you. The concept of a military elite draws its sense of purpose from its professionalism and the concept of service. This can only be nurtured when it enjoys the respect of the people. Without that, a military however great its self-regard is nothing.

You had a Commander-in-Chief who destroyed the very essence of responsible militarism. He was at the center of the corruption and repression. This man did you more harm than you even now may recognize. He and his associates destroyed the army's reputation as an impartial protector of the people's security and a stout defender of the nation's honor. Only by exposing the wrong-doing can we start the rebuilding. This revolution began with a bullet shot by a soldier into the head of my husband.

To all you young men, trained for lives of honor, sacrifice, and service, it must seem blindingly obvious that only through an honest explanation of the past can a clean start be made for the future.

I shall, as your Commander-in-Chief, make that clean start. Past abuses will be investigated and any officers and men guilty of crimes or serious misconduct will be dealt with appropriately. A new beginning requires a closing of the old chapter. But the people will not let the page be turned if crimes and human rights abuses lie unexplained.

Our Armed Forces was driven out of the people's hearts by the ignoble uses it was put to under the dictatorship. Now the people have embraced you and you, I know, wish to respect the spirit in which they did so. It was one of peace and reconciliation and it must not be stifled but be allowed to reach every corner nation in the pursuit of justice.

Healing the divisions that led to the growth of insurgency in our beloved country demands a special partnership between our nation's political leadership and our soldiers. General Ramos told me that he considers the chief concern of the Armed Forces of the Philippines to be, not just national security, but the people's security. You are now a people's army in the best sense of the word. That means that you serve the people.

That can only begin by addressing the insurgency. We must intensify our efforts for national reconciliation and re-integration of those who fought Marcos. We will not solve this problem just by sheathing our swords; we must also harness our ploughshares. Our countryside must be put back to work. Too many areas are devastated, not just by conflict but also by underdevelopment. The wealth of our countryside may not, like that of our industries, have ended up in American and Swiss bank accounts, but it was no less surely taken from us.

Now has come the time for rebuilding: the clinics, the schools, the roads, the wells, the farms, and above all, the will and hope of the people. The army is one organization that has the capacity to help do this. The church is another. The soldiers of the Republic and the soldiers of Christ have special roles in the effort of reconstruction. We are on the threshold of a great national mobilization of effort and resources to restore our bankrupt and battered country. Everyone has a vital part to play. It is a measure of how far we have come in the recent weeks that the first active operation you may be assigned to is building a school rather than a search and destroy mission against the NPA. To rebuild one nation we must have peace. Without peace we cannot have growth.

It may seem odd work for soldiers. Yet a central part in our reconstruction efforts is the noblest task you could hope for at this time. It affords the opportunity for soldiers to work side by side with villagers. This shared labor of rebuilding our infrastructure and economy after its brutal pillage does more than words can ever do to heal the wounds.

We need to build not just a passive peace where a ceasefire holds but an active peace where there is economic and social development to ease the deprivation of our people. The soldiers in this war, against poverty and economic injustice, will also be honored in the new Philippines. Indeed our military too have to cope with an appalling fall in their standard of living. The privilege of our military men is that there is a lead place for you in both wars: the peaceful containment of the insurgency and the offensive against poverty. Only if we move on both fronts will we banish the challenge of insurgency.

Such a push for peace will not leave us unprepared for war. An army must always be vigilant and in a high state of preparedness. The General Staff will ensure that the Armed Forces are returned to a peak of combat readiness after the years of professional decline.

Any group which considers undermining the stability of the country must understand that they will not be facing the demoralized forces of Marcos, rather they will be facing a national army, trained and ready to protect our sovereignty and the democratic government chosen by the people.

You leave this academy to play your part as officers in helping our nation back onto its feet after years of shameful prostration. You will be serving a government that faces huge challenges in rebuilding our society. Yet for the Armed Forces whether loyalist or rebel, who now stand behind the flag and the constitution, the worst is over. Whatever must be faced, we will face it together: you and I and the people. Once more you are back where you have longed to be: on the side of the people. Welcome home, my soldiers.

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the University of the Philippines Graduation Rites

TOWARDS A CEASEFIRE

Standing before 1986 graduates of the University of the Philippines, President Aquino takes the opportunity to sound a call to insurgents for peace and reconciliation. She reveals the government's willingness to negotiate with leaders of the insurgents for peace and their reassimilation in a democratic society.

We are free at last. The tyrant sent his armored cavalry to the two rebel camps. The sea of people parted, and then closed over them. The forces of tyranny were overwhelmed in an outpouring of reconciliation. The Lord had thrown the horse and his rider into the sea. And we were delivered from the house of bondage. Now we stand on the edge of a new country, the frontier of tyranny behind us. A long and arduous journey lies ahead to the peace, progress and justice for which we longed and sacrificed.

I ran for the Presidency on the platform of the people's long denied desire for freedom, peace and progress. We have freedom. Now I aim to have peace. Peace for a nation worn out from oppression and war. Tranquility in which our people can heal the deep wounds inflicted by tyranny. A tranquil peace so our people can renew their strength for what should be a single-minded endeavor to recover from the devastation wrought by Marcos.

But it seems there are among us those who regret leaving Egypt. They are few, but vocal and violent. The alarm they are spreading is the price of freedom, and it is one we must pay, but it will not be at the cost of the democratic gains we fought so hard to attain.

The consolation of slavery is that one is spared the anxiety of being responsible for yourself and your country.

The reality of slavery is that you are always grateful for what you get. A little food with shame, if the tyrant so wishes. Or a respite from his scourging: You are always grateful for what you get or the whipping you are spared.

Freedom is different. The shackles are struck from your wrist and your hands are full of responsibilities. You have been freed to carry all the better the burden of citizenship and nation-building. And you have yourself chiefly to blame if you falter or fail.

This nation mobilized to be free and to march toward freedom, peace and progress under my leadership. Even as I pledged to lead you to that goal, so you pledged then not to fail yourselves in reaching for it. There will be no turning back.

Let the handful murmur, they are within their rights under your covenant of freedom. But let them not stand in the way of our passage to lasting peace. This government of peace is not unarmed.

When our people called on God to deliver them from bondage, they pledge implicitly to be always free and proud and worthy of deliverance. The Lord delivered; so must we on our promise. To the handful who would turn their backs on the pride and responsibilities of freedom, all I can say is that the cause for which they clamor is now halfway across the Pacific, fighting harder than they, but to enjoy the wealth he took from their country. I will respect their private grief, but my government will not tolerate its violent outpouring.

In the long struggle against tyranny, some of our brothers and sisters took to the hills in rebellion. Many of them were killed or captured. I mourn for those who died, as I mourn for those who fought fighting them. What a waste of virtue and strength on both sides. I have released those who were captured. And I have called on both sides in the war – the army and the rebels – to enlist their stern virtues of self-discipline, sacrifice and courage in the task of national recovery.

The army had already responded when I made the call– by an act of rebellion against those who had long misused their selfless qualities for selfish ends, and by an act of allegiance to the President-elect of the people. The Armed Forces had rededicated themselves to the Republic, the Constitution, and the Commander-in-Chief, and to the freedom they protect. Surely it will not be long before we have wiped off every stain from the sword of the nation.

Now I am sending out a message of peace and reconciliation to the Communist-led insurgents. Our people are weary of war. They want to explore the opportunities of freedom and savor the fruits of peace. Too many have been orphaned or widowed in the struggle to be free. The time for peace has come.

Some have already responded. I pray that more will, and that we shall see an end to the insurgency problem without further loss and suffering. But I have no illusions that peace will come easily.

For the Communist true believer, the road to victory bristles with arms and resounds with combat. Conflict hardens resolve, purifies intentions, and abolishes any alternative to the violent road to victory. It is a philosophy and a strategy created by the exigency of contending with dictatorships. But it is also a way of thinking that prides itself on its hard realism. The Communist ventures into frontal confrontation only when the balance of forces is clearly tilted in favor of its success. That is clearly not the case at present.

Under the Marcos regime, the balance was in the Communists' favor. The people had distanced themselves from a government they feared and despised. They gave it neither cooperation in its spurious programs nor intelligence about the movements of the insurgents. There was a tacit understanding: every blow struck at the dictatorship was a blow for freedom. Never mind whose hand delivered it. It went on like this for 14 years and it might, given time, have succeeded in replacing the dictatorship of private plunder with the dictatorship of the party. But it was not to be that way.

The people took another route to freedom. And they arrived-without bloodshed and without tears, except for those shed in joy when the army laid aside its weapons to return the people's embrace of reconciliation.

My government is willing to negotiate with the top leadership of the Communist Party to work out the mechanics" for the reassimilation of the insurgents in civil society and their participation in the democratic process. But I would also encourage the communities directly affected by the insurgency to take the initiative and reach out to their brothers and sisters who were not as patient for peaceful change as they were.

Tragic experience has made the Communist cautious. He has used front organizations to test his proposals because it gives him the option to disown them in the event of betrayal. I can understand – although that was not my way when I grappled with the dictatorship. I believe that openness is not weakness, if it is backed up by unshakeable resolve. I see no reason, in the circumstances, for the Communists to continue this way. Negotiations will be with the top leadership of the Communist Party or there will be none.

Whether negotiations will take place, or result in a lasting peace, I do not know. I know only that it is my duty as leader, of the country to explore every peaceful avenue to a resolution of the problem. I am hopeful there will be positive response. The balance of forces in our society today, at any rate, argue strongly against persisting in a military solution. The people have found a new hope as they taste their new freedom. I appeal to the compassion of the insurgent leadership, and to its reason, to join the people in giving democracy another chance.

When I was campaigning for the Presidency, I said that my victory would be celebrated with a ceasefire. It is to the credit of the Armed Forces that they honored that pledge. During this critical period, it is important that a climate of truth and sobriety should prevail. Although I understand the exuberance of a newly liberated media, I hope they will hew as closely as they can to the truth.

Meanwhile, the insurgents continue to strike, hoping to recreate conditions conducive to successful armed struggle. I shall interpret this kindly to mean that the message of peace has not filtered down to all combatants. But I will not allow this state of affairs to continue for long. The soldiers of the Republic are under my wing. I have obligations to the security of the people, the stability of their new democracy, and the honor of the army. I will not renege on any.

I shall soon call formally for a ceasefire. It will be for a definite and inextendible period. Negotiations should take place during that period and, it is to be hoped, a just resolution found of the issues that divide the insurgents from the government. The Armed Forces will maintain their defensive posture. Outbreak of lawlessness will be dealt with by the constabulary and police forces. They should not expect me to leave my people and my soldiers defenseless against elements they cannot, or chose not, to control.

I am sure the Communist leadership can read my mind as well as I believe, I can read theirs. They will use the ceasefire to consolidate their positions, recruit, and recoup the losses they suffered as a result of the preemptive February Revolution. I suppose, to some extent, they could succeed. It will be some time before there is perceptible improvement in the economic conditions of the people. But I am willing to take the gamble to avoid any further waste of lives.

Even as I extend the hand of peace, the rebels know that I shall prepare for the eventuality that my offer will be rebuffed. If the peace initiative fails through no fault of the government, it will not be the old dispirited army of Marcos that the insurgents will face. It will be a new army, and as it is a new government that the insurgency must deal with now.

As Commander-in-Chief, I will not be satisfied with the Armed Forces as they were under Marcos. I know the conditions in which the Filipino soldier had to fight on orders of that callous regime. The inadequacy of his field rations made him forage among the civilian population. The almost complete lack of medicine accounted for the abnormally high ratio of killed-to-wounded among the troops. The lack of appropriate clothing for the environment in which he had to fight accounted for the high AFP casualties – from pneumonia and malaria. None of these conditions will obtain in the new army when it goes forth if it must.

There will be a radical change in military strategy, away from the reckless expenditure of force to a more discriminating and effective application of it – by better trained, better equipped, and more mobile units. The New AFP in the field will be as concerned about shielding the civilian population from the worst aspects of combat, as with meeting the armed threat to the security of the Republic.

Every offense against human dignity will be strictly prescribed under my government. I do not believe that the immediate advantage gained by torture can, in any way, offset the indelible disgrace it brings to our country, and the insidious effects it has on the morals of our people and, especially, on the morals of those whom we arm to protect them. A sympathetic people will be the eyes and ears of the armed forces.

I am offering the insurgents an honorable peace. One that will not ignore their just demands, but one also that will not detract in any way from the security of the people, the stability of the government, and the honor of the New Armed Forces. I know that the roots of insurgency are in the economic conditions of the people and the social structures that oppress them. We must address ourselves to these conditions vigorously if we are to hope reasonably for a lasting peace. But we can do this successfully only if we have peace in the first instance. And so I am calling for it.

I am not asking the Communists to give up their stern vision of a just society. I am asking them only to give our people a chance to work out their own version of a just and progressive society in peace. The Communists anyway claim that the triumph of their vision is inevitable. In that case time will surely vindicate them, as the attempts at peaceful reform unravel and end in failure. Then they will have their day.

But I have my own faith, the faith I share with the people today: that peace in our ways and fortitude in our hearts will work miracles, that there will be a deliverance from want, as surely as we have had a deliverance from slavery. Let us give peace a chance.

THE ECONOMIC RECOVERY

NEXT

REVOLUTION:

Frugality, integrity and sincerity in Government is the style President Aquino has set for her regime. She has defined three broad economic goals: alleviation of mass poverty, generation of employment and provision for a just and equitable sharing of the fruits of development. President Aquino also tells the 19th Annual Meeting of the Asian Development Bank that a genuine private enterprise economy will be restored to foster competition, productivity and efficiency. She also will seek to renegotiate for fairer terms in the country's foreign debts. She reiterates the country's need for help in its short term fiscal position and for long term aid and investments if its economy is to recover.

Let me speak on behalf of my people when I say that it is our honor and privilege to host the 19th Annual Meeting of the Board of Governors of the Asian Development Bank. Perhaps you are surprised at the new and startling climate of political and economic freedom in my country today. Two months ago, this did not seem at all possible to you. You saw a nation resembling on the brink of civil war. A nation facing the prospect of a political dynasty whose beginning was Ferdinand Marcos, and whose end, decades into its ruin, would still be a Marcos — or a nation lacerated beyond healing by war. Sixty-seven days ago, the country seemed ripe for a military coup d'état by the well-placed and appointed forces of General Fabian Ver. Just so many weeks ago, were a people terrified, uncertain, and appearing to plunge headlong into polarization and disaster.

To the right of the center of gravity were Marcos, Imelda, Ver and their handful of cronies bulging with the fat of the land. To the left was a communist New People's Army swelled to nearly three times its potency and size since the assassination of my husband, Ninoy. At the center of this tug of war, veering more and more to the left, was the great mass of Filipinos made hungry, thirsty and very angry by 14 years of shame and frustration.

Over 67 days ago, we must have seemed to more developed countries of the world as just another Third World loser, stumbling in the night of ignorance and inexperience, to certain calamity. Sixty-seven days ago, by most predictions, we were an impending Nicaragua, an imminent Iran, the political and economic basket case of Southeast Asia, and a threat to the stability of the region.

So it seemed to you 67 days ago.

So how has it come to pass that I now stand before you holding the reins of a free republic? How did our nation escape the inexorable law of history that a people must pay a high price in blood for the privilege of freedom? Why, of all nations rocked by unrest, were we fated to a different, benign destiny?

I know that I speak to an audience of hardnosed realists, to minds steeped in rigorous systems of cause and effect. But I am not embarrassed to tell you that I believe in miracles. It is our Faith that saved our nation. It was our reliance on a power greater than history that plucked us from the edge of calamity and set us down in freedom at God's appointed time.

I speak to you of faith because it is our trust in God that restored our faith in ourselves and gave us the resolve to fight through, without blood or rancor, to freedom and a new beginning. I speak to you of faith also, because it is something you also understand. To recover from the years of Marcos, we will need an infusion of capital that only a renewal of your faith in my country can make possible.

Twenty years ago, we were the model country in Southeast Asia in terms of political and economic progress. Our country was one of the most devastated by the second world war. And yet, in less than a decade, we managed to bind our wounds, rebuild from the ruins, and stand tall as the leading economy in Southeast Asia. In the fifties, we had the most vibrant growth rate in the region. We also had one of the highest per capita incomes, and the highest literacy rate.

Throughout this period, we elected five responsible presidents, each of whom honored our democracy and nurtured our remarkable economic growth. And then Marcos happened, and we stumbled headlong into backwardness.

What had we Filipinos done to deserve a Marcos? I honestly do not know. But what I can say is that the experience taught us humility, turned us to God, and drove home the valuable political lesson that liberty must be won every day. We need to have survived just one Marcos to insure that a Marcos will never happen again.

For one, we will not aim for the surface glitter of the Marcos regime, but will strive for the substantive progress and direction it did not give us. Faith tells us that we are nothing and will come to nothing unless we attend to the least of our brothers. After twenty years of plundering by the previous regime, the least among us now comprise the majority, or seventy percent of our population. Two thirds of all Filipinos now live below the poverty line. Of these poor, millions are unemployed and hence have no immediate means of lifting themselves out of their misery.

The coffers of our nation are nearly empty. We have inherited a national treasury left with a fraction of the national budget for the year. Most of the money went to buy the 1986 snap election. On top of that, we have been left with a staggering foreign debt of $26 billion and nothing to show for it except some remarkable architecture in New York. Half of our much needed export revenues are required just to pay for the interest on that debt.

Indeed the country is nearly as ravaged today as it was immediately after the bombs and the plundering of the second world war. But as in those days of liberation, the taste of freedom is heady, and we are eager to rebuild.

And that is why I speak to you of faith. We Filipinos have a renewed faith in our capacity to overcome our massive poverty and the other problems Marcos has left us. But we also need your faith. We need the confidence of international banking institutions such as the ADB, our trading partner countries, and other entities that can help us revive our economy. We appreciate your cheering us through the revolution. We are grateful for the profuse compliments. Now we would appreciate your help.

In this regard, we are specially grateful to the Asian Development Bank for being the first to demonstrate its faith in our new government. Your $100 million loan to our country will not only facilitate the launching of priority development projects. It should also serve as a signal to other banking institutions that our country is now a viable proposition.

Our new government has now been 64 days in office. We cannot pull off economic recovery as instantly as a rabbit out of a hat. But we have set the broad direction and taken significant steps. Last January 6, when freedom for our country was a beautiful but tentative dream, I outlined a general economic recovery program that I would implement in my first 100 days as President. First of all, I promised a leadership by example, government by consultation, and the political will for change and growth.

It is just two months since we took over, but I believe we have set a style for frugality, integrity and sincerity in government. We have encouraged and listened to a plurality of voices, and dismantled much of Marcos' political and economic machinery. We have progressed far in the reform of the military, begun the overhaul of the judiciary, and given the media back to the people. All this has cleared the air and set the necessary climate for the revival of our strangled economy.

As an agenda for action, our government has set three broad economic goals for the short and the long term. The first and most urgent is immediate provision for the least of our brothers, or the alleviation of mass poverty. The second goal is actually a means for reaching the first, and that is by the generation of employment. The third goal is to provide a just and equitable sharing of the fruits of development. The key here is rural development and the structuring of an economy where the benefits reach quickly and regularly to those on the lowest socio-economic levels. For an agricultural country that too is a means to easing mass poverty.

Toward the achievement of these broad goals we have set more specific objectives and courses of action.

The first, which is the fulfillment of a promise I made repeatedly during my campaign, is to have less government in the economy. Unlike Marcos style doublespeak, this regime means business when it says it will not meddle in private business. Government will provide the usual public services and facilities, preserve order, vindicate rights and protect liberties. But the private sector shall be the main propeller of the economy. I believe that the restoration of a genuine private enterprise economy will foster competition, productivity and efficiency. But we will also expect the private sector to practice self-regulation and keep a sense of social responsibility.

Corollary to the attainment of this objective is the fulfillment of another promise I made during my campaign. I promised to trim the government to an efficient and responsive size. And the first step is to dismantle Marcos Incorporated. We are already unravelling those structures of privilege — the public agencies and quasi-public corporations that had little or nothing to contribute to the priority needs of our people. We are also working to recover the assets of the previous incumbent of my office, and of his friends, that we can legally prove are illegally owned. Already we have abolished, and are presently dismantling, the vast propaganda machine of Marcos and the equally vast spending apparatus of his wife's Metro Manila Commission. To restore the people's faith in representative institutions, we abolished the National Assembly that had made a mockery of its mission. The previous regime accumulated 330 corporations with total liabilities in the billions of dollars. A few of these entities are profitable; most are an intolerable burden on our government budget. We plan to commence their selective rehabilitation and sale, specially those companies which cannot cover their own operating costs and are in competition with the private sector. We likewise plan to reorganize those strongholds of Marcos state capitalism, the Philippine National Bank and the Development Bank of the Philippines in order to restore viability and efficiency. This will result in the liberation of assets from the paralyzing and wasteful effects of state control. We assure the independence of the Central Bank, and shall defend its mission to safeguard the integrity of the financial system and our currency.

Even as government dwindles to its proper size, its role in the development of the countryside shall increase. We are postponing capital-intensive, urban-based industrial projects which cannot generate their own foreign exchange requirements. We are also decentralizing the formulation of programs so that the benefits of development will redound to local communities. This brings us to the most crucial component, the very core of our recovery and development strategy.

Seventy percent of the population live in the countryside. To allow the nation's wealth and resources to reach these people, we must give full attention to the strengthening and uplift of the rural and agricultural sector. This can be achieved through agrarian reform and a package of credit, marketing and technological support. This means providing a support system that will enable farmer cultivators to move from subsistence agriculture into the market economy, as both producers and consumers. Most immediately, we must provide post-harvest facilities to hasten delivery and consumption of farm products. The objective is to develop the purchasing power of the rural population, achieve self-sufficiency in food production, and establish a sound foundation for industrial growth.

To this end, we have begun the process of dismantling the purchasing monopolies for such commodities as sugar, coconuts, flour, meat and other products cornered by the Marcos cronies.

We are also seeking long-term financing for the diversification from traditional crops to more potentially profitable non-traditional crops.

Finally, I promised during the campaign to vigorously seek to renegotiate for more liberal terms on our foreign debt. It is on this platform that I wish to sound an appeal to international institutions of banking and finance and to the more developed countries who are our trading partners. We ask you to look beyond the crisis stage of our external debt problem and focus on our current needs for fresh finance. And that is how we can generate the desired amount of funds. And how the quality of capital flow can be improved to avoid the problem of excessive reliance on short-term bank credits.

Our ability to pay our debts is dependent on our ability to generate export earnings. This hinges on our access to developed country markets. Hence we are concerned with the increasing protectionism of developed countries. This development undermines an open world trading system. And contrasts with the efforts of our country toward taking the difficult step of restructuring industries by lowering trade barriers unilaterally.

On the domestic side we face a deficit which is substantially larger than originally anticipated.

We ask you to have faith in us and our capacity to reclaim our place as one of the more progressive countries of Southeast Asia. We have all the ingredients for prosperity in our midst. We have rich, arable lands; we have a large, skilled, English-speaking work force; we have a manufacturing capacity that is only half utilised; we are committed by our historical orientation to democracy, and by our Faith, to peace. With these in our favor, and the prospect of a revived tyranny withering half an ocean away from us, we mean to achieve positive growth in our gross national product this year, after a 10 percent fall in our GNP in the last 2 years. And this will only be the beginning. With our back, to the wall, we have nowhere to go but forward. That was our condition when we faced the prospect of perpetual tyranny 67 days ago. We went forward and fought through. We will do it again on another front, and we will not forget those who helped us take our first, tentative, steps toward recovery.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the occasion of Labor Day

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the occasion of Labor Day

[Delivered on May 1, 1986]

UNSHACKLING THE LABOR FORCE

In the February revolution the Filipino people stood as one – united in fighting the dictatorship. There was no laborer or employer, no rich or poor, no Pampangueno or Tagalog, only one single labor force working together for freedom.

Now, President Aquino says, the revolution for freedom is over and another revolution is to start – that is the economic revolution, wherein, the power of a united people can make it succeed.

She lists down a number of measures to help the work force of the country such as: honoring the commitment to ILO Convention 87 or Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize, ILO Convention 141 on Rural Worker's Organization; repeal of LOI 1458; automatic certification election during the freedom period of collective bargaining agreements; removal of the 13th month pay ceilings; revision of the apprenticeship program, repeal of some requirements for valid strikes and calling of a National Tripartite Conference.

She promises to work for the lowering of prices of commodities, energy and gasoline, undertake massive low-income housing programs, and to provide more funds for loans to worker's cooperatives.

My fellow workers in the work of national reconstruction, I greet you on the occasion of Labor Day.

You in the labor force and we of the former Marcos opposition have been marching side by side for longer than we realize.

From the hundreds of thousands at Ninoy's wake, through the millions at his funeral, to democracy's triumph last February, we were one. We prayed as one. We struggled patiently and peacefully as one. We dreamed, as one, of becoming a freed nation. There were no rich or poor among us in the struggle. No Pampanguenos, Tagalog, Ilocanos, Visayanos. No workers and no employers. We were all then one single labor force laboring for freedom and a fresh start. We worked together and we were victorious together. We were people's power. We were Filipinos without distinctions to divide our resolve. As a result, we were distinguished from all the world by our unprecedented peaceful revolution.

Now the country is back in our hands. The revolution of freedom is over. Another revolution is about to begin. The economic revolution that will lift us from poverty, underdevelopment and economic injustice. And again, only the power of a united people can make it succeed.

There will be no flags, no speeches, no marching in this revolution. It will be a quiet revolution. One that will take place inside factories and offices, in government offices and private enterprises, on the farm and in the city. It will be a nation of Filipinos going back to work but fired with the zeal of one victory and confident of the next. Once again, it will require that we forget our differences and work as one. We must forget again whether we are workers or employers, provincianos or city people. We must work to increase productivity and efficiency so we can feed and educate ourselves and raise a stronger race of Filipinos. We must work so we can pay the $27 billion debt left by Marcos and his wife, and their cronies, and so we can hold our heads higher still in the community of nations.

I made a promise to you during the campaign and I repeat that promise. I shall ask for no greater sacrifice than I myself am prepared to make. I shall impose no heavier burden on our people than they are willing to carry. But sacrifices and burdens there will be, as I warned, but shared equitably by all for we shall be rebuilding from the ruins left by Marcos.

I ask you to respond now as you responded when I called on you to defy Marcos and win our freedom – without fighting, without envy, and with shared purpose and sacrifice. People's power can put our economy back on its feet, put food on our tables, shirts on our backs, roofs over our heads, and pride in our hearts. We must now work hard to regain or rebuild what Marcos stole or destroyed. We must prove that, while he stole our patrimony, he did not break our will, that all the sufferings he inflicted has only made us stronger.

During the campaign I promised to provide for the welfare of labor in three ways. These were: to revise or rescind the laws that repress the rights of workers and their trade unions; to ensure that labor shall equitably share in the benefits of our developments efforts; and to create the conditions for the full human development of the labor poor.

Today, I come before you on this day of celebration for labor to redeem my pledges. I have also come to plead for your patience, understanding and support for specific policies and programs which may not immediately benefit your sector but will in the long run give us a country and an economy strong enough to fulfill the cherished dreams of labor.

My administration shall honor our commitment to ILO Convention 87 on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize and to ILO Convention 141 on Rural Workers' Organization.

My government shall promote and protect the rights of workers and employees to establish and form organizations and unions of their own choosing, with a minimum of government interference. Security guards in the private sector, employees of government corporations organized under the Corporation Code are hereby allowed to unionize and bargain collectively with their respective employers.

I now repeal LOI 1458 that allows management to replace striking workers who defy return to work orders. Your government will not pursue the "one-union one-industry" policy that has caused so much dissension in your ranks. I leave to you completely the discretion to combine as you may deem fit and necessary.

In representation issues, we shall now pursue a policy of automatic certification election during the freedom period of collective bargaining agreements, where the majority status of the incumbent union is questioned.

In cases of non-unionized establishments, a petition for certification election or to register a union supported by 20 percent of all employees will be enough.

I hereby remove the 13th month pay ceiling for all rank and file employees.

The apprenticeship program was used under Marcos to exploit the Filipino workers. I hereby direct the Minister of Labor to immediately review the existing list of apprenticeable jobs and limit them strictly to highly technical industries. In no case shall the period of apprenticeship exceed six months.

I am today repealing the following requirements for valid strikes:

- The 2/3 strike vote requirements under BP 130 is hereby revised to a simple majority vote.
- In case of dismissal of union officers, constituting union busting, where the existence of the union is threatened the union can ignore the 15 day cooling off period and take action immediately. In all other respects, however, violations of collective bargaining agreements will still be dealt with in accordance with the existing laws and procedures.
- Unless actual violence or other criminal acts occur in the picketlines. I am ordering the police forces to keep out of the picketlines.

Under this government there will be justice for the workers under the laws, and the laws will be just. But I hope that labor and management will respect the final adjudications of their disputes. We must cooperate to reduce the uncertain ties that have paralyzed economic activity in our country.

It is part of my minimum program of government to assure labor's meaningful participation in decision-making at all levels of our society. I shall soon appoint representatives of your unions in all policy-making bodies of government. I ask you to submit your recommendations to these positions.

As my machinery for consultation with workers and employers groups and to boost collective bargaining as the primary means of promoting your economic interest and settling disputes, I hereby direct the Ministry of Labor to call a National Tripartite Conference consistent with the agreement signed last Monday by the Labor Advisory Consultative Council and the Employers Confederation of the Philippines to negotiate a Code of Industrial Harmony. This code will be the policy framework of my government in pursuing programs and projects beneficial to all sectors.

In this forum I shall propose to the three sectors to agree on the following:

- Amendments to BP 130 and 227 to sanitize them of their restrictive and oppressive provisions.
- Removal of exemptions from present wage decrees and the integration of COLA into the basic pay.
- Explore all mechanisms for profit sharing consistent with my policy of equitable distribution of wealth.

To speed the resolution of cases in order to minimize causes for strikes and facilitate their right to seek redress for legitimate grievances, the Ministry of Labor shall professionalize the dispute settlement machinery. The NLRC shall be cleansed of sectoral interests by appointing men of probity, honesty, and integrity into the Commission.

I know the plight of the worker and that his or her basic needs cannot be delayed. I shall therefore continue to work for lowering the prices of commodities, energy, and gasoline. I hereby suspend contributions to PAG-IBIG. My government shall explore other means to undertake a massive low-income housing program. We shall also give serious thought to the rechanneling of a substantial amount of government loans to existing workers' and peasants' cooperatives and those yet to be formed.

I shall continue to redeem all my pledges to you. And now I issue a challenge to you.

Purify your ranks of racketeers, kingpins and minidictators. You are not only the backbone of industry but the vanguard of democracy as well. Freedom and dignity for our nation starts with you. How can we be strong, if you are weak? How can we be proud as a free nation if you will not stand up for your rights within your own sector.

Assert our independence and show to one and all that you are not mere transmission belts of politicians and political forces.

You are the elite 10 percent of the labor force. You are the privileged by your organized strength. It is your obligation to spread the benefits of organizations to farmers, fishermen and other workers.

Finally, I appeal to you, in this period while the country is trying to recover from the tyranny and theft of the Marcos regime, to exercise restraints in exercising your right to strike. Use it as a last resort and only after exhausting all other means of resolving your disputes with management.

Make me prouder, my workers, of this second revolution to make our country free, not only of a tyrant in the palace but of tyranny everywhere: the tyranny of poverty and underdevelopment, as of the tyranny of political power. Make the world wonder again at how a country reduced to beggary by reckless debts and a people reduced to penury lifted themselves and their country from humiliation to the greatest pride.

Let the second revolution start now.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 50th Anniversary of the Philippine Air Force

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 50th Anniversary of the Philippine Air Force

[Delivered on May 2, 1986]

GIVING PEACE A CHANCE

The Philippine Air Force on its 50th anniversary should be honored for the things it did in December 1941 against the superior forces of Japan and for defying the orders to attack the rebel camps in February 1986. Because of their sense of high duty and honor, they were instrumental in tapping the balance in favor of democracy.

The Republic honored the Philippine Air Force by calling this base “Villamor” for what the air force did on December 10, 1941. Captain Jesus Villamor and 5 other Filipino pilots took off in their P-26’s from the flaming wreckage of their base and engaged the overwhelmingly superior forces of the Empire of Japan.

Today we honor the Philippine Air Force for what it did not do during those fateful days in February when the life of this nation hung in the balance and the air force tipped the scale in its favor. Ordered to attack the rebel camps on EDSA and the people who had massed to protect it, the helicopter gunships under the command of Colonel Sotelo swooped down on the camps and landed. And declared for the rebellion and democracy. The rest of the Air Force followed suit.

In both instances, in December 1941 and in February 1986, the Air Force took the initiative to protect our people and their freedom. In both instances, it refused to accept the situation. In December 1941, the situation called for resignation to defeat. In February 1986, the situation called for obedience to orders. In both cases, the Air Force refused to accept the situation and acted on the promptings of its sense of higher duty and honor.

It seems that lately in our history the Filipino people have looked up at their skies for deliverance.

Ninoy came down from the bright noon sky in a China Airline flight with a message of reconciliation and peaceful transition to democracy. He arrived at martyrdom and thereby galvanized the nation to fight for freedom upon his unique terms of peace and reconciliation.

In the angry months that followed, the people marching in the streets to protest the latest shameless act of the dictatorship looked up at the tall buildings for those signs of solidarity, the yellow confetti.

And in February, the people massing around the rebel camps in EDSA watched anxiously as helicopter gunships made straight for them and then landed to join them. The Air Force had denied the sky to tyranny, just as the people had denied it the earth. The circle had closed. All the forces of Philippine society had joined in the cause of democracy.

Isolated, with nowhere to turn, the dictator and his wife, and their armed retainers and flunkies, took to the skies for exile.

Now democracy is covered on every side, and above, by the forces of peace. Now our people can devote themselves single-mindedly to the long delayed task of making this country as prosperous, just and progressive as it richly deserves to be.

The task requires that this nation has peace, as much as our pride as Filipinos demands that it shall always be democratic. Our new democracy has been criticized because it is tolerant of agitation. This is regarded by certain ignorant quarters as weakness. It is not. It is the clearest sign of our concrete, confidence in our strength. The pinpricks of bought and benighted loyalists will not provoke us to violate the basic principles for which we struggled and make us no better than the tyrant we deposed. The attacks of obstinate fanatics will not deflect us from our course to lasting peace. The Armed Forces know how to defend our people. And they will, but without jeopardizing the peace initiative we have made. No one loves peace more than the soldier who is the first and last to taste its horrors.

We shall give peace a chance. One more chance and we will give it our best effort. This nation cannot continue in its agony. I am glad to deliver this message that we shall persevere in our efforts to find a lasting peace before a branch of the Armed Forces that we honor specially today. It is among the men in uniform that we expect to find the steadfastness and courage to move inexorably toward a difficult, and at times, seemingly distant goal. The positive response of the Armed Forces to this repeated message of peace assures our people of the durability of the new democracy that they have established, the certainty of their security, and the imminence of peace.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the clergies of San Carlos Seminary

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the clergies of San Carlos Seminary

[Delivered on May 20, 1986/

INTERCESSORS FOR PEACE AND UNITY

The clergy played an important role in the February revolution according to President Aquino. Through the evangelization of the priests, the Filipino people became aware of the injustices prevalent in the society.

She appeals to the clergy again, this time to help her by rebuilding the spirits of the people — through example and by word.

She specifically requests the clergy's help in motivating the Marcos loyalists and the NPA's to join the mainstream of the Filipino society in the work of national reconstruction.

It is with great joy that I come and stand before you this morning. I know that practically all of you participated actively in the February revolution which toppled Marcos' dictatorial regime. Prior to the elections, during the elections and after the elections, you helped increase our people's awareness of the injustices prevalent then in our society. You helped form their consciences through unflagging and daring evangelisation. If our people in Metro Manila acted the way they did, it was due in no small measure to your priestly work of evangelisation. Hence, I wish my presence among you today to be an expression of my gratitude for your signal contribution in the transformation of our nation.

But I come before you today for another reason: I have come to enter into dialogue with you so that we may together carry forward the transformation which has been so boldly begun.

I wish to hear from you whatever comments, criticisms and suggestions you and the people under your pastoral J care are saying. From the beginning, I stated that I would consult the people and that my administration would exercise consultation. Let this "be an opportunity for such a consultation in friendly and fraternal atmosphere.

I dare to express before you my expectations of you in the great work of reconstruction of our country ravaged by the Marcos regime. I know that your contribution to this process is indispensable.

I know that you are not experts in politics and economics. Yes, it is not your role as priests and pastors to propose technical solutions to the many problems that beset our nation. But precisely as priests and evangelisers of our people you have a vital role to play. For what has to be built up in our people is, first of all, the spirit of our people. And who can better help towards the rebuilding of our people's spirit than you, our spiritual leaders?

You will recall what our bishops wrote in their draft pastoral letter on social transformation, "Man, Our Way." In describing our society under Marcos, they pointed out two outstanding characteristics: 1) the widespread poverty and deep suffering of our people, and 2) the demoralization, i.e., the sense of discouragement and the erosion of moral values in our people. These two, poverty-suffering on the one hand, and demoralization on the other, did not simply stand side by side. They stood, I believe, in a casual relationship. The majority of our people were poor because many in our society no longer lived by moral principles and had caused the demoralization, i.e., the loss of morale in the majority. We could make no progress because people no longer trusted the government and the institutions that were supposed to help them and protect their rights. When one looks back at the years under the Marcos regime, one cannot but be impressed and depressed by the slow descent into the depths of the Filipino spirit.

We seemed headed either towards national degeneration or violent confrontation. I believe in my heart of hearts that had God not allowed the murder of my late husband, Ninoy, as he returned to work non-violently for justice and national reconciliation, we might still be suffering today from the twofold demoralization our bishops have described or we might already be on the brink of a civil war.

But you all know how, that shot in the Manila International Airport awoke the failing spirit of our people.

From then on, that spirit refused to surrender to the evils in our society, until at last, the February revolution occurred — a magnificent triumph of the Filipino and Christian spirit in our land. We managed to overthrow the oppressive Marcos regime, in an almost completely bloodless manner. We succumbed neither to deadening apathy nor to the temptation to violence.

The February revolt was a magnificent climax — a true resurrection from the death. It was, however, only a beginning, as we are very painfully realizing now.

Two great tasks lie ahead of us. First, the renewal of the morals and morale of our people. This requires a change of heart, a change in our attitudes, a true conversion, the transformation of the Filipino as a person. I consider this primary. Unless we change within, the same demons that beset the Filipino people under the Marcos regime will return — and with a vengeance.

Herein, I believe, lies the field of your most urgent and most important contribution to the rebuilding of our nation. If you evangelise our people by example and by word regarding the centrality in God's plan of the human-person-in-community; if you teach our people about the universal destination of created goods, and the priority of labor over capital, and set the right to private property within the context of these two truths; if you counter the kanya-kanya tendency with a stress on the common good; if you inculcate in us all the idea of public service, and if you show us by example and by word the preferential option for the poor; if, in other words, you evangelise our people in the way the Pope and our own bishops have told you to, you shall have made the most urgent and most important contribution to the rebuilding of our country.

I must stress, however, the necessity of your example, more than your words in this work of reforming our internal structures. The great defect of the Marcos regime was precisely this — that it was a regime of words unmatched by deeds. Never in our history were so many beautiful speeches and books spoken and written as during the time of the deposed dictator. But never also had there been such a wider gap between profession and action.

Words are necessary, but they are so woefully inadequate. A proliferation of words if unmatched by actions, can result in a credibility gap.

Hence, I have myself resolved to exercise leadership by personal example. I have asked my cabinet ministers to do the same. Allow me to request the same from you so that the necessary change in our way of thinking and attitudes may be achieved effectively.

If I may be more specific: the cause of national reconstruction will be helped immensely if you, our priests showed the way to simplicity of life, justice in human transactions, the sharing of this world's goods, and the exercise of authority as service.

The change in internal structures of the Filipino needs to be matched and promoted by a corresponding change in our external structures, i.e., the economic, political and social structures of the land. I believe that this is primarily the work of lay persons like myself, and believe me, it is precisely as part of my Christian commitment as a lay person that I have assumed the burdens of the presidency.

But even here, you have your special role. In the postelection statement of the CBCP, a methodology was set forth: The bishops write, "In a creative imaginative way, under the guidance of Christ's Spirit, let us pray together, reason together, decide together, act together, always to the end that the truth prevails."

My dear fathers, who can better help bring about this coming together, praying together, reasoning together, deciding and acting together than you, our people's spiritual leaders for unity?

I was told that in the Archdiocese of Manila, there is a thrust for the building of basic ecclesiastical communities where the aforementioned methodology proposed by our bishops can be realized. You have also in your parishes the different mandated Catholic organizations which can be potent instruments of renewal. Will it be possible for you to motivate these and other church groups towards that constructive, critical collaboration, which seems to be firming up as the attitude of Philippine Church officialdom towards the present government?

Yes, I invite you to promote this constructive, critical collaboration. We need to collaborate – for the good of our people. I have repeatedly said to our people: “MAGTULUNGAN TAYO!” – not for the sake of Cory, but for the sake of the people we are all called to serve. I need your support, and I appeal for it. The time for rebuilding must be above all, a time for united effort. Ask your people to do their best, and give their all, for the sake of our country and its future. Ask them, and show them the way by your example.

I understand that this way mean a change in your leadership style. Just as the authoritarian style of Church leadership provided a spiritual climate favorable to martial rule, so also a more consultative and participative style of Church leadership will enable our people to be more participative also in the affairs of civil society.

With your help, perhaps we can bring into the collaborative effort of the Filipino people two groups: the first is the Marcos loyalists who, while clearly incapable of bringing back to power their discredited leader can, nevertheless, create annoying disturbances disruptive of peace and progress in our society. Is it possible to also influence this loyalist group towards the stance of active non-violence? If dissent they must, can they not be helped to express dissent relying only on the force of truth? Will it be possible for you to go even further and persuade them to join the mainstream of Filipino society in the work of national reconstruction?

The second are the NPA's most of whom were driven to the hills by the excesses of the previous regime. Can you assure those who may come to you that the period of oppression is over and they are needed for the march towards the progress of our country?

I do not fail to note that the word “critical” has been inserted between “constructive” and “collaboration.” I welcome that too. Never again should our people be simply cowed or bribed to do certain things. Never again should they be robotized. The present government needs the collaboration of thinking and free persons. Let your voices and that of your people be heard — in dialogue and not in angry confrontation. I claim neither perfection nor infallibility. I understand that the Church cannot identify itself unreservedly with any government, no matter how good. It has to preserve a certain distance which will leave it freedom to exercise its prophetic role. I welcome criticism, provided it be honest and made as part of our search for unity. In fact, I have only recently dialogued with members of the CBCP on pressing problems of our country.

However, I appeal also for patience. Rome was not built in a day. The Philippines will not be rebuilt in a few months. There are long days of toil and sacrifices ahead of us. We are saddled by the misdeeds of a profligate regime. We are handicapped by the evil effects in our persons and in our structures of this discredited rule. We must be patient and learn to undo step by step the sad legacy of twenty years of Marcos' misrule.

This will demand sacrifices and the spirit of sacrifice from all of us. My dear bishops, monsignori and fathers, challenge our people to make the necessary sacrifices. Show yourselves to be men of sacrifice as well.

But it is not on that note that I want to end. Hope must be the order of the day. The Filipino people is capable of great things. We produced in February another wonder of the world. A new Philippines is already being born in the hearts of our countrymen. Indeed, what can we not do with the help of God? How shall we fail when Mary stands by our side? I wish to ask you, my dear fathers, to give our people reasons for hoping and loving, for living and dying. The future beckons. Let us heed its call to greatness! No one of us can be blamed for not accomplishing everything. But we will be responsible before God and our people if we refuse to give all we can in this historical moment.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the people of Davao

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines Before the people of Davao

[Delivered in Davao City, May 23, 1986]

KEEPING PROMISES IN THE LAND OF PROMISE

As she promised, President Aquino came back to Davao now as the President of the Philippines, to once again appeal to the people of Davao and the whole Mindanao to help her government in the harder task of national recovery.

She believes that the best way to achieve the government's goal is consultations with the people on their problems and working out with them the solutions.

She tells the people of Davao to resort to people power again in order to achieve the goals of the new nation.

It is three months to the day when I should have arrived here to fulfill my promise to the people of Davao to visit again this land of promise and blighted performance. I was to come here to start, from the South, my northward campaign to bring the power of the people to bear upon the dictatorship that stole the election of their President and destroyed their democratic expectations. I was to tell you and the rest of the people of Mindanao to steel yourselves for a protracted struggle with an uncertain outcome. I was to ask you to cultivate the virtues of patience, perseverance, courage and self-reliance, for we would need them in the extreme.

Now I have arrived: already your President and in a land to which democracy has been restored. But my message has not changed. I have come to ask you still to call up those virtues for the longest task of national recovery, a task made only lighter by the freedom and justice in which it shall be carried out.

I said during the campaign that mine shall be a government of consultation. I have come to consult with you about your problems and to work out with you its solutions. I said during the campaign that consultation is necessary because no one can know better than the people directly affected what their problems are and how they should be solved. This is especially true when the main burden of the solutions must be borne by them. As you know, we have inherited a bankrupt government. But while that government is poor in material provision, it is rich in the strength of its will to recovery and in the power of the people who support and identify with it.

I have come to call on that power once more. The world stood amazed as we pulled off an unprecedented revolution. And it has been unstinting in its praise. The Filipinos swelled with pride as they stepped a little forward of the front rank of freedom-loving people because of the way they achieved their freedom.

For the world's praise and for its moral during the dark days of our struggle we are truly grateful. Now the world is intent on being amazed again to see us pull off another miracle: recovery, from near total devastation with no resources and a multitude of debts.

We are alone again in this second struggle to rebuild. We shall be cheered on by the rest of the world and helped a little by special friends. But we alone will bear the burden of recovery. This is fine with us. We are never better, as we recently demonstrated, than when we have our backs to the wall and with nowhere to go but forward.

I like it this way. This is how it was when I campaigned for the freedom and the Presidency of the people. This is again how it should be when our people, in their new freedom, march alone to progress. As in our struggle for freedom, we alone will pay the price but we alone will have the credit and the honor. From this second struggle we shall emerge a still prouder and truly independent nation.

TAPPING OF THE PEOPLE

THE

FORCES

President Aquino exhorts the members of the armed forces to help in the work of rehabilitating and rebuilding the country. Military might, she says, must be used for right. Her visit to Davao was the first outside Manila that she would undertake since assuming the presidency.

Soldiers of Davao, I have made it a point to visit you today to remind you how much our new government depends on you. I know that your numbers are small compared to the entire civilian population you are committed to defend and protect. I know that your military supplies run low and that your wages cannot fully compensate for the dangers and the risk to your lives that your service in the army entails. I know that though you have mastered the use of weapons, and that the sight of your troops in uniform inspires fear and respect, you suffer and struggle to earn your daily wage like the rest of us from day to day.

And yet, despite the limitations and difficulties you must bear with, so much of the future of your province, and the stability of your government and the entire country must rest on your shoulders.

You, our men in uniform have the task of keeping the peace, and upholding law and order in the province of Davao and the larger area of Southern Mindanao. As long as there is widespread poverty in your region, and as long as insurgents continue to terrorize your coastal towns and your hills and forests, it will always be a difficult battle.

And yet, I am cheered by the fact that there are factors in your favor today that were never there in the past decade. What you now uphold and defend is a government that enjoys a tremendous mandate and the confidence of the people. You have leaders that have pledged to rule by dialogue and consultation, that are sincere in their intentions to safeguard and redistribute the nation's wealth, that are committed to public service rather than to the pursuit of unlimited power and privilege. Most of all, you have a government that fears God more than the wiles and threats of ruthless men. And as we all know by now, when God is with us, who can prevail against us?

I would like you to recall, that during that fateful last week of February, a poorly armed and vastly outnumbered military contingent prevailed against the tanks, Sikorsky helicopters, planes and troops of Marcos. Their secret weapon, the answer to all our prayers, was a backup contingent of thousands of unarmed and peace-loving men, women and children. As these civilian volunteers surrounded the reformist troops staked out in Camps Crame and Aguinaldo, the missiles, machineguns, tear gas and bast-laid plans of General Ver and his cohorts were rendered useless. God was on the side of the reformists, and he had called on the people to their defense.

I must recall those four fateful days again and again because it reveals a strategy that you, the reformed military forces of Davao, can also use to your advantage. Your army may be small compared to the land area and size of the population you must patrol and protect. But remember that at any time, there is a vast reserve force that can immediately surround and support you. They are the people that live in your neighboring houses, the vendors in the public markets, the pedestrians, the farmers and the fishermen, your relatives and your friends. This is your hidden army. Your potential informers and field reconnaissance men. Your patrol and surveillance forces. Your living barricade against the guerilla and subversive tactics of the insurgent force that is in truth a minority. For if the ordinary, average and unarmed men, women and children of Davao and the rest of Southern Mindanao trust and respect you, who can prevail against you? They are the secret weapon that I recommend. People's power and the guidance of God.

Soldiers of Davao, I urge you to maintain the utmost courtesy and regard for the rights and privileges of the civilians around you. I challenge you to be humble, polite and in your day to day dealings with them. I ask you to participate wholeheartedly in the less glamorous tasks of national reconstruction. To participate in such military assistance programs as the building of bridges and roads, the provision of emergency shelter, relief and transportation in times of natural calamity, in protecting the routes of trade, in the giving of emergency medical aid, in community programs of reforestation and irrigation. I urge you not only to be model soldiers but also model citizens. See that you consistently behave in a creditable manner in public. In your off-duty hours, remember to lay aside your firearms. Practice moderation in all your indulgences. Never threaten, never swagger, never display cruelty or arrogance. For by doing so, you will invite allegiance to your enemy. Remember always that the people you protect will one day protect you when you hang in the balance between life and death.

In return for such commendable and soldierly behavior, your government will exhaust all the means within its reach to improve the standard of living of the military. Government will also intensify its counter-insurgency campaign. At this date, we are speeding up the structuring of a credible amnesty and rehabilitation program for surrendering rebels. We are also continuing negotiations for an honorable ceasefire, one that will not result in treachery, or loss of lives on both the side of the insurgents and the military. We are also pursuing our reform and reorganization program within the armed forces of the Philippines to insure that the most deserving and brave of our soldiers get the rank and recognition that is due them. We are working towards rehabilitating and rebuilding a country that will be easier for you to protect, to uphold and to defend.

Soldiers of Davao, you must help us by proving everyday that the military arm of the new government are truly defenders and not the offenders of the people. You must impress upon our struggling populace that military might is not right just be itself. Might must be used for right.

Soldiers of Davao, your commander in chief, the highest ranking officers of the Armed Forces of the Philippines and the people of our Republic are depending on you. And so far, the majority of you have not failed us. For in many instances I am told, the soldiers and officers of the Davao military have not only proven themselves warriors but also upright citizens and gentlemen.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Central Bank

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Central Bank

[Delivered in Davao City, May 23, 1986]

AN EXPERIENCE IN GOVERNMENT BY CONSULTATION

President Aquino explains that her call for a ceasefire during which negotiations with insurgents will take place, is a cease-fire-in-place. Troops will not return to the barracks to leave a free zone where insurgents can operate with impunity. Since insurgent leaders are presumed to have complete control over their men in the field, any gross violation of the ceasefire will be taken as a deliberate act and a signal of failure of negotiations and resumption of hostilities.

President Aquino also announced that local elections will be held as soon as possible after the ratification of the new constitution.

I try always to keep my word and therefore I am circumspect in making commitments. But I made a commitment to visit you again. I pledged to govern by consultation. I said that in God's appointed time we shall be free again. Now we are. And I am here, your President, come to consult with you on the problems of this region as you see them and to work out with you the solutions you feel are the best and that you can bear.

I said that I believe in the power of prayer to work miracles. It has. For we prayed not for freedom, but for the strength to persevere in the fight for it without hate or rancor until freedom came without doing violence to our call for reconciliation. And we found the strength and the courage to face down a dictatorship. We prayed for wisdom in leadership even as we committed ourselves to genuine democratic government. And the miracle has happened. No sooner was democracy restored than the people of this region, taking the event at face value, assumed their own leadership as befits a democracy and convened to arrive at an understanding of their problems and work out the appropriate solutions in the proud spirit of self-reliance and people power that had carried the country through to freedom. Our prayers are answered in part: we have a democracy in its full sense and dignity in this region.

What am I saying? That we pray to God and then we work so that deliverance from our tribulations will come through our efforts and singularly to our honor.

The struggle of the Filipinos down the centuries has not been for independence, democracy and progress but for the dignity they confer upon the race that wins and keeps all three. We rejected the economic security of continued colonial servitude when we demanded independence in the midst of the ruins of World War II. We might have had an easier time of it if we had swallowed our pride and delayed. We rejected the irresponsible condition of citizenship in a dictatorship that offered to assume all the power and all the responsibility for our lives. We have occasionally strayed from the path of democratic pride that is native to us but inevitably we have returned to it. I applaud the people and the natural leadership of Davao for taking the leading step in this direction.

You, the people of Davao and Eastern Mindanao, farmers and workers, businessmen and professionals, teachers and students, churchpeople and urban poor have opened your hearts and minds. The experience has been enriching and leaves me so encouraged. The task of governance cannot be the task of one person or a few people if it is to be done well. We as a people made a revolution together. Am I not right to expect therefore that we as a people must now consolidate the gains of that revolution and work together to make it work for each one of us? You are the first to meet that expectation. You have truly earned the right to call this government your own and a true democracy. I therefore commend Minister Ramon Mitra for vindicating this right by appointing a deputy minister for agriculture and food particularly for Mindanao. I shall ask my Cabinet to consider similar appointments in other pertinent ministries. I want nothing to stand between the Presidency and areas that have shown such political maturity in the appreciation of their problems.

The single deterrent to recovery and progress in Mindanao you are telling me is the peace and order problem. The problem encompasses not only the insurgency but, chiefly, common criminality abetted by warlords and even the military.

With regard to the insurgency, I have said that I shall call for a ceasefire for a definite and inextendible period during which I hope negotiations to take place that will result in an honorable and lasting peace that will address the legitimate demands of the insurgents without detracting from the security of the people, the stability of their new democracy or the honor of the New Armed Forces. This will be a ceasefire-in-place so that the armed forces shall be positioned to ward off any threats to the security of the people during the period of negotiations. Let me make myself clear on this point. There will be no ceasefire with return of the troops to the barracks that will leave the insurgents a free zone within which to operate with impunity. I shall assume that the insurgent leadership exercises complete control over their men in the field so that any gross violation of the ceasefire will be taken by my government as a deliberate act and a signal of the failure of negotiations and the resumption of hostilities. I am still waiting for the top leadership of the Communists to respond.

While I am considering the time when to call for a general ceasefire, taking the cue from this consultation I shall consult with the Minister of Defense on the feasibility of a regional ceasefire immediately for a period of 60 days during which regional leaders can establish contact with the insurgents in a particular region and negotiate, if not for the end of insurgent activity then for a longer truce during which greater trust might develop between the insurgent leadership and ranks and the government. A trust that can be the foundation of a permanent peace.

I met with 168 rebel returnees at the Carmelite convent this morning. I was struck by the extreme youth of these former insurgents and their obvious bravery and acute sense of justice. It is tragic that such youth and virtue have been wasted in fighting that could be harnessed for the greater good of our country. I assured them of their safety and declared General Magno personally responsible to me in that regard.

Knowing that poverty is a main cause of insurgency and that even the weary insurgent must believe he can have a start before he will consider returning to civil life, I shall consider the feasibility of an arms exchange program. Not cash for guns, but guns for rehabilitation and skills training to permit a smooth reintegration into society.

In this regard, I have learned here that there are 33,000 hectares of military reservations which could be used for land reform and rehabilitation.

All human rights abuses, whether committed by the Armed Forces or the Communists will be prosecuted equally vigorously. For, on a par with basic material needs, is the hunger for justice. Although I hope that with this new Beginning we have achieved, forgiveness will figure greatly when we calculate a better future for ourselves.

Because the peace and order problem is chiefly one of common criminality, I direct the Minister of Defense and the Chief of Staff to prepare and immediately implement a disarmament campaign against the warlords in the countryside and the criminal syndicates in the cities. I cannot believe that the main force of the Republic cannot eradicate this problem with dispatch. I do not want the warlords around to distort the democratic process that will take place soon after the ratification of a new Constitution.

Since criminality is a police problem, to which a police force that is not directly responsible to the community is a main contributor, I shall consider, in consultation with the Chief of Staff, devolving the authority over police forces back on to the local communities they serve. I shall test this proposition first in Metro Manila. I will not accept as an assumption that the CHDF are a necessary component of rural security in Mindanao and expect the Chief of Staff to submit to me a justification for its continued existence.

You raised the issue of political stability as it is affected by the insecurity of third level civil servants. You should know that, on my directive, the Civil Service Commission has already issued guidelines regarding these civil servants. We are allowed greater discretion in the retention or relief of civil servants on the first and second level who occupy positions of trust and confidence. I shall refer the matter of the Civil Service Commission for restudy and a report to me within 30 days from today.

Local elections will be held as soon as possible after the ratification of the new Constitution. I shall urge the members of the Constitutional Commission, whose full complement I shall have appointed this Sunday, to complete the drafting of a new constitution within three months.

On the issue of the appointments of OICs, we have tried to carefully evaluate all nominees. I ask you now to give them a chance to prove themselves. I have heard unreasonable comments about their lack of experience. I beg you to consider that if they had too much experience they would have been the men of Marcos, who has in power for the past 20 years. I had no experience. If I had had experience it would have been in Marcos politics and I would not have led you to freedom.

Just the same, I encourage those who feel aggrieved over the OIC process to bring your cases to my attention and these will be acted upon with dispatch.

I am in the process of fulfilling my pledge to dismantle the coconut monopoly. While the PCGG is working to unearth the anomalies and unravel the complex structure of that body, we shall reconstitute the various boards of the major instruments of the monopoly to restore public confidence in this major sector of our agricultural economy. These bodies are nowhere representative of the coconut farmers or industry. The elections in the Cocofed were rigged. The officers were elected in a manner repugnant to our new democratic ethic. I shall protect the coconut farmers from any scheme that stifles their enterprise or steals their rightful share of a major sector of our economy.

I have heard other more specific issues and have not had time to consider the solutions you propose. I shall seriously consider your proposals and respond to them as soon as I can.

Although we have not made decisions on all the issues you have raised with me, I think a great deal has been achieved already, not least the successful experiment at consultative government that has taken place here.

I beg you to recall that we fought the dictatorship, first and foremost, for democracy and its mature exercise is what you have demonstrated here today. The campaign and the revolution made me proud to be a Filipino. What I have seen here today has made me proud to be your President.

of

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the alleged pro-labor stance of the Government

[Delivered at the Cebu Plaza, Chamber of Commerce, May 24, 1986]

POST-REVOLUTION BATTLECRY: INDUSTRIAL PEACE

Answering critics on the alleged pro-labor stance of Government, President Aquino declares that in fact her government is pro-labor and pro-capital; in short, pro-Filipino. She aims at industrial peace to bring about a climate of stability, thus encouraging domestic and foreign investment to result in more jobs and better living standards for the masses.

President Aquino appeals to labor, to use their right to strike as a last resort and to capital, to give labor decent wages and desist from unfair labor practices.

It warms my heart to be here in Cebu today. Cebu will always be very special to me. Cebu gave me refuge, the day our revolution started. It was here on that day where I felt the vast reservoir of genuine Cebuano love and affection.

More than its special personal meaning to me, Cebu enjoys an equally special role for the nation. It is the hub of commerce and industry in this part of our country.

And Cebu is what it is largely because of the entrepreneurial drive and business acumen of many of you here today. It is indeed a distinct honor to address you, the businessmen of Cebu.

In a very real way, you wield a magic wand in your hands. By the stroke of that wand, enterprises rise, factories grind to life, jobs are created, and profits are hopefully realized.

You will quickly remind me, however, that it is not as simple as that. I fully agree. We are all aware of the numerous problems, we face, coming as we have from a dark age. The challenge is clear, we must boldly embark on a second revolution of economic development.

In this regard, I must confess a measure of dismay. It seems that following my Labor Day speech at the Luneta, many have seen my government as pro-labor and anti-capital. Ironically, others in the labor sector see government's stance to be exactly the opposite— that is, pro-capital and anti-labor. Truly, a glass is half empty or half full, depending on how thirsty you are.

I would like to assure all of you that my government – your government – is a government of the entire Filipino people and not of only one sector or interest group.

My government is both pro-labor and pro-capital; in short, it is pro-Filipino. The fundamental concern is for industrial peace. Industrial peace breeds a climate of stability. This encourages domestic and foreign investment, which results in more jobs and better living standards for the masses. And that leads, to a longer lasting industrial peace. We must all work together to begin this cycle – this process of growth and development. Magtutungan po tayo.

I gave to the labor sector only that which was denied them during the repressive Marcos years – their right to organize, to seek redress of grievances, to seek a better life for themselves. I also asked them to cooperate in the stabilization process by using the right to strike only as a last resort. I have been assured by the major labor groups that they will abide by this request.

I reiterate this appeal to labor. Help keep industrial peace. Use the right to strike only as a last resort and not as your opening salvo in seeking better employment terms. I call on the labor sector, particularly in Cebu, to heed this call.

On the other hand, I call on you – the businessmen, the entrepreneurs, the owners of enterprises – to do your part. Give labor a decent wage and sufficient benefits that you are able to afford. Do not obstruct labor's right to organize and desist from unfair labor practices.

I appeal to both of you: Let us temper ourselves in these trying times when our collective battlecry, must be stability and industrial peace. Keep your communication lines to each other open. Talk to each other in the spirit of openness, dialogue, and consultation – in much the same way I have tried to govern the country. Yesterday, in Davao, we proved that a process of dialogue between seemingly divergent sectors and positions is possible if people are willing to listen to each other – to respect each other.

Together with the challenge to keep industrial peace is an equally important appeal – an appeal addressed specifically to you, the businessmen and entrepreneurs: It is the challenge to unleash the long-restrained Filipino entrepreneurial drive. We no longer have the time to wait and see. Waiting for better and more stable times is a less risky but equally uncertain posture. Better times are made by those that take the risk. Release your capital, your creativeness, your entrepreneurial spirit. Help us rebuild our ravaged country. While we seek the help of foreign countries, to help fund our growth, we must be prepared to do it ourselves. And if we have to, we will. And when we do, our new-found pride in ourselves as Filipinos will increase a hundred fold.

Government will do its part in trying to provide a climate conducive to investment and growth. We will mediate between disagreeing parties when we have to. We will set clear policies and enforce them without fear or favor. The tripartite approach will be pursued – with government, labor, and capital sitting together to set directions and resolve issues.

I would like the local governments to become more active in our drive to rebuild our nation. Consistent with my desire to decentralize the operations of government, I would like your local governments to take the active lead in their areas. While local officials must coordinate with the national government, initiative must, for the large part, come from local government. The local governments, for example, must deliver such public services to their constituents like water, drainage, electricity and many others. While I challenge your local officials to act expeditiously to address your needs, I ask you in turn to support their efforts to do so.

Lastly, Cebu has one of the largest potentials for tourism in our country. Do not waste the gifts that God has given you – the countless scenic spots of Cebu, your bountiful natural resources, and endearing cultural heritage. If you respond to the challenges I have just given you and the situation stabilizes, then Cebu can be one of the primary tourist destinations in our country. I will ask Minister Gonzalez and the Ministry of Tourism to help you to do this.

Truly Cebu and the Cebuanos have a wealth of resources that, if properly tapped, will make a significant contribution to our country's rebuilding.

I ask you not to hesitate to use these resources. Let us move forward boldly to make our future one that we can all be proud of.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the American Military Cemetery Memorial Day Service

WHAT PRICE FREEDOM?

President Aquino does not believe that the death of young men can justify even such noble cause as the attainment of freedom.

She feels that the men who have died for freedom could have been alive today and could be contributing more for the good of the world if only nations resorted to peaceful means in achieving their goals.

She is proud that at least here in the Philippines we have tried to have freedom through peaceful means, and we achieved it.

Others might be tempted to declaim, on an occasion like this, that an enduring friendship between two nations had flowered on the graves of these young men. I cannot. I have seen death at first hand and it cannot justify anything in my eyes. Even the attainment of freedom cannot justify the lives that had to be sacrificed for it. That many have had to die, like these young men, so that others might be free is not an argument for mortal sacrifices but an added condemnation of the unjust governments that made them necessary.

Looking at the rolling lawn around us, studded with crosses and stars of David, I don't see the price that had to be paid for a priceless freedom, but the loss of young men who might have been given us a better world than we have had since the end of the Second World War.

What I see here is not so much the glory of a nation but the tragedy of a world that will not let the ways of peace prevail. At least here in the Philippines we tried.

Perhaps our success will not be duplicated anywhere else in the world. Already political thinkers are looking for reasons to say that the success of non-violent struggle is unique to our time, place and race. These could be the same people who told us, during the dictatorship, that Filipinos are neither suited nor inclined to democracy. We proved them wrong, at least to the extent of showing that the Filipino was prepared without arms or hate, to lay down his or her life in peace for democracy. We also proved wrong the premise that you need violence to dislodge a violent dictatorship, that you simply cannot unravel it like a woman unravels a ball of yarn, patiently and relentlessly. You will never know what can be done until you've tried. Considering the alternative, I cannot see why the attempt has not been made more often.

But, for all my deep aversion to violence, I honor places like this, where the brave dead lie, as symbols of that second fatherland of courage to which Americans like these, and Filipinos like Ninoy, are united without the distinctions of nationality and political creed. I pay to them the respect that is due the willing sacrifice of the brave and express to them the gratitude of the nation they helped to liberate.

With the sad reluctance I share with the loved ones they left behind, I repeat the words that make children ardent for some desperate glory:

Dulce et decorum est, pro patria mori.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Educators Congress

[Delivered in Baguio City, May 27, 1986]

PLACING GREATER VALUE ON VALUES

The role of the teachers in molding and guiding the total personality of the child cannot be underestimated. Uplift of the teaching profession is a major concern of the Aquino administration. The government has started by reducing the prices of oil and oil based products to trigger a lowering of basic commodities, improve the standard of living of the people.

Since I began my campaign for the Presidency, and since I took on that task of the highest office in the land, I have spoken to many audiences.

I have spoken to crowds in the rural areas. To the farmers and fishermen who work the soil and harvest the oceans to feed our nation.

I have spoken to international bankers and local businessmen who raise the capital to create the jobs we need to meet the basic needs of our people and get our economy moving.

I have spoken to the labor force, to the men who must take the yoke on their shoulders and pull with all their muscle and might to dislodge us from economic inertia.

I have spoken to our soldiers, to the men and women who are the shield and sword of the freedoms we fought so hard to attain.

I have spoken to a multiplicity of sectors, each with a pivotal role in the task of national reconstruction, but to none who are as crucial and influential in our total scheme of growth and equity as to this audience that I now address. For you, our teachers; you, the administrators of our schools, colleges, and universities are a class unto yourselves. For all of us have passed through your hands. All have been molded in your classrooms and laboratories. All have been guided by your words and example during our most impressionable ages. Our bankers and businessmen, farmers and laborers, soldiers and priests, our government officials and cabinet ministers, and I myself were once clay in your hands. We are what you made us. You, our teachers, one of the most neglected sectors of our society, are the sector that made all the other sectors what they are.

And I must also say, that in the same way, those who pillaged our economy, debased our institutions, perverted our laws, and corrupted the values of many Filipinos, were also highly educated men and women. They too were once clay in the hands of teachers. But I do not think it was the teaching profession's fault that they hardened into crooks. These people had the conceit of the half-educated. They knew quite well how to do things but never learned to what good purpose. That, at least, is the kindest thing we can say about them.

You more than any of us are keenly aware that knowledge must always be tempered by morals. That intellect without deep roots in sound conscience may indeed blossom for a brief season but leaves no seed for the next. Our nation was sorely misled, our values twisted, the public interest derided and public faith in government seriously undermined. These wounds on our morals, more than the economic devastation that cripples our ability to give our people the life they deserve, more than the pockets of insurgency, disturb and pre-occupy me the most. For the problems of the economy and the insurgency, with their roots in greed and injustice, are only the effects of the more insidious cause — the corruption of our morals.

And so I say that the audience of educators to whom I now speak is instrumental in the making or breaking of our national destiny. For you must train and guide generation after new generation of Filipinos to be statesmen as well as politicians, gentlemen as well as soldiers, philanthropists as well as businessmen, christians as well as citizens. In other words, we need you to launch as sweeping a revolution in this country as that which swept the dictatorship. We need you to surround and protect the hearts and minds of young Filipinos, as the Filipinos last February surrounded and protected the last expression of the Filipino revolt. We need you to instill in our youth a love for peace, a keen sense of justice and civic duty, a belief in hard work, respect and caring for their fellow men, a jealousy for their rights and freedoms, and an absolute trust and faith in God.

But before we can ask this of you, our people and government should commit themselves to give you what is your due in the light of the high mission you are called to perform. We must restore the esteem and high priority the education sector enjoyed before Marcos. We must let your voices be heard more prominently in our consultations with the various sectors. We must prevent the indignities heaped on you by the previous government. Our teachers should never again be forced to endure threats and intimidation to distort the electoral process or teach the youth flattering lies about the government. And, when we have recovered to some degree from the devastation wrought by Marcos on the economy and the government, we must give you a share of the national budget commensurate with the high mission you are called to perform.

In the meantime, and for the sake of equity, my government has instituted measures that will improve the standard of living of the people, including the public sector. I have reduced the prices of oil products, which should trigger a lowering of the prices of commodities. Other measures along the same lines are being studied. I know your situation, even as I know the situation of others in the public sector. I ask for your patience and cooperation. We are all in the same boat.

In the meantime, this administration will rationalize and reform the country's educational system as well as the Ministry of Education and Culture itself. We will restructure the central office of the Ministry to achieve integration and a more efficient delivery of services. We have observed that the present setup has too many auxiliary and specialized units that make coordination difficult. The duplication of functions among the different offices has caused unnecessary expense and a wastage of human resources. The Reorganization Committee is well along in its study of these problems.

I have also asked our government reorganization commission to study the possibility of creating a National Commission of Arts and Culture under the MECS. This body will coordinate and integrate the cultural aspects of the Ministry, placing the National Library, the National Museum, the National Historical Institute, the Institute of National Language, a new Institute of Arts and Letters under its wing. But such changes shall not mean the discontinuance of any of the specialized programs of the Ministry. Nor will there be any mass layoffs of Ministry personnel except for true and reasonable cause.

A better organized, efficient and responsive ministry can then function as the spearhead of the drive to reform the educational system. Being a mother myself, I am acutely aware of how greatly the school environment determines the character of the child. The Church, the home, and the community are important influences, but the child spends the better part of his or her day in school. It is imperative therefore that we upgrade the quality of education at all stages, especially in the elementary and secondary levels.

As a first step, the elementary school curriculum should be fully implemented to give our children as well-rounded an understanding of the world and science as possible. The teachers that will impart his understanding must be trained well for the job. We must therefore intensify the training and retraining of some 325,000 teachers and their administrators in gradeschools throughout the country.

A serious inadequacy is the lack of books, facilities and other equipment. While we are looking for the funds to solve this problem, we must further systematize the distribution of books and other instructional materials to achieve a fairer allocation of the scarce resources. We also need to continue with the Program for Decentralized Education Development. This program seeks to supplement the diet of basic skills in reading, writing and arithmetic with sessions on the inculcation of discipline, self-reliance, resourcefulness, nationalism and love of God.

This supplementary values formation program will continue on the secondary level to insure that, in addition to the higher learning therein imparted, the high school student never loses his or her mooring in the fundamental values of our culture.

I am told that in the school year 1983 to 1984, only 64% of the total high school age population of 4,886,401 youths had access to secondary education. We shall endeavor to make high schooling a commitment of the national government along with elementary schooling. And we shall try to achieve this without sacrificing quality.

On the tertiary level, we see a need to rationalize our state colleges and universities, which have grown tremendously in number but declined seriously in the quality of the education they impart. They put a tremendous strain on our national budget without a commensurate benefit to the educational improvement of our people.

I understand that the Ministry of Education is studying, alongside an integrated approach to public and private education, a flagship system for higher education. For instance, in the area of agriculture, which is our thrust, the Ministry will identify, with the help of the Agriculture Ministry, one national agricultural university, three zonal agricultural universities, 13 regional agricultural colleges and one technical agricultural institute in each province. This in short means marking out the best schools toward which the bulk of educational funding will be directed. Scholarship programs in such a system will also be improved.

I hope you will share mine and the Ministry's enthusiasm for these programs. I know, however, that your chief preoccupation is your income. I must repeat my call for patience and cooperation. The previous government was liberal in its promises but it was also prodigal in the use of the funds that could have gone into the fulfillment of those promises. The future of better paid teaching was spent in the last election. I ask you now to join with me in recouping our losses, in gathering a new harvest of national resources so that many of your dreams and mine for better a country can be realized. We all suffered under Marcos. We must all sacrifice to recover from the experience. But if we persevere, we shall all, I believe, partake of the progress that lies our power to achieve.

This is our only country. The school youth in your charge are our only future. Stay the course with this government and our people and we shall have a country that we are not only proud of, but in which we shall enjoy the peace and fulfillment we have been long denied.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Outstanding Farmers of the Year and policy directions in agriculture

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Outstanding Farmers of the Year and policy directions in agriculture

[Released on May 30, 1986]

LOOSENING AND LIFTING THE YOKE

Agriculture and the farmer are at the center of the government's recovery program.

Giving highest priority to the development of agriculture, President Aquino lists steps taken to implement a short-term recovery plan for the rural sector: land reform in tenanted rice and corn lands, rural infrastructure program, credit, extension support, and other forms of assistance to the small farmer, price support program for rice and corn, removal of P10-surcharge per bag of fertilizer and creation of a cabinet standing committee on rural development.

Let me congratulate our ten outstanding farmers whom we have just awarded in today's ceremonies. In giving them recognition, we pay homage to the millions of farmers throughout the countryside who are the backbone of our nation and the focus of our program for economic recovery.

Today, we also honor an entire community of farmers for their achievements in working together as one group. Their collective endeavors for a common purpose exemplify the spirit of oneness that is required of all sectors of our society if we are to see our nation through this time of crisis.

Let me likewise commend the twelve outstanding extension workers of the Ministry of Agriculture and Food. They personify the standards of selfless dedication and professionalism that other extension workers and public servants in general should emulate. Indeed, "Kabalikat ng Magsasaka" is a phrase that captures the important role played by the government's 15,000-strong extension force. In bringing the fruits of research and technology to the farm, extension workers are truly the partners of farmers in their quest for a better life.

Your new government places agriculture and the farmer at the center of its recovery program. This commitment was set forth in a statement I made even before the presidential election in February. I said then:

- That highest priority would be given to the development of agriculture not only to realize the goal of equitable distribution of benefits and opportunities but also to enable the 70 percent of the population who live in the countryside to maximize their contributions to the economy;
- That we would implement a genuine land reform program that includes a package of credit, marketing, and technological support;
- That priority would be accorded and investments would be encouraged in labor-intensive, rural based small and medium-scale agricultural enterprises, particularly those engaged in food production for domestic consumption.

Although there remains much more to be done, today, I am happy to say that your government has acted to give substance to this commitment.

First of all, the Ministry of Agriculture and Food has completed its "Short-Term Recovery Plan for the Rural Sector." This plan defines your government's agenda for agricultural development over the next few years.

It is anchored on three major policy goals:

- First, to free the economy from unnecessary and costly government institutional and policy interventions;
- Second, to provide the farmer access to land, technology, credit, infrastructure, and market information, and to provide landless wage earners greater employment opportunities;
- Third, to increase the effectiveness of the various government agencies concerned in pursuing the new thrusts in agriculture and the rural sector. Decentralization is a key feature of this policy goal in order to ensure the full participation of farmers and landless workers in the development process.

Your government and the Ministry of Agriculture and Food have already taken several steps to implement this short-term plan.

As a first step in the decentralization of the Ministry's operations, we have appointed a Deputy Minister for Mindanao. Deputy Minister Rolando Marcial will be based in Davao. In this way, we are bringing the Ministry's services closer to the farmers while providing the mechanism for real participation of farmers in decision-making. The new Deputy Minister's main job is to serve as the link between farmers and the various local officials and private organizations serving the rural sector. For example, in deciding which farm-to-market roads should be repaired immediately, he would coordinate on behalf of farmers with the regional officers of the Ministry of Public Works and Highways as well as with barangay officials.

In the aspect of market liberalization, we have dismantled monopolies and restrictions which have dampened the farmer's incentive to produce and impeded the growth of the rural economy.

We have taken steps to make sure that the sugar and coconut monopolies are not revived.

We have lifted the ban on copra exports.

We are calling for the election of a new set of officers in Cocofed to help ensure that this body truly represents the best interests of coconut farmers. As I stated in Davao City only a few days ago, we shall continue to protect coconut farmers from any scheme that stifles their enterprise or steals their rightful share of a major sector of our economy.

We have withdrawn government's exclusive role in the importation of wheat and soybean meal.

We have disbanded the meat importation cartel.

We are in the process of liberalizing fertilizer importations.

In the credit aspect, the Central Bank has opened its rediscounting window to quedan loan papers under the National Food Authority's grain quedan financing program. We have done this to make more credit funds available to private traders for purchasing the produce of rice and corn farmers. In this way, we hope to induce greater competition among trade which result, hopefully, in higher prices paid to farmers.

In addition to these steps already completed, we are in the process of implementing other policy reforms and measures as part of our short-term recovery plan. Among the most important of these are the following:

- One, we are implementing land reform in the poorest areas, with first priority given to the completion of land reform in tenanted rice and corn lands, the distribution of portions of the public domain through resettlement programs, the lending of idle private lands to the landless, and the adoption of voluntary land-sharing schemes in sugar-lands withdrawn from sugar production;
- Two, we are developing and implementing a rural infrastructure program focused on irrigation, roads, ports, and flood control and drainage projects with the quickest pay off.

- Three, to remove the constraints that impede the flow of credit to agriculture, we are working on several schemes which would augment the supply of credit available, bring down the risks and costs of agricultural lending, and rehabilitate the rural credit delivery system;
- Four, we shall implement new policies to help improve the incomes of fishermen and aquaculture entrepreneurs. We shall provide credit and extension support for fishpond owners, work for the proper allocation of lake areas for aquaculture projects, and eliminate destructive fishing techniques in coastal fishing grounds;
- Five, we are working for the closer control of pesticide use, even as we disseminate integrated pest management techniques for the biological control of pests and disease of crops and livestock;
- Six, we are re-orienting the Agricultural Incentives Priorities Plan to make sure that the support given to big business will supplement the primary goal of assisting small farmers;
- Seven, we are mobilizing the research and extension system, including agricultural colleges and universities, private agribusiness firms, and farmer organizations;
- Eight, your government will continue to implement price support programs for rice and corn in order to guarantee fair prices for farmers at harvest time. As part of our program to support the Filipino farmer, we continue to implement policies discouraging importations of rice, corn, and feed ingredient substitutes that are produced locally.
- Nine, I will recommend to the Cabinet the reduction of export taxes on all agricultural products except logs and copra in order to induce more investments in agricultural exports.
- Ten, we shall likewise take up in the Cabinet the feasibility at the present time of reducing sales taxes and import duties on agricultural inputs like pesticides, fertilizer, feed ingredients, animal breeding stocks, and seeds in order to cut production costs for the farmer;
- Eleven, I will recommend to the Cabinet removal of the P10.00 per bag surcharge built into fertilizer prices and collected to support the rehabilitation of Planters Products. Farmers should not be made to bear the burden of paying Planters Products' debt;
- Lastly, we are creating a Cabinet Standing Committee on Rural Development which shall coordinate the activities of all government agencies concerned in the implementation of the Short-term Recovery Plan for the Rural Sector. This Committee shall be composed of the Ministers of Agriculture, Natural Resources, Agrarian Reform, Public Works and Highways, Transport and Communications, Local Governments, NEDA, Finance, and Budget.

Before I close, let me re-affirm that our goal is to encourage an environment in which farmers can improve their quality of life.

Two principles guide us in our planning to achieve this goal. First, we shall de-emphasize production per se in favor of policies affecting income and wealth creation. And second, we will pursue this goal in an environment of free enterprise and individual initiative.

Thus, where before the emphasis of the past administration was on increasing the production of certain food and export crops, the over-riding concern of this administration is to help increase farm incomes and employment opportunities rather than just production per se.

Where before the Marcos government subscribed to the practice of authoritarianism and excessive intervention, this government will not presume to direct the farmer's endeavors, nor will it interfere with the play of market forces. In short, we will merely clear the way for Filipino initiative and enterprise in farming to flourish.

Indeed, in the twenty years of the Marcos regime, the farmer was left out of the decision-making process. He had no voice as to what crops he should plant, what animals he should raise, or what farming systems he should adopt.

Your new government would like you to know that all that is a thing of the past.

I started out by saying that we are here to honor our farmers and farm workers — they who toil hardest to create new wealth for us all.

Our country stands at a crucial moment in its history. The future lies with agriculture, and it behooves us all to give farmers every help to bring it about. It is a long hard road before we settle the obligations we inherited from Marcos and achieve the progress we have longed for. For that journey, we shall need all the strength and self-reliance that a vibrant agriculture can give our people.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the members of the Constitutional Commission

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the members of the Constitutional Commission

[Delivered on June 2, 1986]

NEW FRAMEWORK FOR A REAL DEMOCRACY

President Aquino exhorts the members of the Constitutional Commission to: 1) be quick about their work because the nation is eager to have a new constitution, and 2) limit themselves to their constitutional mission: to provide for a new legislature and let this legislature of elected representatives enact the laws.

You are here today vested with the full authority and the complete independence to write our country's new Constitution. Nobody, not even I your President, can interfere with, or overrule you, in this great task. Our nation has placed its trust in you. Do not let it down.

I join you today only to honor your beginning. What happens from here on is a matter for you and you alone.

Today, apart from wishing you well and saying the hopes and prayers of our whole nation are with you, I want only to make two points. The first is, please be quick. Nobody can impose a deadline on your deliberations but you know that our whole nation is eager for a new constitution, and the subsequent elections as soon as possible. The people expect a constitutional draft for their sovereign acceptance or rejection within three months, so eager are they to have, in the shortest time possible, a full-blown democratic republic.

Second limit yourselves to your constitutional mission. Your task is to design a constitution that will provide for a new legislature. Not to do that legislature's work for it. That is for the people's elected representatives to do.

You must define and protect our individual freedoms and rights; you must decide how our different institutions of state will relate to each other. Do not be distracted by political debates and matters of policy that do not belong within your constitution-making exercise. You are here appointed, by the people's wish, to write a constitution; you are not here as elected politicians.

Bear in mind that you shall be pondering, debating and writing a constitution not only for our contemporaries with their present concerns, but also for succeeding generations of Filipinos whose first concerns we cannot presume to know beforehand. Future Filipinos must always be free to decide how to address these concerns as they arise. Even the wisest cures for present maladies should not be imposed on succeeding generations that will have their own unique problems and priorities.

True and long-lived constitutions, a wise justice has told me, should be broad enough to be able to meet every exigency we cannot foretell and specific enough to stoutly protect the essentials of a true democracy; in short, open-ended documents that will always be relevant. Remember that constitutional changes are not safe or easy to come by. Our first attempt at constitutional revision was followed by a dictatorship. And this, our second endeavor, was preceded by a revolution.

Future Filipinos and their legislatures and Supreme Courts can best assess and address the challenges they will meet if they enjoy the widest latitude of thought and action. In writing a constitution have the fullest confidence that the wisdom of our race is exhausted in us. Our race has grown in wisdom over time. I believe it will continue to do so.

Yours is indeed no easy task. On the other hand, depending on the result, yours will be no small glory. Our people have suffered much.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the First One Hundred Days of Freedom

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the First One Hundred Days of Freedom

[Delivered on June 4, 1986]

COUNTING

(Culled from a television panel discussion)

FREEDOMS

Freedom regained is the government's greatest achievement in its first 100 days. But President Aquino warns that it might also be its greatest danger since some sectors are taking that freedom for granted. "Let us remain vigilant," she urges.

Minister Ramon Mitra of Agriculture cites liberalization of credit for small farmers as another achievement of Government. NEDA Chairman Solita Monsod cites the removal of export taxes on agricultural goods, an import liberalization program and an emergency employment scheme. Minister Augusto Sanchez of Labor states that the incidence of strikes in the industrial sector since he took over has decreased and these are of short duration. Minister Jaime Ongpin of Finance lists the 85% build up in foreign exchange reserves as a result of people selling their dollar holdings to the Central Bank, reflecting a return in confidence in Government; the stabilization of the peso at a P20.50 to $1 exchange rate, the decrease in interest rates for loans, and the offers of foreign assistance.

During the election campaign, I gave a speech outlining what my government would do in the first 100 days. It was wildly applauded, even if not completely believed. How could there be a first 100 days of an Aquino Administration? That today we should be assessing what we have achieved in our first 100 days; that, far from being dreams, it has been a down-to-earth reality of how to deal with a legacy of debt, a bankrupt government, poverty, corruption and insurgency should not be forgotten. We have come a long way very quickly.

The first 100 days were entered into with so much expectation and with so much to be done, 14 long years of a seemingly irreversible slide to disaster had ended in a snap. Reversing it was the work of brave people committed to our freedom and whose example finally drew the millions to that cause. The events of February did not happen by magic and from nowhere. There is no instant revolution nor, I must tell you are there instant answers. We had a snap election; then, we had a snap revolution but I never promised you snap solutions.

Our country needs your hard work, your patriotism, and your faith more than ever. Your government can, and is, creating the conditions for recovery but that recovery can only be carried forward by your efforts. Our revolution taught us two truths: first, that what the Filipino people want they must seek on their own. Others are not going to save us. Second, People Power is exactly that: it is people acting together, not government alone, to press through change. Don't sit back and think that because there is now a People's Government the nation's problems are taken care of. That is a dangerous delusion. Now let us look not to government but to ourselves for the next step.

Are we prepared to put aside differences and commit ourselves to the common task: national revival? In this first 100 days you have rightly asked the question: "What has government done for you?" Today I shall try to answer that, but may I also put a question to you: "What are you going to do for your country in the second 100 days?"

My Presidency was an invitation to everybody to bury their differences and work together. I fear some have seen this new freedom, not as the privilege of a common commitment to rebuild the nation, but as a license to rake up old, or light up new, quarrels. Let us all be sure of the highest standards of honesty and accuracy in what we do and say. Perhaps the greatest achievement of the first 100 days is also its greatest danger: we are taking freedom for granted.

I am particularly anxious that there should be no abuse of our precious freedom because ours was no ordinary revolution. We rejected the revolutionary's normal course of change: violence, because that was not our way. Where others would have pointed a gun we held out our hand in peace and reconciliation. The price of that restraint is that we must remain vigilant.

The other price of a peaceful revolution is that it appears to raise questions about how far we mean to go. It is almost as though a revolution without violence is not to be taken seriously. The blood in the streets is the test of political determination. Well, let me give this assurance. We will go all the way it takes to build a society free from corruption, oppression and poverty, where every Filipino has the chance to fulfill his or her potential. There will no longer be one Philippines for the rich and one for the poor, one for the strong and another for the weak.

Let me turn to what we meek revolutionaries have already achieved: the record of the first 100 days. This has been a 100 days of freedom:

- * First, freedom under the law. We have freed our courts from political interference; restored habeas corpus, and released political prisoners. Under the present temporary Freedom Constitution, as it is known, we have guaranteed full protection of human rights and the authority of our courts.

- * Second, freedom of the press. In this short 100 days. We have seen the blooming of the freest press in our region. Amongst none of our neighbors does media enjoy the same unlimited free speech.

- * Third, freedom for our farmers. Seventy per cent of our people live in rural areas. They have been enslaved by government imposed cartels that have kept down the prices for what they grow at the same time that they have had to pay inflated prices for inputs such as fertilizer. We have dismantled the cartels and lowered the price of fertilizers. Above all we must free our farmers from the cycle of indebtedness, poverty, underemployment and landlessness that has been their lot. We are examining how to make more cheap credit available to the farmers themselves. The DBP is establishing a P500 million facility for small and medium-scale industries in the countryside and for agriculture. And we are implementing land reform in the poorest areas. The rural sector is the focus of our concern. It is where we must make our principal investment for recovery. The oil price cuts, amounting to one peso per liter, that I have ordered have had particular impact on the rural economy. This year the price of oil has been cut by 27 per cent.

- * Fourth, freedom of labor. I have repealed those aspects of the labor laws that are repressive and aggravate rather than enhance labor relations. I have sought to lay the foundations for a system of labor relations that is compatible with our people's vision of a just society and the imperative of a swift recovery before the justice in progress that we seek recedes completely beyond our reach.

- * Fifth, freedom of the military. We have freed the military to play their proper role of protector of the Filipino people. By the brave actions of their leaders in starting the revolt, the military began the process that is enabling them to recover the nation's respect. Both through the retirement of overstaying generals and through the extensive program of military reform that is being embarked on we are restoring our military to top fighting form.

- * Sixth, freedom from the hills. For those insurgents who now want to take advantage of it, there is the possibility of returning to normal life. When I was in Davao I met the 168 insurgents who had recently sought amnesty and rehabilitation there under the so-called Davao project. We will expand such regional initiatives and I still hope the insurgent leadership will respond at the national level to my offer of a negotiated amnesty.

- * Seventh, freedom of our economy. You know the magnitude of our debt problem and the bankruptcy of our government following the previous regime's election fraud but let me today tell you the good news. Our foreign exchange reserves have increased by 85 per cent since the revolution; the value of the peso has strengthened. Our inflation rate which was 50 per cent in 1984 and 23 per cent in 1985 has now come down to a rate of 2.1 per cent. Interest rates have fallen sharply. Our economic problems remain huge. Indeed one reason inflation is so low is because there is so little demand in our economy. One can only hope that private investors will soon take the initiative and show confidence in the power of the people, of which they are a part, to transform our country. It is clear that recovery will be through our own efforts or not at all. We must help ourselves. So our 1986 budget is a budget for growth. It is aimed at job creation in the rural sector, particularly by an effort to use labor intensive methods in infrastructure programs. There is a 60 per cent increase in capital expenditures. This will allow large-socio job creation.

There are many further freedoms I could name. Those that come from the improvement in medical services; or from the revived tourist industry or our emphasis on protecting the natural environment. By stopping illegal logging and launching on June 6th a national reforestation scheme we are determined to preserve and restore our natural habitat.

I have kept until the last constitutional freedom because the writing of the constitution lies immediately before us. My part is done. After wide consultations I have named the members of the Con-Com and it has started work. We kept to the tight timetable to ensure that as soon as possible we would again have an elected legislature, and constitution we can all honor and respect. It alone can provide the permanent framework for our freedoms.

I have laid out today how your government has used the first 100 days to restore and guarantee freedoms and remove obstacles from our national progress. But a People's Government could not have done all this if the people had not, in the first instance, overthrown the dictatorship in its path. So much was achieved by the power of the people. And it is that power I wish to summon again in the revival of our economy and the establishment of peace. The freedom you have won requires unflagging responsibility. May I end by repeating my earlier question: What are you going to do for your country in the next 100 days?

And now I would like to ask the four ministers whom I invited here to tell you what their respective offices have accomplished during the first one hundred days. Since the main thrust of our economic recovery program is agriculture, I think it's fitting to ask Minister of Agriculture Ramon Mitra to start the discussion.

Mitra:	The farmer today enjoys more opportunities to earn. In the past there were In the past, farmers didn't know where to borrow money to buy, say, a caraba where they could bring their produce after harvest. In relation to the latter, the speed and ease.
President:	Perhaps Minister Monsod can elaborate on how we can help farmers by abolishing One of the major policy reforms that we have undertaken or agreed by the liberalization program that will be phased. Essentially this import liberalization it easier for exporters who use imported products for example. And these exports abroad. With respect to job creation itself the government is committed to launching half years, one million jobs. Now, is that realistic? And the answer is yes. maintenance and operating expenditure, increased our capital expenditure, in units. Four projects which are going to be chosen and identified on the local level volunteer organizations. This is the essence of consulting with the people and representatives from private organizations and non-government organizations to be formulated. They have gotten together and they're identifying projects on NEDA but also we have gotten commitment from the non-government organizations going to be used properly. All these budgetary allocations for projects which providing employment, 2) these projects themselves are going to increase the irrigation system, etc. So at the same time that you are creating jobs, you are also
Monsod:
President:	Thank you Winnie. Now let's hear from our Minister of Labor and Employment May I clarify that the Ministry of Labor is not only concerned with labor but jobless. Labor relations includes strikes. You can see from statistics that the number these, 150 had been settled – 67 percent – in such a short period of time. What average rate. In the past years, the strikes would last up to 35 days on the average our POEA or overseas program, during the period since we got into office up to been able to do a lot in this area. In July, as Minister Monsod has revealed, we rural areas. Besides, we will be encouraging cooperatives and giving seed capital Filipino money. We will not be using foreign money. This will be a totally Filipino President:
Sanchez:
President:	I would like to call on Minister Ongpin to tell our people what his ministry has Ongpin:
Ongpin:	I would like to focus on four major areas in the financial arena. Where I feel that explanation. The first major area has to do with the foreign exchange reserves. In the last few months we have built up our reserves from $911 million to, as of last count, $1.5 billion. Not only in terms of the statistics it may not seem like a lot. But an 85% increase is a significant surplus. This came about because many people have been selling their dollar bills. People have been steadily and consistently willing to give up their dollar bills for pesos. The second area has to do with the exchange rate and it is a natural result of the peso being as strong as 22 to 1. Presently it has strengthened to 20.50 to 1 and perhaps more significant when you count the cost of bank charges you will find that the official interbank rate just before the elections, interest rates rose very sharply and have risen to, in the last three months, these rates have been brought down to about half of what they were. The prime clients at 15 per cent and we feel this is a very significant improvement. It is equally important in terms of what we are trying to do in the countryside and in the cities. We have been able to bring down the cost of living. We just returned from Tokyo last week, and we had a meeting with the consuls and the governments of Japan, the US, Germany and Australia, and there we reviewed our progress. We are assured of at least 70% of our target of 1.1 billion dollars. In addition to the standby program with the IMF and complete the package of reforms in the area of the economy. They have pledged to us that they will at that point in time, approach their governments to help us last week when we were in Tokyo is that additional help will be forthcoming to enable the economy to recover and to be able to sustain that recovery so that it is not an aid to be strictly a transitional thing to help us during our crisis or for our budget. All of us don't want to forever be begging. All of us believe that we can become a self-sufficient nation. You have anything to add?

President:
Mitra:	About foreign assistance: many other nations are eager to help us. But such as we have already touched on this in our talks with American representatives of the coconut oil mills. The mills should be in a position of buy copra at high prices. There has been some concern and there has been some progress in this area. I think you have also discussed this. Mrs. President, I think it should be noted that one of the most significant accomplishments of the very much needed structural reforms that are needed for economic recovery in the Philippines before in the previous government is that the policy measures were always taken into account. The net effect would be negative to the economy as a whole. And it is this structural package that is our own, based on what we know is necessary for us to grow and to develop. This it will serve already as the basic framework. It will give the guidelines for the future. We are now going to be all pulling together for the same objective – economic recovery. We should inform the people that when the economic recovery program was announced, it was for all sectors.
Monsod:
Mitra:	Which is the reason it took some time to draw up the program. Whenever I was in the Philippines, I was whole and not sector by sector, unlike what the previous administration did.
President:
Monsod:	Not only the ministries were involved. The private sector was also invited to give their opinions of the different sectors that were affected. Because we are trying to get the people to know by fiat, but rather consultation with the people who have essentially been the victims of the crisis. You know by fiat, but rather consultation with the people who have essentially been the victims of the crisis.
Mitra:	It is also probably important that people will know that while these policies are being implemented, we are forming this economic recovery program which the President announced today.
President:	Well, anyway, before we end this, I would just like again to invite our people to watch those who know they can watch it on television, and to participate in it. Well, you have heard some of our ministers on their work and plans. You realize that we need everybody's cooperation in solving them. Last February we were able to bring down the cost of living. Now and in the forthcoming days we should turn people power in the Philippines. Your government will exert all efforts to solve the problems we face. But I am

PEOPLE POWER THROUGH PRAYER

Millions of Filipinos discovered freedom and truth at the point of despairing of ever crushing the dictatorship under which they had been suffering. People's power did it because there was prayer power behind it.

It was in the solitude of his cell, facing the prospects of summary execution or endless solitary confinement, that Ninoy discovered real freedom.

It was freedom from the weight of his cares and ambitions. In the absolute silence and emptiness of his cell, it was freedom to pray without distraction or interruption. It was the freedom to become like a child again. Absolutely trusting, absolutely believing that God held all the levers of his fate. He knew, because Christ had assured us, that the hairs of his head were numbered, even as no bird fell unnoticed and uncounted. And that certainly he, who had suffered so much, had lost nearly everything, who had prayed so hard and so fervently, had his purpose and would have his redemption.

Ninoy, I am certain, must be smiling today because million of Filipinos had discovered the same freedom and the same truth under the crushing weight of a dictatorship. Filipinos had discovered freedom and the strength to act only when they had lost all hope of easy freedom and effective action. The dictator had betrayed a clear intention to win the election by every means, fair and mostly foul, at his command. It was at this hopeless juncture that the Filipinos felt the weight of helplessness lifted from their breasts and were galvanized into action.

Why is it that the Filipino is moved to action when there is no pragmatic reason for it anymore? Because that is when the Filipino believes in the power of prayers and finds the strength of faith. That is when the Filipino believes with all his or her heart that God will finally work a miracle, in His appointed time, of course, but always through his or her effort. God moves in mysterious ways but always through His people.

When the Filipinos therefore had done everything in their power and brought the dictatorship to its knees they brought out the images of Christ and His loving mother so there would be no mistake to whom the credit should go. For Christ and His mother had moved us mightily, using the strength of our prayers and faith. "People's Power," a phrase that is popular and seems apt, is more the result than the moving force of our revolution. The better term is "Prayer Power," Didn't Saint Paul say: "If Christ is with us, who can prevail against us?"

And so Ninoy is smiling today. For years back, when he sat in his cell, baffled by events, all he could be sure of as he held the rosary, that direct line to our Holy Mother, and through her to Christ, that he was being heard and would be answered. God would let His people go, I can almost hear my husband saying, "I told you so,"

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the launching of a National Reforestation Program

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the launching of a National Reforestation Program

[Delivered on June 6, 1986]

AFTER THE PLUNDER

Under a National Forestation Program, the government intends to establish 600,000 hectares of forest plantations by 1992 and 1.4 million hectares by year 2000.

This land which should be green and lush is brown and dry when seen from an airplane. There was a time when the world looked to us for its timber needs. Southeast Asian timber was known by the name Philippine mahogany. It is well known but it is a fact that wealth of our forests was the foundation of Philippine agriculture, commerce and industry. It is a little better known that the wealth of our forests also served, and continues to serve, as the capital base of many a political fortune. Is it any wonder then that our lands are denuded and our people suffer radical alternations of drought and flood? But we could have had all the gifts that our bountiful forests contain indefinitely, even if we had wasted them, if we had the prudence to provide for the renewal of our forests. It is here that the lack of political will, combined with public corruption, conspired with private sector greed to deprive our nation of one of its most important natural advantages: rich forest lands.

I hope the private sector will cooperate with this government in preserving and renewing our forest resources, but one thing I can assure you, the political will is finally here. This government gives its fullest support to those natural resource managers who share our deep concern about the state of our forests.

We are launching today a National Forestation Program which will be the framework for our forest conservation efforts. We intend, under this program, to establish 600 thousand hectares of forest plantations until 1992, and we intend that by the year 2000 we should have 1.4 million hectares of protected reforested lands.

This objective cannot be achieved by the government alone. We shall need the cooperation and support of Filipinos, acting individually or in concerted efforts through organizations and communities. I think we shall have that cooperation. Our people have come through again and again in more desperate and perilous cases. They will in this case also. We have only to bring to them the problem of our forests and they will respond. I am hereby instructing the Minister of Natural Resources to immediately prepare a plan to increase public awareness of the plight of our forests and the means whereby the government hopes to alleviate it with the public's cooperation.

The old government stripped us of much of our resources and the world is in no position to extend its assistance, despite its liberal compliments. But we have one last resource that nothing and no one can take away from us: and that is the power of the people and the will and confidence of this government to call it forth in the face of any challenge that may arise. To the people of the Ministry of Natural Resources, your frustrations are over. We shall succeed in our objective, you will have the satisfaction of serving a government and a people who will give to the effort to rescue and restore our forest wealth, their all.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the celebration of Independence Day [English]

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the celebration of Independence Day (English Version)

INDEPENDENCE, AT LAST

Free and hopeful sum up the state of the nation as of Independence Day in 1986. Despite lack of funds and firepower, Filipinos were able to stand up to a dictatorship of 14 years and liberate their country once again. Hard resolve and unbelievable courage gave them strength.

A week ago, I delivered my Hundred Days address that described how far we've gone, how much farther we must go, and again reminding you how hard the journey will be. But I can still sum up the state of the nation in two words: free and hopeful. Today we celebrate meaningfully our freedom and independence as we have not been able to for the past 14 years. But what is more important is that today, tomorrow, and in the months and years to come, we shall be able to exercise our freedom and independence as we were never able to. The Philippine independence of 1896 was too brief. Our independence of 1946 was quickly misused and finally betrayed by our leaders. But today we have another chance, our third try, to make something of the freedom and independence for which so many Filipinos have sacrificed and died.

This time independence has come purely by Filipino effort. Not just the effort of a handful of noble and courageous individuals but of a whole people spontaneously rising, and peacefully but inexorably moving to win their freedom. The sad and difficult part, of course, is that independence had to be won from fellow Filipinos. Each of you out there is a hero of this struggle. You are not here to thank anyone but yourselves for what our nation achieved before an astonished and admiring world.

Looking back on the events of February, we wonder now why the ignominy of the Marcos regime had lasted so long. I remember during the dark days of shameful servitude hearing Filipinos say that the only way to be free again is for the Filipinos to be organized, to be armed, to be well-led and well-funded for a frontal confrontation with the dictatorship. You would think that those who were saying this were talking about race, and not about themselves. And so Filipinos waited for this separate race of Filipinos to materialize and liberate them. They did not think that the handful of determined and unflagging oppositionists were this race, not even Ninoy Aquino in his cell. And so they sat and waited and despaired.

Now we are free and the fate of our country is back in our hands. That long-awaited race of Filipino freedom fighters suddenly appeared and faced down the dictatorship. It was even better than we had expected. For what this race lacked in funds and firepower, they more than made up in hard resolve and unbelievable courage. Where did these freedom fighters come from? They came from within ourselves. When Cory Aquino accepted the challenge to fight Marcos for the Presidency, millions of ordinary Filipinos stepped out of their resignation and despair and threw the weight of their energy and numbers behind her. Without any direction from my campaign headquarters, Filipino men, women and children organized themselves, pooled their resources, and campaigned for their Presidency. Their courage, determination and numbers stunned the dictatorship into surrender.

It is this race of Filipinos that now stands here and throughout our land to celebrate independence today. I ask you now not to fall back into complacency and slip back into despair as though the fate of our country were not in your hands, as though you did not collectively have the power to make of it what you want. Every waking moment of your lives can be a reaffirmation of our independence by your continuing determination to be free and responsible for our future and our freedom.

I shall make no policy pronouncements today. No policy or program for recovery that my government can announce today can give you as much hope for the progress of our country than the realization of the power that you who stand before me represent. I said that I can sum up the state of the nation in two words, free and hopeful. We are free because we decided collectively to be free. Nothing could stand in the way of our freedom thereafter. And we have reason to be hopeful because now we realize that united we have the power to accomplish what we wish.

I want today to be a day of celebration. A celebration commemorating the past sacrifices and noble achievements of the Filipino people in the cause of freedom and independence. But more importantly, I want it to be a celebration of the People Power, power that can assure that freedom and independence for all time. To celebrate that power, I do not want you to look in the direction of this grandstand but into yourselves. Because that is where it lies. Let us go from here therefore and celebrate among ourselves our independence.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the League of Mayors and Governors

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the League of Mayors and Governors

[Delivered on June 13, 1986]

BETTER THAN GUNS, GOONS AND GOLD

A true leader is one who can solve the problems of his constituency without having to run to Malacanang for even the minor problems. We should try and reconcile with our enemies so we can go on with rebuilding the country.

Actually I had a prepared speech for today but my good friend and Executive Secretary Joker Arroyo said: “Huwag ka nang magbasa ng iyong speech. (Don’t read your speech anymore) Just talk to them from the heart.” And that is what I want to do.

Many times I have been asked, Cory, what is the problem with Minister Nene Pimentel? Why does he appoint I such terrible OICs? And I said, you know that is a false I report because really, what we read about are those OICs I who are not doing well. Unfortunately, the OICs who are I really performing very well do not make news, we do not read or hear about them. But I know that many of you are giving your best efforts and certainly I appreciate those of you who really are giving your all. For those of you who are still taking it rather easy, now is the time to show our countrymen that we indeed deserve our positions and we do aim to perform better than our predecessors.

I think that most of us are concerned about the coming elections. And perhaps today I would like to remind all of you — please don’t come to me and tell me when election time comes around, “alam mo Cory, wala kaming pera, wala kaming guns, wala kaming goons.” (You know Cory, we don’t have money, guns or goons.)

I’d like to remind all of you that in our biggest battle of February, I had very little money. In fact I was very apologetic to most of you because I could only afford to give so I much. Definitely I had no guns, I had no goons, but I know I had something more important than any of these three. And that was the faith and confidence of the Filipino people. And because of this, I am now your President. I think the same should work for you. You should all try your very best to gain support of our people because that is what matters in the long run.

Let us forget about the past practices of doing everything, especially during elections, with just money. Of course I realize money is also a very important ingredient in that nobody has ever won with just talk. But it is very important for us now. We are being given the opportunity to change things. We should in spite not only ourselves but our people to bring about the changes that we have long been clamoring for.

So when I was asked if I could see you, and if you could come to Malacanang, I said I really preferred going out of Malacanang. It is a beautiful place but I feel I should not isolate myself from the people. This is why every opportunity I get I try to be with the people. I thank all of you who were present yesterday because I think we needed yesterday to remind us that it is so important for us to unite, to be one, to make this country of ours the great country we want it to be.

Please try to forget minor differences, we have to work with almost everybody. I realize that we still have political enemies but as much as possible, let us try to reconcile. Let us forget our minor differences.

I have asked General Ramos to help out in those areas where there are still pockets of disturbance. In fact, a few days ago, I was in conference with two protagonists of Sulu and I am very happy to inform you that I think we solved their problem. And I am very grateful to all of you here who did not come to me with all their problems. I really appreciate leaders who are able to solve their problems without major help from the national government. I feel this is the aura of a true leader; to be able to thresh out differences without having to complain to higher-ups. So again, I wish you the very best and you do have my support when election time comes around. Those who have performed very creditably these past few months are specially assured of my help.

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Philippine Business for Social Progress

[Delivered on June 16, 1986]

GETTING BACK TO BUSINESS

The broad objectives of the Aquino government are to create jobs, alleviate mass poverty and distribute the fruits of development equitably. Target beneficiaries of an agriculture development program comprise 70% of the population.

I am pleased to address today an audience of smart businessmen. I say smart because you have long known what many businessmen outside the PBSP still fail to see. And that is: Where true and dependable profits lie. These are not found in the company vault nor in the large and immediate returns on your investments, but in the improving welfare of Filipinos – in the jobs you create and in the families that are thereby cared for. In general terms, in a developing Philippine economy and a progressively just and stable society. In short, in helping the goose grow strong and healthy that lays the golden eggs. By “Goose” I mean a high motivated, skilled and justly compensated Philippine workforce that is also the consumer base of a vigorous Philippine economy.

The biggest mistake of my predecessor and his business associates was that they were smart but shortsighted. They accumulated great wealth. They made fantastic profits on a slim investment, meaning to say on the pure exercise of their unlimited power to use public funds for private ends. But in the end, their coffers were empty, and I mean this even before the PCGG came around. There were no reserves of public goodwill to draw from. No accumulation of gratitude, respect and trust to sustain them in leaner times. No more consumers to buy the old lines, the recycled promises, the empty programs for change. In the end, there was only a nation consumed – by poverty, hopelessness and rage. What did it all profit them in the end?

As I said, I speak to smarter men. For as early as 1970 you, the leaders of the business community, saw that no enterprise could possibly thrive above and apart from the social environment. When you formed the Philippine Business for Social Progress Foundation 16 years ago, there seemed hope for the progress and justice you envisioned. Unfortunately, your efforts were set back by 14 years of an unbelievably corrupt and inefficient government, a dictatorship in fact with a will to economic plunder rather than progress.

But all that is in the past. Your vision, which requires the cooperation and parallel efforts of government, is shared by me.

Our broad objectives, as you know, are the alleviation of mass poverty, the generation of employment, and the equitable sharing of the fruits of development. Toward these ends, we have chosen to direct our resources and energies into agricultural development. The target beneficiaries are the 70% of our people who live in the countryside.

I understand that your 5-year PBSP work program for 1986-91 is set along parallel lines. It is your aim to regionalize your development efforts to benefit specific poverty groups in priority provinces. This is the approach I am most comfortable with: immediate attention to pressing problems. Long-term programs that by-pass immediate problems for a total solution far into the future are well and good. But for the solution of some problems there can be no delay in conscience. Joblessness and poverty are some of them, especially and inexcusably in our potentially rich countryside. With proper coordination and cooperation between government and the PBSP, total countryside development becomes even more feasible.

The knowledge that the PBSP is squarely behind our economic recovery program is reassuring indeed. With business joining us in the task of reconstruction, the combined effort will be invested with the efficiency, pragmatism and energy that are the hallmarks of private enterprise.

Because a percentage of your profits are regularly and voluntarily set aside for your socio-economic programs, I know your commitment to a better future for the country and a better life for the Filipino goes far beyond mere posturing and words.

We would like to thank you, and commemorate with you, 16 years of partnership with the Filipino people in the cause of economic progress and social justice. The government now joins your partnership and will be relying heavily on it in the months and years to come.

The country, you might say, is back in business. You have been indispensable partners in the national venture. With your continued support, we know that we can and shall be viable.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 79th Anniversary of the University of the Philippines

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the 79th Anniversary of the University of the Philippines

CROSSING OVER FROM THE ESTABLISHMENT

The Aquino administration pledges to listen and respond to both condemnation and constructive criticism from academe, traditional nemesis of Establishment.

While gearing to speak before you today, I conditioned myself to face and accept a simple fact. I am now the President of the Philippines. I am no longer leading a ragtag revolution against the powers that be. Mine is no longer that small insistent voice of the opposition that was drowned out by the drumbeating of the tyrant's propaganda machine, until that voice grew into the roar of millions. I am no longer the underdog. I am, by a miracle that still amazes me as the work of Providence never fails to, at the top of the power structure.

On my way here, I felt saddened somewhat by these facts. Now I will no longer enjoy the same audience I used to at the University of the Philippines. I hope against hope, but somehow I know the rapport will not be the same. For I have done what no one who wishes to remain popular with the U.P. ever does – cross over to the establishment. But that, I suppose is the hazard faced by anyone who presumes to lead a popular revolution. There is possibility you might win. Then you become the status quo and fair game for the activists of the U.P.

That is the venerable tradition, the life force, the saving grace that is our irrepressible University of the Philippines. The U.P. has always been the problem no past President of our land has managed to solve. Not even its illustrious sons have escaped vilification.

In this, I guess, the U.P. simply remains true to its character, to the mission imparted to it at its birth. The U.P. was founded 79 years ago to demolish the intellectual underpinnings of one social order and establish another. It's first graduates were trained to occupy influential positions in government and society. They were to sweep the landscape clean of counterproductive colonial values and influences. Spanish elitism and traditionalism were the very first targets of the very first activists of the campus.

Finally, a new government and social philosophy based on American republicanism successfully replaced the old order. This was no sooner accomplished than the U.P. began to see and denounce the flaws in the new dispensation. Down through the years of the young Republic, the criticism and the prescriptions took on an increasingly radical direction, reaching a peak in the Marcos years. Protracted struggle and violent overthrow were offered as the only effective remedy to an exploitative and self-serving regime.

But, in the latter years, I thought I detected in the U.P. a no less powerful alternative to tyranny and silent suffering quietly sweeping the campus, a breath of the fresh wind of non-violent change that blew into the sails of our Yellow Revolution. Students saw a viable alternative to lives of quiet desperation or violent outpouring in the quiet determination of our yellow revolutionaries.

Quite a few clichés of this University were overturned by that revolution. Clerico-fascists turned out to be clerico-revolutionaries. The military-business complex turned out to be a conspiracy for democracy. The passive, hopelessly a political Silent Majority turned out in the millions to protect the ballot and then to protect the rebellion. And that simple housewife "who used to serve us coffee," as some of Ninoy's friends who are now serving my government used to say (and they are going to be sorry), turned out to be the leader and wielder of the power of the people. These unexpected turns of events should diminish in some measure the arrogance of academe.

And now, what lies ahead for the U.P.? What judgments will it make, what pressures will it exert on our fledgling government that you now view as the establishment? I cannot presume that my administration, unlike past administrations, will escape the harshest scrutiny in your classrooms. But just as I had convinced myself to accept that I am now on the establishment side (at least it is one that endeavors to be just), I have also prepared myself to listen and be responsive to criticism. For as history has shown, the shove and pull of ideas emanating from U.P. has served not to upset but to balance government.

And so now I must return to the halls of power. There, where we plan and strategize a new era of progress for the Philippines, we are far from the upheavals of the U.P. campus; but we are not insulated. Our windows are open to catch each fresh wind that carries both condemnation and constructive suggestion from the corridors of the U.P.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the International Reunion of the Movement for a Free Philippines

Speech

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the International Reunion of the Movement for a Free Philippines

WELCOME HOME, EXILES

The job cut out for the freedom fighters, and these include those who chose exile rather than live under the tyranny of Marcos, is to provide for a decent life, a better future for millions of Filipinos; to get the economy back in shape and rebuild a country left in moral and political ruins.

There are three things happening today that my husband Ninoy would not have thought possible:

First, that it is I, and not he, who is doing most of the talking.

Second, that we should actually be concerned about Marcos and Imelda fading from the public memory.

And third, that the Movement for a Free Philippines should be holding its international convention right here, in the midst of what was once the land of bondage, and only three years after he bid you goodbye in the United States.

Ninoy must share our astonishment. The Philippines is exhilaratingly and unquestionably free. The cause, the burning dream of your movement has finally been realized. And sooner and more painlessly than we all thought possible.

In the midst of our waiting and our struggle, I thought our children would have to carry the torch after us. Who would have imagined God would snap His fingers and we would be free. But looking back now, I can see how God prepared our snap liberation through many years, many people and groups, and out of a variety of circumstances. And one of His very special instruments, used quite skillfully and potently outside of Philippines, was the Movement for a Free Philippines.

Marcos liked to call your members “steak commandoes.” I know that not many of you could afford steaks in exile. What Marcos did not realize, or what he could never admit, is that there in the land of steak, it was he who was being turned slowly in a spit. Thanks to the MFP commandoes, world opinion was slowly turned against him and a new foreign policy towards the Philippines was taking shape.

I am more fortunate than most Filipinos in that I was able to watch your group at work. In the United States, I became well acquainted with the ideas, the campaigns, the organized and widespread network of the MFP. I saw how Filipinos in exile, my friend Raul Manglapus and other exiles, managed to find the time, the funds, and the energy (and that is never easy in the mad rush for a living in Europe and America), to lobby for the Philippine cause. I also saw native Americans, Canadians, Europeans, many of whom had never seen the Philippines, embrace the concerns of our land as wholeheartedly and intensely as if they were their own. I saw all these take place, and I can never forget what; it was like and how admirable you were to keep trying, in spite of the cynicism and the mockery. In behalf of Filipinos who were not privy to your efforts, but who now enjoy the benefits of what you worked so tirelessly for, I thank you. We shall always be grateful.

And now, what does an organization like the Movement for a Free Philippines do now that the Philippines is free? Time magazine, in one February issue, commented that the Philippines’ freedom fighters now face the hard part (obviously, the writers never experienced exile), the nitty-gritty phase of their cause. And that, as you all know, is to provide a decent life, a better future for millions of poor and hungry Filipinos. It is a struggle to get our economy back in shape, to rebuild from the moral and political ruins left by “that man” who forced many of you into exile.

I understand that the MFP has just launched the Philippine Reconstruction Corps; I also understand that your group will be lobbying or personally participating in a program to transfer technology, resources and investments from abroad to the Philippines. I have also been told that some of your members will uproot themselves from comfortable residences and careers abroad to settle here and pioneer in the work of reconstruction. The country is grateful.

The work of the Movement for a Free Philippines, if I may presume to interpret your agenda, has really just begun.

As in the years past, our country, though separated from your places of work by oceans, is greatly dependent on the continuance of your zeal and vision. And as before, the contributions you make are purely voluntary. You didn’t have to help, it was enough that you paid the price of exile, but you did, anyway. And the results, I know, will be the same. It didn’t look as though we could make it, but we did. The world hasn’t seen the last of the miracles made in the Philippines. And that, through the grace of God, and again with much help from the MFP.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the ASEAN Conference

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the ASEAN Conference

[Delivered on June 23, 1986]

NEW
FOR MIRACLES

ASEAN

STRATEGY:

PROVISION

The seeming indifference of the rich countries to our economic situation should have motivated ASEAN countries to look into the potential of the Region for other ways to achieve sustained progress, President Aquino tells ASEAN foreign ministers at their meeting in Manila. It is time to re-examine the ASEAN position, she says. While ASEAN has handled several international crises admirably, it has not done much in the field of economic cooperation and progress.

On behalf of the new government and the people of the Philippines, I wish to extend my warmest welcome to the Foreign Ministers and Delegates attending the 19th ASEAN Ministerial Meeting.

I have been looking forward to this occasion because it is my first opportunity to reaffirm the commitment of the Philippines to ASEAN.

Through our collective efforts, ASEAN has gained recognition as one of the more successful regional organizations in the world. This is clearly shown by the keen interest that the rest of the world has shown in developing ties with us. However, lest we be led to believe that ours is a total success story, let me remind you that we still share problems which remain unresolved and threaten to frustrate the tremendous promise of this region. These problems equally threaten to render meaningless our continued association. Even as we meet today, we face the same obstacles to peace and progress which we have signally endeavored to overcome.

The continuing occupation of Kampuchea and the irresolution of the issues that prevent a unified and viable government in that sad country, threaten the balance of power in our region, cast a dark shadow on the world's perception of its stability, and constrain the progress that could realize the full promise of the Region. Rather than be the vortex of instability, ASEAN should be the stabilizing factor in what, I suppose, is the unavoidable competition of great powers. If ASEAN could stand tall as an example of a regional force for reason in international relations, humanity in political order, and progress in its economies, it could exercise a salutary influence over the rest of the world.

The economic picture likewise has not been as rosy as it used to be. Of course, it never was for the Philippines under the previous government. ASEAN's trade performance in recent years has become more and more dismal. The global recession that hit the developed countries has wrought havoc on our export-oriented economies. To reduce their trade deficit, our industrialized partners – have restricted access of our exports to their markets. Contracting demand for manufactured goods forced foreign companies to scale down their operations and recall their investments from our shores. The world glut in oil, sugar, metal and semi-processed goods has depressed our primary and secondary industries. All these factors combined to stunt the economic growth of the Region for the past several years.

It is lamentable that, despite our experience, we continue to look outwards from the Region for the revival of its progress and the fulfillment of its promise. My own country is learning the hard way that strength must be built first from within. First, among the vast majority of our people locked in poverty and a retrogressive agriculture. Then, to the second circle of increasingly capital-intensive industries. And then outwards to the rest of the world. I should like the next stage to be within the ASEAN, among the nations that have a common security interest with us, and that should have, by virtue of proximity and colonial experience, many points of economic interest. This is how ASEAN should have evolved: by native self-reliance, expanding to regional interdependence until we had collectively achieved a level of strength sufficient to take on the vagaries of the international developed economy.

It is not malevolence that moves the developed economies to act in derogation of our interests, but their own survival, charity begins at home. Let us take that message to heart. The seeming indifference of the rich countries to our economic situation should have been motivation enough for ASEAN countries to take the initiative in looking into the potential of the Region for alternative paths to sustained progress.

After 19 years of existence, ASEAN should already be evaluating the impact of regional economic cooperation instead of endlessly discussing how to get it off the ground.

Distinguished Delegates, it is time to re-examine our present position, consider how far short of ASEAN's goals we have fallen, and renew more firmly our commitment to achieve those goals. ASEAN is not without achievements. It handled several international crises admirably, crisis of the kind that plunged Western countries into war. But we were established for economic cooperation and progress. What we have accomplished in these last respects is more kindly left unmentioned. I think the time is well past for talking.

I look forward to the summit meeting that will be held in Manila next year. This will be an opportunity for me to meet all my distinguished counterparts in ASEAN. It should also be the occasion when ASEAN makes the hard and fast decisions to reach the objectives of its creation. The only way I can explain the delay and hesitations of the past is that they are rooted in fear of failure. But why should it be so? Who would have thought that the Filipinos would succeed in restoring democracy by boycotting beverages and newspapers, calling out a military revolt that numbered a handful, and strolling along an avenue-but in the millions? A miracle? Yes, indeed, as I believe all faiths that hold sway over the hearts of ASEAN peoples make provisions for miracles.

At the anniversary of the Philippine Navy

KEEPING OF COOPERATION

As Commander-in-Chief of the New Armed Forces of the Philippines, President Aquino tells the members of the Philippine Navy that they were no less a part of the people's victory over dictatorship in the February 22-25 revolution, as the other branches of the AFP. She exhorts them to keep alive the new spirit of cooperation and trust between armed forces and people which is a key element of national recovery.

As Commander-in-Chief of the New Armed Forces of the Philippines, I have addressed nearly all the commands that make up our nation's defense. In all these encounters, I made a general call for unity and loyalty, for discipline and dedication, for a total commitment to keeping the peace, I have stated again and again the nature of the mandate the people gave us in the armed forces of the Republic. And that is to uphold and protect the democracy they fought so hard and with such distinction to restore.

I have spoken before our soldiers in the Academy, and in the military camps in the cities and in the countryside, I have asked our land-based troops to continue the process of reform in their ranks. I have asked our generals to be as vigilant of the well-being of the people as they are of the honor of the corps. I have asked them to ensure that their men are well-led, well-armed, well-provisioned and properly motivated. The best form of "welfare" for the troops, a great general said, is first-class training. My government is exerting itself to make all this possible, particularly in the area of increasing hazard pay. We are poor but we are trying. I have asked our men in uniform to participate in the task of national reconstruction, to employ their energies and skills in maintaining and upgrading the infrastructure of the countryside and other public service facilities. While we try to obtain adequate means to carry out this mission, I have asked them to keep alive the new spirit of cooperation and trust between armed forces and people that is a key element of national recovery. This requires no machinery or expense; only the spirit that propelled the revolution and won us back our democracy. To that end, I have asked them to maintain their rapport with the civilian populace, to inspire respect rather than fear, confidence rather than mistrust.

I have spoken before our soldiers in the Air Force, I have asked for their continuing diligence in protecting the integrity of our skies as well as assuring from above the peace of our terrain. I urged them to display the same kind of heroism and patriotism they manifested to our people during the revolution. At the critical hour, they must always heed the voice of democracy and not the self-serving orders of those who seek to subvert it. Though the skies be their domain, their feet must be firmly planted on the ground below, in the foundations of our new democratic society.

And now, at last, I address the reformed forces of our Navy. I now speak before that section of our defensive shield that is rarely seen by the majority of our people. At the height of our people's revolt the main battlefield was at EDSA. There on that avenue, the forces for reform found effective shield and potent weapon in people's power. And in the skies above the camps, air force pilots sent by the enemy heard above the roar of their engines the voice of democracy present, or at least not obviously so, at the site of the revolution. Yet that powerful and potent arm of the military had also taken sides. Though your battle stations were far offshore, you too heeded the call for democratic restoration. At the height of the conflict, your guns may have been primed and your Marines were among the forces sent to quell the rebellion, and yet not a shot was fired, not a man moved to carry out the directions of the tyrant. You were no less a part of our people's victory. That almighty spirit that moves us all, had also moved within the ranks of the men at sea. In retrospect, we can see that the critical shift in the military's allegiance, away from the falsely proclaimed president to the duly elected government of the people, took many forms. Ramos and Enrile, by their heroic and defiant stand, blazed the trail to democracy for the military to follow. But just as the military revolt needed the enfolding protection of the people to survive, so democracy ultimately depended on the desistance of the loyalist troops to triumph. In the end, the loyalists had proven loyal: to their consciences and to the people.

I want to take this opportunity to tell all the officers and men who have been tagged “loyalists” that I understand you. I hereby strike the pejorative connotation of the word “loyalist” from the lexicon of the armed forces. You and I, all of us in the New Armed Forces, are all loyalists and all rebels. Loyal to the democratic republic and rebels against any who seek to subvert it. The Navy has therefore appropriately entitled its anniversary commemoration, “Hukbong Dagat, Kabalikat sa Pagkakaisa.” This theme sums up my message today, we are one in the armed forces in the defense of our country and our liberty.

Long before the February Revolution, the Marines of the Navy showed what civil-military relations should be and can be. I commend the Navy highly for this achievement even while the dictatorship was in place. For you, there was no excuse for not living up to the ideal of the Filipino

A distinguished and respected friend, a Marine, gave me this advice: Take care of your marines, and they will take care of you. I have taken his words to heart.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 13th Anniversary of the Development Academy of the Philippines

SETTING POLICIES AND SYSTEMS FOR NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

President Aquino points out four areas of concern for the Development Academy of the Philippines: 1) public policy that meets needs of the people; 2) empowerment of the people to enable them to gain control of their lives; 3) public ethics or good government to restore true democracy, and 4) public management based on the policy that government should manage only what it can manage well and what the private sector cannot do as well or better.

I am told that the main weakness of the Development Academy of the Philippines is that it does not receive a budgetary allocation from the government. It must earn its keep by undertaking programs and projects for government as well as private institutions. Like any business, it must keep its customers satisfied; but unlike most businesses, it has a very limited, and in the case of the government, a very niggardly market. The lack of money has been the recurring threat to the survival of the Academy. As head of the post-Marcos government, let me say to you, Welcome to the Club. If you are expecting a favorable change in fiscal policy toward the Academy, let me also say, don't hold your breath. Rather than offer you financial support, I give you instead the consolation of pointing out that your chief weakness may well have been the source of your greatest strength. Because you have stoutly resisted the financial comfort of a government subsidy, you have remained relatively free to carry out your mandate of supporting and nurturing the developmental forces at work in the nation, and of choosing your involvements according to the broad, disinterested and forward-looking criteria of a professional and multidisciplinary staff.

In retrospect, the Academy remains with us today because its institutional design — strangely enough considering its Martial Law origin — allowed the Academy personnel the academic freedom to discuss and debate an unlimited variety of approaches to the nation's problems. Although the Academy has also had a colorful history of strong and divergent ideological convictions, this appears to have in no way detracted from the integrity of its intellectual productions. Ideology has not distorted so much as increased the perspectives from which problems have been handled. In that regard, it is, like my cabinet, an interesting if often misunderstood body. I am as comfortable with the DAP as I am comfortable with democracy.

The DAP, as I happily remarked earlier, has always had a distant attitude to government support. Instead it feeds on challenges. In that regard, I have not come empty-handed.

As you all know, we have really just begun the revolution; the campaign and the rebellion were just the start. As the revolution shifts to the implementation of the vision that fired it, the government must now deal with nitty-gritty of the plans and programs to realize that vision. This is where, oftentimes, the resolve falters, and the vision is in danger of being lost or worse discredited.

The Academy is one of the few government institutions specifically mandated to sustain and guide the forces of development in our country. There are four areas of concern to which I should like the Academy to devote its attention.

The first is the area of Public Policy. Despite the continuing enthusiasm of our people about the new government, in the end its success will depend on our ability to formulate and implement the policies that squarely meet the needs of our people. Strangely enough, I am not deluged with policy proposals. Instead, I am surprised at the dearth of approaches to our problems, and most of these proposals are either tried and tested failures, or patently impossible to adopt in the light of our values, the balance of forces in our society, and our place in the geopolitical scheme of things. I should like to see, not only more creative and socially sensitive approaches to our social and economic problems, but also systematic studies and discussions of these approaches. In that way their implications can be fully assessed and weighed against one another. Only by allowing open and free discussion of public issues and policy proposals can we prevent isolated and rightly unpopular views from becoming final policy and a national calamity.

A second area of concern is the Empowerment of the People. In the February Revolution we experienced a wide and spontaneous display of outrage against the abuses of authoritarian government. People Power toppled a dictatorship. But today that power must still pay for the crimes and waste of the dictatorship. What we need to do to avoid a repetition of our recent tragic experience with uncontrolled government is to increase the control of the people over their lives — over the resources they depend on — in order that they can truly be free to act in their enlightened self-interest. And not only free to act, but to act effectively. That means the organized power of the small. The common people must be empowered and the government must help them be so. The Academy can help design effective and efficient ways of creating and strengthening rural and community organizations.

Empowerment also involves giving effective voice to the people. We must create mechanisms for continuously hearing and heeding the voice of the people. We must regularly take the public pulse through reliable surveys, such as the snap surveys the Academy has been undertaking since the Revolution.

It is not only the government that should know the public pulse, but the people themselves must be made aware of their collective opinion on important public issues, so that they can draw strength from the knowledge and find the resolve to act on these issues. The durability of the dictatorship rested on its success in keeping the people ignorant of their common opinion and collective strength on any issue.

Empowerment involves not only the collection of feedback from the people, but also the provision of feedforward, of information on what the government is doing through its hundreds of agencies and instrumentalities, and through its thousands of programs, projects and activities. The people must know what the commitments of government are; so that they will be empowered, and thereby emboldened, to regularly demand these of government. The aim of feedforward mechanisms is to eventually abolish the role of intermediaries, of “fixers” really, between people and government, and thereby make it truly their own. The Academy is in the best position to pioneer in this effort.

The third area of concern is Public Ethics or Good Government. The people launched a revolution to restore true democracy. By democracy they meant more than the right to periodically elect crooks and suffer their tenure until the next election, but the right to have honest government; preferably also wise, but at the very least “good” government. This government is, if nothing else, honest; and I am going to make sure it stays that way if I have to fire everyone to do it.

I created the Commission on Good Government to retrieve the wealth that government officials and government-connected individuals stole from the people. But that is not enough. We must go beyond restitution and punishment to prevention. The undoubted satisfaction that either will bring cannot offset the irretrievable waste of precious and limited resources and the damage to public faith in government. Nothing the PCGG can do will erase the $26 billion that was misspent or stolen and that we must pay.

We need to study in a systematic way the problem of graft and corruption that has been the way of government in the Philippines. And I am not impressed with the rationalization that that is the way of government in many countries of the world. If that is so, that is the problem the concern of another workhorse of the new government, the Presidential Commission on Government Reorganization under the able leadership of Minister Villafuerte, whose pragmatic creativity has impressed his colleagues in the Cabinet, myself included. The government bureaucracy must be organized to achieve results, not only to undertake activities. The flurry of purposive action in the past government of geniuses, so-called, is still burning a hole in our pockets and our memories. They generated a lot of heat, at great cost, but surprisingly little light. And no wonder, we now find out. What they were really doing needed the cover of darkness.

A fourth area of concern is public management.

The DAP has a long experience in studying the problems of government organization. Its inputs will be more than welcomed by the Reorganization Commission. My own input is simply this, government should manage only what it can manage well, and what the private sector cannot do as well or better.

If this has not satisfied your appetite for challenges, be sure that I have a host of others that will equally fire of their peoples; elimination of graft and corruption in our governments is our commitment.

We are racing against time. As you know, there are rumors already circulating of graft and corruption resurfacing in this government. I must say that those we have looked into appear to have been prompted less by well-grounded suspicion as by the burning desire of the informant to replace the accused as OIC. But I know the virus is there waiting for complacency to set in so it can break out again in epidemic proportions.

I have said that setting the example is a necessary measure to eliminate corruption. But it is not sufficient. The example of national leadership is not enough. It must be imitated throughout the bureaucracy of national and local governments, and by the people themselves in their dealings with government. If moral exhortation will not do, then we must impress on all and sundry that the public official whose favor you buy today will be bought tomorrow against you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the National Defense College Graduation

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the National Defense College Graduation

[Delivered on July 3, 1986]

A STRATEGY FOR THE FUTURE: WAGING PEACE

As the first class to graduate under her government, the members of the 20th regular course of the National Defense College are congratulated for pledging support to the February 22 revolution. People rallying to the defense of the armed forces in the events of that month was a moving experience that should give the military in turn a sense of duty to protect them.

First, may I congratulate the members of the 20th Regular Course of the National Defense College of the Philippines. I understand that this year's graduating class suffered is the greatest attrition in the history of the course. And I am relieved to learn that this is not for any other reason than because of the course of studies has been the toughest ever. At any rate, this class is distinguished for registering several "firsts"

It is the first class to graduate under my government. More importantly, it is the first NDCP class that pledged support for the February 22 Revolution that toppled the dictatorship. And it is the first NDCP class to have among its distinguished graduates a former member of Parliament (and an oppositionist at the time) and now Deputy Minister of National Defense. I refer to Deputy Minister Wilsom Gamboa, whose participation in the course signals an earnest effort on the part of government to appreciate the imperatives of national security. His participation also underscores the broader concept of national security that holds sway under this government.

For national security, in the traditional view, was synonymous with national defense, with public safety, with the preservation and re-imposition of order. The February Revolution has enriched that traditional view to include as the first order of priority the preservation of the rights and liberties that our people restored in such a distinctive and distinguished fashion. That revolution has imposed a double duty and an onerous burden on those charged with the defense of our republic. Not only must we now defend that republic by martial force but also with the same militant regard for the rights and liberties it now embodies and in the unique conciliatory spirit in which they were restored. In short, our New Armed Forces must now wage peace.

All of you who graduate from the National Defense College at this time are particularly well-trained to conduct this unique campaign. For you have had the opportunity to pursue and understand your course, not only within the walls of Fort Bonifacio, but right outside of it. In fact, the most valuable lessons in national security and defense were impressed upon you, not only within the classrooms of this College, but in the crash course held at EDSA last February.

There, at the height of our snap revolution, both civilians and our men in uniform learned the higher, more sophisticated techniques of keeping the peace, maintaining order, and securing, not only the interests of government, but the collective well-being of all Filipinos as well. National security, we all learned, was not a matter of keeping the people at arms — or armalites' length — or of erecting higher walls or denser barbed wire fences between government and people; but of bringing the people in — to join us in a united effort to protect the liberties and institutions we all cherish. Effective national security is not a task that is adversarial in policy or practice, but rather, cooperative. Security forces do not protect operations or establishment from the people, but for and in behalf of the people. And better still with the people. It is a difference in military technique, but in attitude; an attitude grounded in the moral and common sense that effective defense, like successful politics, is addition. That superiority in numbers will carry the day anytime. That if the people are with us, nothing can prevail against us.

When an army of civilians surrounded the two military camps, it became evident to every soldier within, that there could be no better assurance of his personal survival and the effective discharge of his mission, than the combined force of army and people cemented by mutual trust and fired by a common patriotism and devotion to liberty and justice.

I know that I am telling you nothing new. As I said, the need for harmony between the civilian populace and the military is one that you have learned well in theory, and observed in dramatic application on the streets during the revolution. But as you take on new offices and responsibilities, ascend in rank, acquire commands and take to the field, the values and attitudes that you learned in this College and from recent political events may start to fade from memory. That would be a tragedy. Do not let it happen. Keep ever in mind that the armed forces must be deeply rooted in the trust and cooperation of the people. The mistake of your former Commander-in-Chief was to think that an army could be a wooden club in his hand. Cut off from the sources that sustain it, the armed forces would snap like a piece of dry wood under the pressure of adversity.

And finally, the events of February do not just teach a new and effective form of national defense. The rally of the people to the defense of the armed forces was a moving experience that should give you an indelible sense of duty to protect them in turn. To rephrase a military saying. Take care of the people and they will take care of you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Seminar on Peace and Order Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Seminar on Peace and Order

[Delivered on July 3, 1986]

NOT A THRONE OF BAYONETS

The Second Principle of counter-insurgency states that “The government must function in accordance with law.” Where this principle was observed, as in Malaya, insurgency was defeated. The principle is clear, we must be better than our enemies. We cannot fight a good cause with evil weapons.

I am happy and reassured to see this particular mix of participants in this seminar on peace and order. I say reassured because I notice the presence not only of members of our military and the national police, but also of our ministers, acting governors, mayors and other OICs in government.

If peace and order were merely a military problem, the task of government would be easier by a significant percentage, in one sense, but also desperate and tragic in another. We would need only to fan out our divisions in the fields and cities of our country and leave the matter to the courage of our soldiers and the tenacity and generalship of our commanders. But, thank God, things have not come to such a pass. For if they had, then the fate of this government and our democracy would be decided on a throw of the dice. It would mean that the insurgency had attained the confidence to meet our forces head-on, or, in another area, criminality has increased to the level of anarchy and the social order has broken down. It would mean that military might alone would decide the outcome. If it comes to that, then all is lost. For a throne of bayonets cannot serve comfortably as the seat of government.

But things have not come to such a pass.

Our rights and liberties have been restored and a government is in place that is bent on justice for all. True, there are places where the insurgent forces continue to hold their own.

But the people, whose indifference if not hostility to the former government had sustained the insurgent forces, have found new hope in the new government. We have a chance to start afresh. And we shall be working with a people who have reaffirmed their faith in the ways of peace and the promise of democracy. It was, in fact, and as we all know, the direct intervention of the Filipino people that restored democracy in our land. Contrary to what some quarters say, we don't have to sell the idea of democracy to the Filipinos. I can tell you now that nothing hurt my image more during the campaign among our people, especially in the rural areas, than the false charge that I am a Communist. Nine-tenths of the battle for the hearts and minds of the Filipinos has been won, and won by the Filipinos themselves. With these advantages, it is unforgivable to fail. We can fail only by betraying the principles of democracy, justice, human rights, and the rule of law for which our people fought with such distinction. I will not let that happen. I stand at the head of this government that was installed by the people, for the people, to make sure that the faith they have reposed in it is not betrayed.

The military and the national police forces, the local governments, the agencies and instrumentalities of government will defend this democracy, and defend it in a way that enlarges rather than diminishes its meaningfulness for the people. When we say that we shall fight to preserve our dignity as free men, it will be done in a way that will not detract from that dignity or reduce that freedom. This government will not tolerate the practice of torture. That hideous practice has no place in a democracy and no justification in the accepted wisdom on counter-insurgency. You know the classics in that field better than I. Minister Enrile, who advises me on the insurgency, gave me a book on the subject in which I read the following passage:

The Second Principle (of counter-insurgency) states that “The government must function in accordance with law.”

”There is a very strong temptation in dealing both with terrorism and with guerrilla actions for government forces to act outside the law, the excuses being that the processes of law are too cumbersome, that the normal safeguards in the law for the individual are not designed for an insurgency, and that a terrorist deserves to be treated as an outlaw anyway. Not only is this morally wrong, but, over a period, it will create more practical difficulties for a government than it solves. A government which does not act in accordance with the law forfeits the right to be called a government and cannot then expect its people to obey the law.”

Where this principle was observed, as in Malaya, insurgency was defeated. The principle is clear, we must be better than our enemies. We cannot fight a good cause with evil weapons.

We have a chance to start afresh. A chance like this may not come again. It is imperative therefore that we think the matter through carefully before we address the insurgency problem again. Let us review the record for the errors and abuses that fueled rather than finished off the insurgency, as they were perversely meant to. This seminar is a good and substantial beginning.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Catholic Educators Association of the Philippines' Annual Convention

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Catholic Educators Association of the Philippines' Annual Convention

[Delivered in Cagayan de Oro City, July 6, 1986]

QUALITY OF EDUCATION: A PRIMARY CONCERN

President Aquino assures the Catholic Educational Association of the Philippines that quality education of our youth is a primary concern of Government. While the main burden of educating the youth should be borne by Government, private sector has earned a substantial part of the burden. She announced implementation this year of the service contract scheme whereby students who cannot be accommodated in government schools may be enrolled in private schools.

I wish to thank Mr. Javier for now making me officially a member of the Jesuit Mafia. I wish to add that I was joking, before things get out of hand. I am very glad that the Catholic Educational Association of the Philippines, chose to hold its annual convention here in Cagayan de Oro City. You have allowed me to pay a second visit to the south and to reaffirm a central policy of our national government. Early in my term, I pledged to decentralize the operations of my administration to reach out to the provinces and to formulate the policies in collaboration with the people, who will be most affected by them. I also promised to focus visual attention to the South to do my best to heal the wounds inflicted by decades of economic exploitation, political neglect and cultural misunderstanding.

Thanks to the CEAP, we are here in another key Southern city opening direct lines of dialogue with the population and able to discuss our national program of recovery in terms that are relevant and practical to the people of this region.

The government's concern and intent to reach to the grassroots is also shared by the CEAP. You comprise a network of 1,200 schools distributed in key municipalities throughout the archipelago, though your central seat of operations is in the City of Manila, your program and policies are made to come to life in hundreds of dioceses, or mission schools run by rural based parishes, and religious orders. This is a network you have carefully nurtured over a number of years. Your special concern for the development and welfare of Filipinos in the provinces adds to the moral component of the government in the areas of economic improvement. In the past four teen years, our rural populace were not only politically starved and abused, but also morally and spiritually undermined. The 14-year spectacle, of .moral turpitude rewarded and moral rectitude that was put on by the old regime called into question the continuing relevance of many of our lives.

But fortunately, enough of our values were meant to call the Filipinos to rally perhaps for the last time, in defense of those values, and in powerful rejection of the old regime.

It is now our task to pick up the momentum of spiritual and moral renewal. In fact we have the advantage of working with the people who themselves started that momentum.

We are building on a substantial foundation, made firm by the triumph of the people in the last elections and revolution. Our focus must be on the young, on those who were born and grew up in the age of our shame, and who were witnesses from the most impressionable age to the triumph of vice and punishment of virtue. One event last February, will not wipe out the work of 14 years. For this reason, your government recently launched a values reformation program implemented by MECS. Until a few days ago, I made the teaching of human rights mandatory in schools.

In a message to educators in Baguio City, I outlined a broad direction of this program. This involved the instilling in our youth, of a love for peace, a jealousy for their political rights, a firm sense of justice, and a willingness to be responsible for themselves and to the community. I specially stressed that the promotion of self-discipline, hard work, respect, and concern for their fellowmen regardless of social status, and an abiding trust and faith in God and the triumph of good. The theme of your 18th convention, national reconstruction through moral regeneration, underscores the identity of our concerns and objectives. At long last, the Catholic academic community and your national leadership are now of a single mind and purpose. I should now like to review the areas where the CEAP and the government can work together.

First, let me assure you that I am keenly aware that Catholic educational institutions are as deeply affected as public schools by the issues of tuition fees and teachers salaries. But where your resources permit, I appeal to you to reach out to the even more financially strapped, if not outright impoverished schools, in your various communities.

I would propose a kind of adoption program, where in a CEAP affiliated school could adopt a public school catering to the same student age-levels. You could then work out a scheme for sharing facilities, services and faculty development programs.

A second area of cooperation is one you have already started to work on. And that is the formation of the total school environment, or the inclusion of the surrounding community or parish in teaching and learning activities. The Assumption experiment in San Simon, Pampanga, is a particularly inspiring example of the conversion of a formal school structure into a community wide learning experience. It is an experience that mutually enriches the studentry and the community; the community by the immediate relevance of what the students are taught and the students by the immediate awareness of the needs of their communities.

The main burden of educating our people should be borne by the government, and I am therefore grateful that the CEAP's network for all the financial constraints under which it operates, has carried a substantial part of that burden. I would therefore like to assure you that the government is exploring every possible source of support for private education. We have identified several areas where we can assist.

For this school year, the service contract scheme which was pilot-tested in two regions will be implemented nationwide, not only on the high school but also on the elementary level. This means that thousands of students who could not be accommodated in government schools are now enrolled in private schools. The impact of this program is two fold: first, the government saves by paying minimal tuition fees instead of constructing new school buildings; second, the private schools have another source of revenue.

Because of the merits of this program, a funding scheme will be evolved so that this partnership of government and private schools can be extended into a tertiary level.

I wish I could make a long list of incentives and other forms of assistance. But I know you understand the enormous demands from all sectors that government must respond to. But, I assure you, there is an earnest effort to find feasible incentives.

The quality of education of our youth is our primary concern, even if it does not appear always as our first priority. We have to address the immediate and dangerous problem of unemployment and mass poverty, particularly in the rural areas. We have to keep bodies and souls together before we can get minds working. And working in constructive rather than destructive directions. That democracy is the first and highest value is unquestioned by a race that cannot live without liberty and pride. But let us not give our people the exclusive choice of bread or freedom. But while the immediate alleviation of poverty is our first priority, the quality education of our youth is the best assurance of maintaining the progress we hope to achieve. I said in Davao that we were left with little by the previous government and we shall not be helped much by our friends abroad. But I also said that, nonetheless, we shall achieve the progress we desire. And that is because, pushed to the wall, we shall fall back on the intangible resources of the people and push ahead by the strength of our will and the power of our intelligence. Both these resources are created by the kind of education we provide. I know the ultimate priorities. Whatever it takes, they will be followed.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the Philippine Bishops/Businessmen Conference

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines During the Philippine Bishops/Businessmen Conference

FORGING A POST-DICTATORSHIP AGENDA

The fight is not over, President Aquino tells members of the Bishops/Businessmen's Conference. Systemic injustices on which the past regime fed, remain and must be removed. The people must be on their guard against the enemies from within and without.

Fifteen years ago, a group of 35 bishops and an equal number of businessmen lifted their noses from their breviaries and bank books and took alarming notice of the state the country was in, and the even more alarming direction in which it was headed. They decided to combine their respective attributes of spirituality and pragmatism in a systematic effort to uncover the roots of the Philippine crisis and find the appropriate solutions.

One year later, Martial Law was declared and the country was plunged deeper into crisis. To the socio-economic problems they pledged to tackle, the Bishops-Businessmen's Conference added the politics of dictatorship to its agenda. It was a brave decision in the circumstances and the Conference never faltered in adhering to it. For 14 years, the BBC was one of a handful of voices raised in protest against the abuses of the Marcos regime and the social abuses it added to those already endemic in the system.

The BBC brought wisdom and a profound ethical concern to the important issues confronting the nation: minimum wages, labor-management relations, the impact of large enterprises on communities, the role of different instrumentalities of government in a democratic society, and human rights abuses. In this last category, the BBC puts the stamp of Christian approval to the personal outrage felt by many Filipinos over the abuses of the authoritarian government and its military establishment. It was a consolation and a source of strength to feel that what we felt and thought about these abuses were not merely personal reactions, and that the need to do something about them was a Christian duty.

The BBC was one of the chief influences in the education of our people in the humane values of a true democracy, even while this democracy was still a dream. In preparing us for it, it emboldened us to bring it about in a unique and Christian way that has made us the object of the world's admiration.

Last week, an attempt was made to overthrow our democracy. It failed miserably. It failed because the political order, not to mention the personalities, that was offered as the alternative to our democracy went against the grain of the values of our people, values for which the BBC has stood and which it tried to engrain in us.

The fight is not over. The dictatorship is gone, but many of the systemic injustices on which it fed remain with us. The work of the BBC is far from over. The Enemy has many more disguises than the ludicrous one it put on last Sunday at Manila Hotel. We must be ever on our guard. We must be on our guard, not only against the enemy without, but even more against the enemy within. The cynicism that paralyzed our people could creep in again and weaken them against another assault on their liberties and values. That spell of cynicism was broken by the gunshot that killed my husband. Let us not depend on such startling and costly events to keep us alert to danger.

We are presently engaged in the work of giving permanent constitutional form to the gains of the Revolution. We will need the same wisdom and morality you have brought to bear on other issues in this particular project as well. I wish you a fruitful day of deliberations and look forward to receiving results of your dialogue.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Ateneo Convocation

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Ateneo Convocation

REACHING FOR NEW HEIGHTS IN PHILIPPINE HIGHER EDUCATION

Excellence, equity and efficiency must assume great importance in higher education if the nation is to respond to the gigantic task of national reconstruction. President Aquino says Government is committed to giving due recognition and proper incentives to universities and colleges, both private and public, which have achieved standard of excellence. But excellence must be made available to as many as possible in society. As in business, government policy is towards minimum intervention in education, only so much as needed to guide the school system along a long-range overall national education plan.

Let me first of all express my deepest admiration for the tradition of excellence which the Ateneo de Manila, my new Alma Mater, has maintained through the 127 years of its history in the Philippines. Eloquent testimony of this tradition are the accomplishments of two of its most illustrious sons, Dr. Jose Rizal and Fr. Horacio de la Costa.

I also take note of the Ateneo's continuing efforts toward equity by enabling a significant number of students from lower income families to receive a Jesuit education through a large scholarship program.

At the same time, efficiency has distinguished the management of this institution. This is shown by the gradual but steady expansion of the Ateneo from her humble beginnings at Intramuros to her wide complex here at Loyola Heights, the productive use of her resources, the successful campaign for philanthropic contributions from here and abroad, and her annual output of graduates, many of them outstanding experts in various fields of human endeavor.

If we as a nation are to respond to the gigantic task of national reconstruction thrust upon us by the February Revolution, then excellence, equity and efficiency must assume great importance in higher education in our country. Our aims to consolidate the gains of the Revolution in a just and viable society cannot be fulfilled unless higher education and research are able to provide knowledge and expertise, which is to say excellence; to as many as possible, meaning equitably; and to do so efficiently. And, because we are in a hurry, in as short a time as possible.

As UNESCO studies have insisted, the condition of higher education does provide an index of national, social and economic development.

Excellence refers to the quality of education, the performance of the individual and the institution. An institution of higher learning achieves excellence only insofar as it provides a relevant education, one placed within the context of Philippine conditions, and responsive to our needs on the national and local levels. Twenty years ago we were ahead of some of our Southeast Asian neighbors in the field of education. Now they are outstripping us, if we have not yet fallen far behind, in terms of program and course offerings, the degrees and expertise of faculty, and enlarged modern facilities. There can be no compromise on excellence. Nor can we afford to acquire and maintain it at a leisurely pace. The recovery cannot wait and it needs what excellence in higher education brings to such an endeavor.

My Government is committed to (1) promoting excellence in higher education; (2) removing all obstacles to excellence; and (3) giving due recognition and proper incentives to universities and colleges, both private and public, which have achieved standards of excellence. As in the field of business, so in education, the policy of my government shall be minimum government intervention; only as much as deemed necessary to guide the direction of the Philippine school system along a long-range overall national education plan.

But excellence must not be the exclusive property of a few. It must be made available to as many as possible in our society. This is the principle of equity. According to the World Development Report of 1982, 27 percent of 20 to 24 year olds in the Philippines are enrolled in higher education. We are ahead of our ASEAN neighbors by an average of three percent. We are only two points below Japan. But the quality of education in the Philippines is uneven. Excellence is available only to a few and this is a pity because the figures show that many of our young people have the talent and capability to profit from quality basic education and excellent and relevant higher education.

I am happy to note that Ateneans have taken these two goals of excellence and equity to heart. Many Ateneo graduates have joined the university's volunteer program and have sacrificed the opportunity of immediate cashing in on their education to go out into the countryside to share their learning with our less privileged brothers and sisters.

My government is committed, as soon as our economy picks up and sufficient resources are available, to revitalizing and increasing the government scholarship programs. Programs such as the NSTA, the State Scholarship, the Scholarship Program for Cultural Communities, which have suffered setbacks over the last few years, and which enable poor students to take excellent, relevant, high-powered programs that are so essential for national reconstruction.

My government is likewise committed to study proposals for additional tax incentives for scholarship donations and other contributions to educational institutions and foundations.

This brings us to the question of efficiency. There is, as one study has indicated, a mismatch between the products of our colleges and universities, and employment opportunities in our country. Thousands upon thousands of Filipino college graduates have left or are leaving the country to seek employment in the Middle East, in Europe, in Hongkong, to be wage earners, blue collar workers, and domestics. Likewise, associations of schools, individual institutions, and respected educators (including Minister Quisumbing when she was in private education) complain of excessive government control and complicated red-tape in procuring Ministry approvals.

My government is committed to developing, in cooperation with public and private sector educators, a comprehensive long-range educational plan designed to meet the requirements of economic recovery and growth, as well as the need for national political maturity. This last requirement is as important as the first. We are in this mess because our politics went awry as a result of our political ignorance and indifference. We are also committed to giving as much autonomy as possible to institutions that meet specific accreditation requirements and to assuring academic freedom of teachers and the academic freedom of institutions of higher learning.

I thank the Ateneo de Manila University for this honor she confers on me today. It is the second in a week. I think there is a suspicion that I may still slip out from Jesuit fingers and so this second effort to stamp me indelibly in the Jesuit mold. Don't hold your breath, many have tried and failed. I ask the administration, the faculty, Jesuits and lay persons alike, the students, not to rest on your laurels but find new ways of achieving excellence, equity and efficiency as we build, with great hope, this great nation.

I ask you, in keeping with the Jesuit sense of availability and readiness, to pursue the more universal good and the greater glory of God. Do not hesitate to undertake new programs, new types of research, new schools even and institutions, if these will indeed promote the welfare of our people and our country's development. It is by daring that we are now living in a democracy.

I would like to see more scholarships available to poor students in your school. Hence, I appeal to the alumni, friends and benefactors of the Ateneo to help in the expansion of the Ateneo's scholarship program.

I also would like to assure foreign governments and agencies interested in the promotion of education in the Philippines that any form of assistance you offer to schools like the Ateneo will undoubtedly contribute to the progress of our nation, especially in this crucial time.

And lastly, I ask the Almighty Father to bless this university, now my Alma Mater, for good measure, adopted me again as one of her own.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the National Science and Technology Authority

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the National Science and Technology Authority

CREATING INDIGENOUS TECHNOLOGY

Our scientists must adapt foreign technologies to local realities and develop indigenous technologies that will make full use of our native resources. Filipino science and technology plays an important role in the new self-reliant posture of the country.

I will be brief as I always am. My interest in science and technology is utilitarian. I must measure the importance of any activity by its potential contribution to the work of national reconstruction. I have been given statistics indicating that the national allocation of funds to science and technology in the Philippines is much much smaller than in the industrialized countries, old and new. This says the obvious. We are economically backward because, to some extent, we are weak in science and technology: and we are behind in science and technology because we do not have the kind of economy that can support their vibrant growth. These facts will not excite anyone to contribute readily to local science and technology, especially as your brief to me indicates that it is easier, even if it is not cheaper in the long run, to simply buy the foreign technology in finished products or pay royalties for its use. The private sector goes for the short-term gain, principally because the local private sector does not have more than short-term resources. It must invest in immediate growth because it can rarely support a long-term investment. These are the facts of life that undoubtedly throw a damper on your enthusiasm but they must be faced. It is a vicious cycle, but I accept that the government has a measure of responsibility in breaking it. Government must invest more in scientific and technological research and development, if only to keep the best brains among our people at home. Its investment, directly or through incentives for private sector to support research and development efforts, is like its investment in education. It does not offer immediate gains but it is the height of irresponsibility not to support it generously, for government has responsibility not to the present but chiefly to the future of the country. However, because the resources of our government are scarce and because we are pressed on all sides of competing priorities of unquestionable urgency, such as the alleviation of mass poverty, it is necessary for long-term investments to justify themselves by offering some prospects of immediate returns. In short, it's got to pay and now.

In the case of general education, it must show itself to be relevant to the social and economic conditions of the times and to the objectives that we have set ourselves for the immediate future. We want relevant education, meaning to say, educational programs that turn out graduates with a place in the system such as it is, and who will contribute to make that system what it aspires to be. The same with science and technology.

I have said that the first priority is the alleviation of mass poverty, which is found principally in the rural areas. Urban poverty is just the result of the bad conditions in the countryside that have driven the people to seek a better life in the cities. The main thrust therefore of our economic recovery program is in agriculture.

This thrust will take the form of massive infrastructure investments in the countryside that will make farming again a viable and, perhaps also, a profitable venture. We aim to build farm-to-market roads, irrigation systems, silos and other post-harvest facilities that will permit the farmer to increase his productivity because he has the assurance that his products will readily find markets. We also want to acquire the facilities in a manner that immediately generates employment. We have strongly emphasized the need to use labor-intensive efforts in these projects. But we want these methods also to be efficient. We cannot afford to subsidize the unemployed in digging holes and filling them in again. In short because of our situation, one approach must yield as many results as possible. It is here that Filipino science and technology must prove its immediate usefulness.

We need our scientists to adapt foreign technologies to local realities, and better still to develop indigenous technologies that will make full use of our native resources. I have said that we shall lift ourselves by our own bootstraps because there is no one around to help us carry the full weight of our problems. I acknowledge the role of Filipino science and technology in the new self-reliant posture of the Philippines. And it is an acknowledgement that will find concrete expression in government support for its growth and development.

In concluding, however, I want to express my own interest in Filipino science and technology apart from its immediate contribution to the national recovery effort. I delight in expressions of the power of the Filipino will and intelligence to find unique solutions to impossible dilemmas. I saw this in our Revolution where we found a unique and simple response to an armed and intransigent dictatorship, a response that had eluded all other nations suffering the same political affliction. You know what I mean. You lived the answer yourselves at EDSA. We found our way out of that problem. I trust you, who are among the best brains in our country, to help us find our way out of the problems we inherited. There will be many more Philippine revolutions before the work started out by the February Revolution is completed. Filipino science and technology should spearhead one of them.

Aquino, C. C. (1986). Speeches of President Corazon C. Aquino : March 22 – August 5, 1986. [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Knowing how to fight is important, but is no guarantee of success unless there is an even more profound understanding and appreciation of the values for which one is called to fight. Those values not only gives us compelling reasons for supreme sacrifices but, more importantly, they should establish the tenor of any struggle in which we are called to engage ourselves. We must fight with honor. The way we fight to protect what we claim to be our cherished values must do honor and not violence to those values. The manner of the struggle must already be a victory, a fitting testimony to the moral supremacy of our cause. This is the new spirit of our armed forces. It is a spirit imbibed from the distinguished manner by which our people regained their liberties. It is the spirit of justice, compassion, concern, moderation, and reconciliation. That spirit must now be imparted to our youth so that the achievements of this generation, achievements honored by all the world, are passed on without diminution to the next generation. Our Revolution will be eternal. It will be lived by each generation in turn. That is my commitment and my vow.

The present thrust of the MCMTC reflects this new spirit. Even as I called upon the New Armed Forces to repel threats to our new democracy, not only by moving to destroy its enemies but more importantly to build in the hearts of men, so now it appears that the youth involved in citizen military training have branched out from the bare essentials of military training to social upliftment.

I am happy to note that CMT cadets and cadettes who constitute more than a fourth of the college student population in Metro Manila have been mobilized to combat the proliferation of illegal drugs and marijuana in school campuses. Drug abuse is an enemy more insidious than those that offer overt threats to national security. It strikes deep at the physical foundations and the moral fiber of our national strength.

Another service assistance program of MCMTC is its registration volunteers program which is implemented in all universities and colleges in Metro Manila. This program calls for CMT cadets to lead student volunteers in assisting students during enrollment. The program has proved especially helpful to students coming from the provinces.

In order to further expand the community and social involvement of CMT cadets, MCMTC has organized its 'Damayan Organization'. The organization will allow the involvement of the cadets in disaster, rescue, relief, and rehabilitation operations now carried out mainly by the organic elements of the command.

I see a wider involvement for CMT cadets in the core values and institutions of our new democracy. The heart of democracy is the electoral process. That process has been trashed time and again in our country. I cannot remember a time when it was not, even before the dictatorship. We must never allow it to happen again. Our people put their lives on the line during the last elections to underscore the supreme value that elections must have in a vibrant and real democracy. Because elections must be held everywhere in the country, even in the most remote barrios, the work of assuring their integrity is one that can be carried out only by great numbers of committed souls. People must be there at the polling places to watch and step into protect the ballot. The job calls for discipline, perseverance, stamina and courage. These are military virtues. Our people spontaneously displayed them. We want to make sure they are always present in every election. I am therefore suggesting that the AFP give serious consideration to the extensive use of the cadets and cadettes in this noble work; a work that puts the citizen intimately in touch with the core of democracy. We shall have the first elections under a new charter very soon.

The world stood rapt with wonder at how we regained our freedom. I want the world in the same condition when we show how we have used the freedom.

REVVING UP THE ECONOMIC ENGINE

Despite gains made since the ouster of former President Marcos on both economic and political fronts, President Aquino deplores that big business has been slow or even reluctant in making significant investments that will give the economy a much-needed push. She tackles grievances: that the Minister of Labor should be replaced (under today's prevailing circumstances, he is the man for the job); that the PCGG is going beyond its bounds (efforts of PCGG have been aimed at preventing illegal transfers of shares, assets and monies); that import liberalization will wreak havoc on the export industry (the need is to make our export industry competitive and efficient).

It is now nearly six months since I spoke to you on February 3rd. How many of us really believed that deliverance was near at hand. I do not know. But it was clear that we were all terribly determined to deliver ourselves from bondage. And that was more important. The determination was even greater after Marcos stole the election from us and we embarked on a campaign of civil disobedience. At this time, a foreign emissary came to me and asked me when I thought our victory would take place. I answered him. Perhaps in three months, maybe six, who knows? All I know, I told him, is that I will not stop whatever the price I would have to pay. He told me, Mrs. Aquino, if you had given me a definite time when you would definitely take power, I would have dismissed your efforts. But now that you tell me realistically that you do not know but that, regardless, you will not stop, I know you will succeed. It is all in the will.

I remember how wildly you cheered when I last spoke to you, when I challenged you to let your voices be heard and let the power of the people be felt. So resounding was your response and that of the rest of our people, that three weeks later I was your President.

Today I come with yet another challenge. This time, the enemy is no longer an aging dictator. It is fear. Fear and its attendant feeling of uncertainty and reluctance. Fear and the failure of the will. The challenge is to overcome this fear and to join hands with your President and your government in rebuilding our nation. I offer no quick dramatic solutions, now any miracles except those that God will work through our hands, which is the same as the miracle at EDSA. Remember that in our unrelenting struggle we followed no pillar of smoke or fire, but only the pillar of our resolve to be delivered from the house of bondage. So what I offer, once again, is a long and difficult struggle with no more certainty of success than faith and perseverance guarantee. But that, as we have learned, is no small surety.

This struggle that must be nourished by faith and determination must also proceed on a clear and fearless understanding of the events that unfolded and are unfolding in our country today. In the spirit of candor with which I led our struggle for freedom, let us pause and take stock.

The then major opposition forces in the country forged a united front to rid the country of the dictatorship and to establish a democracy. Let me repeat that it was a democracy that we collectively sought to establish and not another dictatorship. Neither a dictatorship of power nor a dictatorship of ideas of how to tackle the problems of the nation. We promised effective government, that is true, but effective in its responses to the diverse demands of the people and parties that propelled us to power. These were demands that the dictatorship had ignored and which I pledged sincere efforts to answer. That is why I promised that my government would be one of consultation and not of unilateral direction.

This government reflects, in deliberating on the problems of the nation, the wide diversity of views of the forces that brought it to power. Some people now think that this was a necessary but, as things have turned out, an unfortunate compromise. Those who think this way do not understand democracy, and if their way of thinking spreads, we won't have it for long. What would they have in its place? I ask them.

Where some see weakness and confusion, I see strength in a government that is able to listen to the widest range of views and yet is able to move ahead with the kind of resolve we have adequately demonstrated over the last five months. As was dramatically proven by the fall of the Marcos regime, the strength of a government lies, not in its ability to speak with a single voice, as the Marcos government always did, and with a consistently lying voice at that, but in its ability to keep the trust and confidence of its people. And that ability hinges on the government's willingness to listen to the people. Is the babble of popular voices too distracting for business? Remember that the decline of the Marcos dictatorship was marked by the silence of a people quietly withdrawing their support. They had lost all hope of a hearing.

This government is pledged to listen to the people and strains itself to catch every voice. We make no pretensions at a monopoly of knowledge, unlike Marcos. I have learned more about government from my direct contact with the people and their popular leaders in our consultations than I have from the pundits. Certainly more about their needs and how to go about meeting them given our limited resources.

What I am afraid of is not an increasing number of views but a decreasing ability to heed them all, given the limitations of a pure Presidential government without the benefit of a separate legislature and local governments that are popularly elected and periodically responsible to their constituents.

This is why I have placed such a premium on the swift completion of the drafting of a new constitution. This is why I advised the Constitutional Commission to stick to the work of writing a constitution and not to usurp the legislative and policy-making functions of the representative institutions they are called upon to create. The commissioners were appointed to create the representative institutions of a democracy, institutions in which the preferences of the people would be heard and acted on by the people's duly elected representatives and no others.

I want to preside over a full-blown democracy, with all the proper institutions and agencies in place that will be acutely sensitive to the public pulse. I said I would lead our people but only in the direction they wish to take. What this direction is, from among the many that various sectors of the nation propose, is something that the duly elected representatives will tell us.

The legislative and local elections will give your government the opportunity to present to our people a set of candidates who will assist us in the rebuilding of our nation. It is to be hoped that the mandate we now enjoy at the national level will translate into an equally powerful mandate in the legislative and local government levels, so that the reconstruction of our nation can proceed with full vigor and dynamism and a minimum of obstruction.

In the meantime, my mission is to strengthen the unity that we as a people displayed in the Campaign and Revolution. I want to bring into that unity even the forces that opposed us, who must know that our victory is irrevocable. For we now face a greater and common foe — the underdevelopment and poverty of our country — and the greater challenge of making its material progress commensurate with the spiritual triumph of the Revolution.

It is against this backdrop then that we must assess our progress to date, and our ability to move forward in the future. As we take stock, it is appropriate to recall what we said during the campaign would be our main economic thrusts:

We said we would restore credible leadership through personal example.

We vowed to drastically reduce, if not totally eliminate, graft and corruption in government.

We said we would relentlessly pursue the ill-gotten wealth of the Marcoses and their cronies. The applause that followed this pledge was deafening.

We said that the focus of our economic policies would be the unemployment problem.

And we said that rural development would be assigned the first priority it has long deserved.

And how have we fared in the five months since we assumed office?

We have reestablished the credibility of the Philippine government not only in the eyes of the Filipino people but before the entire world; this credibility rests not only on a president who, I believe, still enjoys the overwhelming support of the people, but also on cabinet and sub-cabinet appointees who are widely acknowledged to be outstanding, even if also outspoken, men and women of intelligence, integrity, and political sense.

We have significantly reduced the level and pervasiveness of graft and corruption at the higher levels of the bureaucracy. But we have to admit that corruption continues at the middle and lower levels.

We have made very significant gains in our efforts to recover the ill-gotten wealth of the Marcoses and their cronies. At the very least, we have, to a significant extent, neutralized the residual economic power of the forces of tyranny to make a comeback. We have done the same in the political field through the equally controversial policies of the Ministry of Local Governments.

We have made significant progress in the economic field. The exchange rate has stabilized and we are building our international reserves. We have controlled the inflation rate at very moderate single-digit levels. We have introduced a moderate liquidity into the financial system to allow interest rates to drop to levels that should make investments attractive. We have allowed the benefits of lower oil prices to spread throughout the economy in the form of lower fuel, power and transport costs. We have introduced a tax reform package designed to reduce the burden on those who can least afford it, to shift the burden of taxation toward non-essentials, and to stimulate investments in equities. We have also launched an aggressive program to create new jobs over the next 18 months by embarking on a massive, employment-intensive infrastructure program in the rural areas. This program is the centerpiece of our short-term recovery efforts. It is intended to improve the purchasing power of our rural communities, where 70% of our population lives, and thus increase the demand — and therefore improve the markets — for our agricultural as well as industrial products. This, we believe, is the stimulus needed by our economy to nudge it toward recovery and sustained long-term growth.

Obviously, much more remains to be done. Many more jobs need to be created. We have appealed to the private sector to help us get the economy moving. We have pointed out the obvious. We are a democracy; the rule of law has been reestablished, there is no longer a power in the land that can gobble up by fiat the fruits of your enterprise. These things, you said, had dampened the spirit of enterprise. I remember your wild applause when I vowed to remove the obstacles that prevented you from being the engine of our economy.

I have removed the obstacles, but where is the engine?

Five months ago, the excuse was Marcos. Allow me to change metaphors: you gave me the impression that you did not want to put out your best silver because he might steal it, as he had done everything else. Well, he's gone. So where is it? Perhaps he took it also. Then you should say so. Admit that the private sector no longer has the wherewithal to play a significant part in the economy. But if that is the case, then why has the blame shifted to certain personalities in my government, to the likes of Bobbit Sanchez and Nene Pimentel, to the PCGG commissioners, to Jobo Fernandez and Jimmy Ongpin? At any rate, the small and medium entrepreneurs are still there to hold up this economy, as they have done through all its crisis and predicted collapses. But I like to think that big business will keep its pledge to propel this economy and so I will take your grievances seriously. But because I believe you are intelligent, I will focus on the issues rather than the personalities.

First the labor situation. Addressing myself particularly to those who think that the ultimate solution to our nation's labor problems lies in the replacement of the labor minister, I invite you to reflect on the causes of our present situation.

In my view, the militancy of Philippine labor is the inevitable result of years of economic plunder and mismanagement, from which you all suffered, but from which labor suffered even more. Surely we can once again blame Marcos and his cronies and technocrats, but should we not also look at ourselves? What did we do during those years to protect the interests of our workers? Is it any wonder that they now aspire to protect themselves?

Whatever its roots, the militancy of labor is now a fact of life that we can neither reverse nor suppress. Instead we should respond constructively to the legitimate grievances of labor. We can begin by making a sincere effort to understand their plight; the same kind of understanding want them to have of management's difficulties.

The first step toward understanding is dialogue. The labor ministry's role is that of moderator in this dialogue where the aim is not mutual recrimination but understanding, and then, hopefully, cooperation in finding workable solutions. The labor minister must thus be acceptable not only to employers but also to labor. For suspicions and impasses will continually be referred to him for clarification and resolution. And it is in this context that I reiterate my conviction that Minister Sanchez is the man for the job under today's prevailing circumstances.

The Minister of Labor, of all people, took exception to my Labor Day Speech as being too liberal. I, on the other hand, found a liberal policy just plain practical. And so I overruled him and went ahead and liberalized the labor laws. It was clear to me that industrial peace would not be achieved by draconian legislation. It went against the temper of the times, not to mention the promises of my campaign. It was clear to me, and finally clear to Bobbit, that industrial peace could come about only by the willingness of both sides to submerge some of their conflicting demands for bigger slices of the economic pie in a common effort to first come up with a pie. And that is why I called, and continue to call, for a six-month moratorium on strikes, so that the nascent recovery we are beginning to see can take firm hold. What is needed is dialogue, not adversarial positions. The things that labor and management will not be achieved without dialogue and consensus.

I understand the PCGG is causing you some distress. I am not going to refer to my campaign pledge to go after hidden wealth, a pledge you welcomed with roars of approval. All I am going to ask is two questions: Do you want these thieves to get away with it? Second, why are you worried about the PCGG? Only those who were involved in the robbery of our nation have reason to fear it. But I understand how such a roving commission can cause you distress. It could err and sequester the wrong business, causing irreparable damage. Marcos was in power so long that quite a number of legitimate businesses had to let him in for protection. I understand this expediency. But as a result of it, the Commission has found it necessary to involve itself, through its agents and nominees, in the corporate affairs of the sequestered enterprises in order to prevent illegal transfers of shares, assets, and monies. This has apparently caused alarm, due perhaps to a misunderstanding of the Commission's motives. Let me state therefore that the PCGG will disengage from all sequestered enterprises at the earliest time possible. I hope that a definition of the PCGG's role, that is compatible with the political normalcy we shall soon attain, will emerge from the current discussions about its role. But it should be clear from my assurances that we will not relent in hunting down the wealth that was stolen from our people. I will give one more assurance. If you come across any abuse of the Commission's mandate, either send it to the press or send it to my office. Just do me the favor of respecting my intelligence by providing some proof.

Let us now shift to another issue which I know you are deeply concerned about. This is the issue of import liberalization. This issue has been extensively debated. Not only under my government, but even under the previous one. This government is for import liberalization because we are convinced that in the long run this is probably the best way of ensuring the emergence of world-competitive and efficient enterprises. I think the direction is, by and large, accepted as the appropriate one to take with a few persuasive caveats here and there. There is a strong argument that what we need is FAIR trade rather than free trade, and that the nations held up as models of development never practiced free trade in its pure form. But the really violent disagreement appears to be over the timing. I have been told that the proposal to erect high tariff walls to ease the transition has been met with less than wild enthusiasm by businessmen who know how porous tariff walls can be.

There is obviously need for further discussion as to the timing and scope of our liberalization thrust and I hereby direct the Minister of Trade and Industry to personally sit down with the PCCI and come up with reasonable recommendations in the context of our economy's needs as well as our ongoing discussions with the IMF. I would like to receive these final joint recommendations by the end of this month.

The list of issues you asked me to tackle today extends far beyond those I have discussed. I think I have spoken enough. Suffice it to say that these issues will get the same attention.

In closing, let me restate my firm conviction that your government has done what it can to set the stage for economic recovery. I think it is high time that the private sector does its part. But this is a free society. You can choose to gripe instead.

Business wants to think of itself as the engine, of the economy. But it looks to me like this engine wants to be pushed until it finds a gentle downward slope where it can coast along without effort. Well, for your information, we are at the foot of a steep mountain and the flood waters are rising.

My friends in the business community: when I agreed to stand as candidate for the Presidency, I did so with the assurance that I could count on all of you for your support, not only in the campaign, but more critically in the tortuous effort of turning this country around. That support has not been forthcoming. Let's get one thing clear. The support is not for me, but for your country, for yourselves and your posterity unless you all want to be immigrants. This is your only country. You sometimes give the impression that it is not. That you can afford to stand back and see how this little country turns out before committing yourselves to it. You complain of the uncertainty. I am telling you that it is uncertain because you are uncommitted. This country will be what you, and the rest of our people, make of it. If you want it to be something you can live with, or better still, prosper in, then make yourselves a part of it now.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Philippine National Bank's 70th Anniversary

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Philippine National Bank's 70th Anniversary

LAUNCHING A PEOPLE'S NATIONAL BANK

The PNB was established to counterweight the foreign banks that dominated the financial system. As the premier bank of the agricultural sector, it helped in the growth of the Philippine economy.

Now as it turns 70, President Aquino believes that with the right leadership the PNB can again be instrumental in the country's bid for economic recovery.

The anniversary theme of PNB is Working Together for Economic Recovery and President Aquino reminds them that in her administration, economic recovery means "rescuing the majority of the Filipino people from the poverty and underemployment that wastes their potential for prosperity and growth."

PNB's new mission is' to return to its traditional role as the mainstay of agricultural development; friend of the small farmers and small entrepreneur — be the People's Bank.

When Joker gave me the PNB invitation, he said, "If you think EDSA was a miracle, look at this: PNB is turning 70." I have had to work with cynics. But I am not surprised that the PNB has endured this long, even if it has to celebrate this anniversary in black. The PNB had built up such a fund of goodwill from the days of its establishment that only another year of Marcos could have finally done it in.

The PNB had a long and venerable history, closely tied to the aspirations of our people to be independent. Independent not only in the sovereign sense, but equally importantly, in the sense of being economically strong and progressive. It was established as a counterweight to the foreign banks that dominated the financial system. For many years, it served as a central bank. It was the custodian of other banks' reserves, the sole depository of the government, and the clearing house of the banking system. Alone among the banks, it had powers to issue circulating notes. It played a key role in the post-war reconstruction of our country.

The PNB was the premier banker of the agricultural sector, which amounts to saying it banked the Philippine economy. Without the PNB, it is doubtful whether those traditional industries that were the main props of our economy, such as sugar and coconut, could have grown as rapidly as they did. That these industries did not have the prudence and, in many cases, the honesty, to build up wisely from such fortunate beginnings is no reflection of the public service rendered by the bank.

The PNB, like all instrumentalities of government, does not make policy. It is an instrument of policy made elsewhere. The reckless and profligate course it took under the previous regime should not therefore be blamed on it. What the PNB needed was a leadership worthy of its tradition of service. That is why I appointed Ting Jayme to be its president.

I felt that he was one of those who could bring the spirit of the new morality and patriotism that triumphed at the Revolution into such necessary instruments of Philippine progress as the PNB. He is the right man to lead you in the new course we have charted for it.

The theme of your anniversary celebration is Working Together for Economic Recovery. It would be good to remind ourselves that economic recovery and progress has been amplified, under this administration, to mean more than mere advances in production, income and the usual economic and financial variables. Our chief concern is rescuing the majority of our people from the poverty and underdevelopment that wastes their potential for prosperity and growth.

Within the context of this broad goal, the PNB's new mission is to return to its traditional role as the mainstay of agricultural development, the friend of the small farmer and the small entrepreneur. To be the people's bank. Its extensive branches network and long experience in agri lending argues strongly for its success in this mission.

I understand, however, that a new direction is not enough. It must be reconditioned for its daunting mission. Your management has already submitted a rehabilitation plan which is at present being considered by the government. Essentially, the plan calls for the transfer of the bank's non-performing assets and liabilities to the government, so that the Bank can have a fresh start. Whatever the final configuration of the plan, I can assure you that you will have an easier time with your NPAs than I will with mine.

We pledge that the Bank will never again be misused by government. But we won't always be the government. I advise you therefore to use this period to rebuild your tradition of integrity and competence, and build it firmer than it has ever been in the past. Make this Bank impervious to anything but a sense of patriotism and responsibility for the common good.

I would like to congratulate you on your anniversary. I will not wish you success, because I know it is certain to come. I have put Joker Arroyo here as Chairman to keep me posted of the certain progress of this institution, since I know Ting Jayme to be also a very modest man. You have all the ingredients of success: professionalism, integrity, and leadership. I know that it will not be long before our people can again lean on the PNB for the requirements of Philippine progress, without fear that it will give way, and with every confidence that it will willingly support them.

REMEMBERING NINOY

Ninoy lives in the Filipino of the February Revolution, a Filipino who is zealous of his rights, fierce in the protection of his liberties, alert to the needs of his country and dedicated to its progress.

I want to thank you all for helping me to open Ninoy's memorabilia. It is important that you are here with me on this occasion. For when Ninoy was lost to his family, he became a part of you for whom he gave his life. I will not talk about the family's grief except to say that for myself, having lost him on the tarmac, I saw him again in the revolutionary movement that his death released. I saw the face of Ninoy in the massive crowds that pressed unrelentingly for change but always with a gay, lighthearted spirit. And he was smiling. No, it wasn't the smile of a man getting back at his enemies, but of a man who loved people so much there could not be a higher destiny for him than to become their animating spirit toward liberation. Every time the people scored a victory by a demonstration whose massiveness paralyzed the government, by an electoral turnout so huge it could not be covered over by cheating, and finally by that remarkable revolution that had an entire nation turning its back as one on the dictator until he had to leave like an uninvited guest, I smiled to return the smile on Ninoy's face. A smile that said, I told you, the Filipino is worth dying for. For as long as his spirit is in our people, I haven't lost him and I shall not need this memorabilia to remind me. But it may not be the same for others. And so we have this exhibit of the things that accompanied Ninoy in his life. But what really registers his presence most is not any of these things, but what you were in the glory days of the campaign and the election, and, of course, during the four days in February. Ninoy lives in the Filipino of the February Revolution, a Filipino who is jealous of his rights, fierce in the protection of his liberties, alert to the needs of his country and dedicated to its progress. To the end of developing more such Filipinos, I am pleased to announce the Ninoy Aquino High School Scholarship grant. Each year, for four years, fifteen Filipinos will receive a four-year grant. The grant will include tuition fees, books, school supplies and a monthly allowance.

Nine boys will be accommodated in Ateneo, De La Salle and San Beda; three in each school. Six girls will study in U.P. These are the schools where Ninoy studied. These schools will determine the scholars' entrance requirements and qualifications.

I can think of no better place to build a memorial to Ninoy than in the hearts and minds of the people he loved.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on claiming God's promise

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On claiming God's promise

[Delivered at Martha's Vineyard, August 5, 1986]

CLAIMING GOD'S PROMISE

There are many miracles; God-sent beyond question. But they all happen through the work of men.

I have often likened our journey to freedom to the flight of the Jews from the land of Pharaoh. Indeed, like the people of Moses, we were blessed by God with a series of miracles. And our Pharaoh, against his wishes, and despite his power, was forced to let us go.

But we who study the Bible know that there are many more chapters after the deliverance of the Jews. As they marched into the unknown, seeing their destiny only by Faith, they faltered. When the land of milk and honey did not materialize over the horizon, they grew impatient and grumbled. When their supplies ran low and the way grew harder, they complained against Moses and yearned to return to the easy, if shameful, life of servitude. They had witnessed great miracles, but when challenges and difficulties confronted them, they recoiled, forgetting the power of their God.

We too are not long into our journey to seek a better, more prosperous land for ourselves and our children. But already there are those beset by doubt as to how we shall get there, or whether we shall get there at all. Like the Jews in the desert, hardships have dimmed our memories and shaken our faith.

I too can become prone to such moments: to times when the problems of our country seem beyond solution. Yet I wake and step forward each day, strengthened by Christ's promise: "Seek and you shall find, knock and the doors shall be opened, ask and you shall receive." For it is said in Matthew that we are no less than children of God. And when a child asks his father for bread, no parent would give him a stone instead. For if fathers on earth can be generous and trustworthy, what more of our Father in heaven?

Moses did not despair in his journey, though it lasted 40 years. But I can understand the despair of his people. For God had led them forth out of the house of bondage by His hand, which they could see. And so, when He withdrew His hand, they became unsure of themselves and afraid. It was not they who conquered the hostile tribes, but God who conquered and who all but carried them over the endless miles. But I cannot understand the despair of a people whose deliverance was worked by God through the work of their own hands, as those hands were made strong by the power of their Faith. For that is what happened here. There were many miracles; God-sent beyond question. But they all happened through the work of men.

When we prayed in our bondage for the miracle of deliverance, what did we say? We prayed that our people would one day find the courage and the strength to strike the shackles from our wrists and rise up against the tyrant. Did we not keep telling ourselves, when will the Filipinos rise? It was a strange prayer since it was the Filipinos themselves who were saying it. But God understood. And so, when He answered, He did not send plagues to strike fear into the heart of Pharaoh and a pillar of fire to lead our people to freedom. Instead He put the courage to break their bonds into the hearts of our people and the Faith to persevere for the right into their breasts, even as He put, at the fateful moment, compassion and understanding into the hosts of their oppressor. As a result, when the moment of truth came, our people stood their ground on Faith and love, and the hosts of Pharaoh that were sent against them responded in the end with sympathy and compassion.

By working the miracle of our deliverance through us, God conferred on us a greater honor than if He had carried us out to freedom on His hand. He treated us no longer like a child snatched from the brink by his nurse but like mature men to demonstrate his wit, and like the angels that Thomas More said God created to reflect his glory. But more than honor, God gave us the permanent assurance that we can achieve what right we set out to do. If He had worked external miracles, then we should always feel unsure of ourselves and afraid for our future. But God revealed the secret of achievement. It lies in a will ready at hand to whoever has Faith.

Although God worked the miracle of deliverance largely through the efforts of ordinary men and women of faith, His hand was as surely there as if we had seen it. As God's spirit moves us from within, His hand, cleared the way for us from without. It was that hand that put the words into the mouth of Marcos when he called for his doom through Snap Elections. It was that hand that prevented bloodshed at EDSA, parrying the Pharaoh's heavy hand with the hand that revealed itself before an astonished world in the faith-charged multitudes of People's Power. In those fateful months of our Exodus, People's Power was the manifestation, liberty and democracy the consequence. But always, Faith was the active principle.

May I ask you today to pray for the strengthening of our Faith. Pray that we may not forget the witness of the past years, when in our need we sought God's kingdom and righteousness, and in answer all these blessings were added unto us. Please pray that in the midst of our quest for national peace and recovery, we may not become discouraged, peevish, rebellious and unchristian. May we cling to the first battlecry of our revolution: that it is better to light a candle than to curse the darkness. May we always be sensitive to that voice within us that urges us to act, but always in love. And when we pray for these things, may we do so with utmost Faith.

In the letter of James to the tribes of Israel, he says: "Consider it pure joy, my brothers, whenever you face trials of many kinds: because you know that the testing of your Faith develops perseverance. Perseverance must finish its work so that you may be mature and complete, not lacking in anything."

A faith tempered by trials accepts that God has dignified us to be the instruments of His will, not just the passive receivers of His grace. We must have Faith in praying to him for further miracles and other redemptions, but also certain knowledge that the response is in us already. When you lift up your hands to implore another miracle, look at your hands for it is from thence that the answer will come.

May I close with a final passage that I hope might inspire you when you ponder the fate of our country and government. In Saint Paul's letter to Timothy, he writes: "I urge then, first of all, that requests, prayers, intercession and thanksgiving be made for everyone — for kings and for all those in authority, that we may live peaceful and quiet lives."

If you pray and claim this promise with faith, and if we lend ourselves as instruments for its fulfillment, then we are already destined for times of quiet and peace.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the PC-INP Day

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the PC-INP Day

[Delivered on August 8, 1986]

CLARIFYING THE ROLE OF THE PC-INP

Addressing the Philippine Constabulary and the Integrated National Police on their 85th and 11th anniversaries respectively, President Aquino underscores the chief lesson of the February Revolution: that the only solid foundation of government is the people's consent and cooperation. Tasked with maintaining peace and order in the communities, the PC-INP must recognize this. The mission of these forces is essentially preventive, and as such they must learn to interact well with the communities.

I am happy to be here, for this camp evokes stirring memories of the triumph of the non-violent movement I had launched to depose the dictatorship. Here at EDSA we witnessed and were a part of the fitting climax to that movement: the heartfelt union of military and people in the struggle for Filipino freedom.

Today, as I join the Philippine Constabulary in the celebration of its 85th anniversary, and as I congratulate the Integrated National Police for its 11 years of dedicated service to the nation, I want to point up the chief lesson of the February Revolution: that government rests securely only on the foundation of the people's consent and cooperation.

When we hear it said that a government must be for the people and not the people for the government, we regard this as a statement of democratic principle. It is more than that. It is a statement of fact. If government is not for the people it will not last. The clearer statement really is: a people must be for their government or the government is doomed; doomed to extinction, and long before that doomed to ineffectiveness, which is an even more shameful fate.

This is what happened to the previous government. From August 21, 1983, the people increasingly withdrew their consent and cooperation from the government. The bullet that cut off Ninoy from us, severed the bond between people and government. When this separation took place, we saw who really depended on the other for its life.

The people reacted to the assassination with massive demonstrations and widespread boycotts. Despite the frequency of these actions that paralyzed the government and interrupted economic activity, life for the people went on much as usual except for a sense of higher purpose that filled their lives. The government on the other hand reeled from these blows. Its reform initiatives fell flat and its threats fell on deaf ears. Only Marcos, deep in his palace, did not feel it. He looked around him and counted his armed retainers and concluded that all was well with the government. But as he reassured himself by counting his battalions on the fingers of his hand, the country slipped through his fingers and joined what was becoming a revolution against him.

This was Marcos's big mistake. He equated power with force. Toward the end, I think the dictator lowered his standard of power. He figured, as he counted his battalions again, that so long as they were not against him, he was alright. He was still their commander and therefore still the President. After all, it was only a small rebel band that had holed up at EDSA.

I do not think Marcos ever realized that you cannot be a real Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces without also being the President of your people. His battallions finally realized this. They did not turn their guns on him. Instead, they joined the Filipino people in turning their backs on him.

And so the old dictator must still be baffled why he is in Hawaii and I am here. He must still be counting the battallions that did not turn against him and must therefore still be for him. That is why he keeps wasting our money calling here long distance. He has not learned that you must first be the President of the People before you can presume to call yourself the Commander of their Armed Forces. He never learned that real power cannot be counted on the fingers of your hands, even if you do it by battallions or services. For true power derives from the multitudes of the people. Lacking their support, you can put your hands to better use packing your bags than counting your soldiers.

That there is only people power if you are talking about real power, I have long known. My whole campaign rested on the simple and daunting strategy of reaching out personally to as many Filipinos as I could to bring them over to the cause of their liberation. It is a lesson that I know you have learned here at EDSA. That with the people, there is nothing you cannot accomplish, whether it is governing the country as President or bringing security to the people as soldiers and police.

The importance I place on drawing upon the power and wisdom of the people makes my job a little more complicated and, some complain, tedious. It is tedious for them. It has only been enriching for me. The pains I take to consult the people are more than offset by the confidence I have in the decisions I finally take.

I note with great satisfaction that you have been charting the same course of popular consultation in drawing up your strategies. No one can know better than the people what they need protection from, and what kind of protection will improve rather than aggravate the security of their communities. Open yourselves to what the people have to say, enlist their support and not just their tolerance of your presence. I address these matters to you because, of all the elements of the Armed Forces, you the constabulary and police forces, have been specially charged and trained to maintain peace and order in our communities. You are shaped to be finer instruments for peacekeeping than the regular armed forces. You are expected not to disrupt, but, on the contrary, to preserve the way of life of the communities placed in your charge. For this reason, interaction with the community becomes an integral part of your work. Your mission is essentially preventive. To prevent threats to the peace from growing to a size that would require the intervention of our regular forces.

In the 85 years of its history, the Philippine Constabulary has, by and large, discharged this mission well. The ignoble use to which the previous government had sometimes put the Constabulary cannot obscure the distinction of its overall performance. Throughout our history there have been many movements that have sought to rend the fabric of our society. Only recently have any of these movements approached their objective. The vast majority of these attempts to break up our society have failed and this is thanks to the work of the Constabulary.

While keeping the peace is a difficult mission in itself, you have another role to play. Because your work requires your intimate involvement in the life of our communities, and because you wear the uniform of authority, you have the added responsibility to reflect the ethic of the new order you serve. This government stands for integrity, selfless service and self-sacrifice. I know that these qualities have generally marked the Constabulary and the police. In many areas of the country, you will stand out as symbols of the national government and its ideals. I have every confidence, my constables, that you will do us justice.

Congratulations to the Philippine Constabulary and the National Police. I wish all success in your missions.

Address of President Corazon Aquino at the dinner with the Generals

Address of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the dinner with the Generals

OFFERING THE INSURGENTS THE OLIVE BRANCH

President Aquino reiterates that offering the communists the branch of peace is not a sign of weakness on the part of the government: It is an essential part of unifying the nation once again so it can withstand the common enemy, in or out of the social mainstream. Her foreign visits to ASEAN and then to the United States will demonstrate where the country's past is rooted, and where the country's future belongs.

We seem to be seeing a lot of each other. My staff tease me that I seem most at ease in the company of priests and soldiers. Certainly, I am an unapologetic demander of professional excellence and dedication. And these are two vocations that, at their best, require most of these qualities.

You have shown patience and fortitude as we, your political leaders, have sought to bring the insurgents to the negotiating table. This is not an easy process and may well not be a successful one in its conclusions. But it must be tried. This chance for peace was what our people voted for in February. Offering the communists an olive branch is no sign of weakness. Rather it is an essential part of binding our nation together again so that we can withstand the common enemy, be he within or outside our society.

Another part of this political renewal are my foreign visits, first to ASEAN and then to the United States. The first demonstrates to our regional partners that we know where our past is rooted and where our future belongs. The second allows me to strengthen the bond with our oldest ally. I think the administration in Washington understands that more than a government changed here in February: We regained our national pride.

Whatever our economic difficulties, I will not be approaching Washington as a supplicant but as an ally and an equal.

The visit will, I believe, dramatically demonstrate to our friends abroad, and perhaps to opponents at home, how complete a new leaf has been turned over in Philippine national life. Just a year ago to imagine the Philippine President would be invited to address the Joint Houses of Congress would have been unthinkable.

Now we can all hold our heads high in the world, conferring as much honor as we receive on occasions like those. Our armed forces can hold their heads high also. You have played a loyal, and many of you, a heroic part, in the months of our national rebirth.

May I also say that a professional armed forces cannot run on commitment and honor alone. I think you all know how seriously my government is examining how, even with the present austerity, the pay and conditions of our troops can be improved. I am committed to this.

Does one congratulate a new general? I think so. To all of you the prayers of myself and our people. May you hold up the honor and integrity of our nation and help me bring peace to our land.

Some say peace is not possible. They must be the same ones who said that Cory will never be President and democracy will never come back. If you told me that peace is impossible, I would say to you what Bonaparte told one of his generals: “You write to me that it’s impossible; the word is not French.” I would say to you, “The word is not Filipino,” as our joint efforts showed early this year.

The French prescription for victory is: “Audace, audace, toujours audace.” And Patton, taking off from that, said that with audacity nothing is impossible in war And so in peace, nothing is impossible either if we have the courage to dare. At the same time as I ask you to renew your pledge to give peace a chance, let me assure you that I have no intention of allowing the enemy to make a peace table out of the corpse of our Christian republic.

To all of you, to my new generals, and to our great nation, that you have dedicated your lives to defending, I hold up my glass.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Opening of the Museo ng Malacañang

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Opening of the Museo ng Malacañang

[Released on August 16, 1986]

OPENING THE PALACE TO THE PEOPLE

The Museo ng Malacañang stands as a symbol of the living reality of a government open to the people and trying to become an integral part of their lives and hopes. This, according to President Aquino, is the only kind of government that will survive and succeed from now on.

I want to thank you for your interest in the Museo ng Malacañang Foundation. The Foundation President, Mrs. Regina Coseteng, and the Chairman of the Membership Committee, Mr. Roberto Romulo, have given you the program and objectives of the Foundation. I wish to express only the larger significance of this project.

The opening of Malacañang Palace to the public as a museum and as a historical site achieves one of the most important goals of those who dreamed and fought for Filipino freedom. Before the opposition had decided on a definitive course of action to seize power and restore democracy in this country, and even before I had accepted to lead the effort, it was widely held that the new government could not do better than throw the Palace open to the people. The paralysis of Philippine society and government, the inability of that government to do anything but steal for its private benefit, was traced to the distance that this Palace created between the people and their government. Its inaccessibility, the mystery of what it contained and what transpired here, strengthened the popular belief that government can only be a bane and no boon to their lives. This one gesture of opening the Palace to the people brings people and government together in a bond of mutual trust that should give enduring strength and confident direction to our country.

Previous governments had cordoned off Malacañang for security reasons. My predecessor denied even street access to this Palace and filled its grounds with troops. This was a terrible mistake. What little gain he made in his personal security was totally erased by what he lost in popular trust. There just isn't enough room in this park for the troops you would need to continue governing a people whose support and cooperation you had lost.

What we have done by opening the Palace is just a replication of the events of February where two things of great political importance were shown. The first is that real power must be rooted in popular support. The second is that nothing can offer better security than the people. You must remember that when the mutineers in Camps Aguinaldo and Crame got wind of the President's intention to take military action against them, their correct impulse was to throw open their gates and let in the people.

Some people think that this idea of a Museo ng Malacañang in the same grounds as the seat of power is a security nightmare. It is not. It is the ultimate security. I do not want any protection from the people. On the contrary, the only protection in which I have confidence is that which they alone can give.

The Museo ng Malacañang is not just the symbol but the living reality of a government open to the people, and trying to become an integral part of their lives and hopes. Given the high degree of politicization that 14 years of oppression and three years of glorious struggle have injected into our people, this is the only kind of government that will survive and succeed from now on.

I want you therefore to appreciate the importance of the project that has been entrusted to you: to preserve the symbolism and reality of our new democracy.

I wish to thank the Board of Trustees of the Foundation for the tremendous amount of time and energy they have so generously poured into the establishment of this Foundation. But, most of all, I wish to thank all of you here today for your support.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the TOYM Awarding Ceremony

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the TOYM Awarding Ceremony

AWARDS SHOULD GO TO THE RIGHT PEOPLE

The President believes that awards, whether given by the government or by civic organizations, must be given to those who really deserve them: recipients can either give distinction to, or disgrace, the awards they receive. At the TOYM awarding ceremony, she explains why she supports the idea of honoring excellence in the young, and informs the gathering about her move to refurbish the honors and laurels of the Republic.

Awards are intended to honor their recipients, but, if you think carefully about it, it is the recipients who give distinction to the awards they receive. Twenty-five years ago, Ninoy Aquino received the TOYM award. Between then and the present, quite a few other good men received it and a number of scoundrels as well. I point this out for two reasons.

One, it is good to honor excellence in the young. A person should know, before time has spent all his powers, what he has done right and well, while he has the energy to continue and build on that achievement. It is a mistaken prejudice to confine honor to a person's later years. The drive for excellence is fueled by the thirst for honor and this is nowhere stronger than among the young. Why waste the chance to bring out the best in the race?

The second reason is that awards in this country have been cheapened rather than hallowed by time. Remember what I said about the recipients distinguishing their awards? The high honor of a Nobel Prize arises from its success over time in maintaining the purity of the intention behind it and equally from the distinguished list of the people who received it, and not just from the fact that an explosives manufacturer had the remorse to create it and the wealth to fund it. Even so, recipients can disgrace the awards they receive.

A lot of this happened during the Marcos years when there was a systematic attempt to cheapen everything of real value in our country. I remember hearing people dismiss the courage of the Opposition as insanity, and its persistence as the mark of born losers. A lot of these oppositionists had received high honors under the old Republic and they saw these honors distributed indiscriminately among people who rightfully belonged in jail.

I have started to refurbish the honors and laurels of the Republic. Two weeks ago, I rescued the Legion of Honor from the shameful places in which I found it, around the necks of people who should have been execrated rather than decorated. I therefore conferred it on Senator Lorenzo M. Tañada, whose acceptance of the award raised it once more to its rightful place as the highest civilian honor the Republic can confer. I am going to work on the others, too. I am sure I shall not lack for heroes given the scope of the February Revolution and length of the struggle that preceded it.

As with official honors, so with a great number of awards given by civic organizations. Time-servers have sat on their boards of judges and used these honors to cover up vices rather than point up virtues.

It was therefore with great pleasure that I read the list of the 1985 TOYM Awardees. The selections honor the judges and restore the original lustre to this prized object of youthful striving. To the awardees, I say that the harsh conditions surrounding your particular achievements—a country on the brink of civil war, an economy in ruins—will mark you out for the special admiration of our people for many years to come.

Address of President Corazon Aquino on Recalling Ninoy Aquino's Supreme Sacrifice

Address of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On Recalling Ninoy Aquino's Supreme Sacrifice

[Held at Sto. Domingo Church, August 21, 1986]

RECALLING NINOY AQUINO'S SUPREME SACRIFICE

Three years after the assassination of her husband Ninoy Aquino, addressing the throng at Sto. Domingo Church once more, the President recalls the momentous events that shook the country: the millions who poured into the streets to pay tribute to Ninoy, the strengthening of the Opposition, the Presidential election campaign of 1986, the countless who said NO to the Marcos dictatorship, and the heroism of Namfrel volunteers and those who gave up their lives for freedom, like Evelio Javier.

It is hard to believe that it was only three years ago that we first gathered here for Ninoy's funeral Mass. We set off from here on the procession to his last resting place, some three million of us, marching in the heat and then in thunderstorm, in that moving tribute to his courage and martyrdom. I had sat in this church with a weight like a stone in my heart. The man who had given his family the strength even to bear his sufferings lay there, the flag draped over the coffin. But, as the march progressed, I felt that weight lifted from me by the millions of hands that Ninoy's spirit had infused with courage. He had not failed us even in death.

It was from this church, too, that we set forth for Liwasang Bonifacio for the "kick off of our seemingly quixotic campaign to beat the dictator in his own game of a Snap Election. And it was here, also, that we assembled again, the Sunday after he stole the elections, to thank God for our victory. For we were victorious. Victorious in the renewal of a nation rededicated to the ideals of freedom, justice, and democracy that had attended its birth. Victorious in the moral courage shown by the natural leaders of the people that emerged from the Church and the Opposition. Victorious, above all, in the raw physical courage of the ordinary people who, in the millions, staked their lives, with the abandon of seasoned warriors or the simplicity of faith, for just the hope of democracy. In all this, Ninoy's spirit was clearly at work. God in his mercy had finally granted Ninoy's incessant prayer to be one with a race that had rediscovered its pride.

Almost every homily preached after Ninoy's death gave voice to the conviction of our faith that new life rises from a martyr's death. The Gospel speaks of the seed that must fall to the ground and die to bring forth an abundant harvest. Ninoy himself, citing Gandhi, had called the willing sacrifice of the innocent "the most powerful answer to insolent tyranny that has yet been conceived by God and man." And as Ninoy rose to go with the military escort that had come for him and read his death in their eyes, he knew that it had fallen to his lot to give flesh and blood to these words: his flesh and his blood.

The days and months which came after August 21, 1983, revealed the truth of these beliefs. They made manifest another belief that Ninoy held: that courage is not so much instilled by preachment as caught by the contagion of example. The days and months in the three years that followed revealed still another truth: that courage is fortified by practice and sustained by faith and prayers.

During the days of the campaign, and the time of the elections, I saw the truth of these beliefs verified in the millions who had found the courage to say, "No more!" to the dictatorship. I saw it in the thousands of NAMFREL workers who labored tirelessly and at grave risk to bring out this message of rejection in all its shattering truth. I saw it in the sacrifice of Evelio Javier and in the millions who offered to make the same sacrifice, with their children in their arms, when they threw themselves around the camps at EDSA. I saw the truth of these beliefs in a multitude of acts of faith and courage that are now a part of the theology of our faith, and that must remain the vital force of our new democracy.

One man sprawled on the tarmac; one seed fallen to the ground, watered with blood. Tyranny had sowed a bullet and reaped a revolution. One man had worked the reluctant field of his people, finally threw in his life, and brought us home a harvest of freedom.

I accept with deep gratitude these gifts of medicine from the Spanish government and people. They are among the things we need most urgently to bind up the wounds of my people, wounds inflicted by long neglect and conflict. I shall cause these medicines to be distributed to the Ministries of National Defense, Health and Social Services.

The relationship between Spain and the Philippines is not one of those contrived and self-conscious relationships based on mutual self-interest. But of two old friends who don't really have to depend on each other. But the other one is always there in a time of need, without need for calling, as is the way with friends. We will not forget your unsolicited and unstinting support for the cause of Philippine democracy. And now these gifts. I won't say more; the best feelings are left unspoken between eternal friends.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on a State Banquet hosted by the President of the Republic of Indonesia and Madame Suharto

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On a State Banquet hosted by the President of the Republic of Indonesia and Madame Suharto

[Delivered in Indonesia, August 24, 1986]

STRIVING FOR UNITY IN DIVERSITY

During a state banquet hosted by the President of the Republic of Indonesia and Madame Suharto, President Aquino says that to seek unity in diversity (“Bhinneka Tunggal Ika”), as the Indonesians have done, is a noble task. She praises Indonesia’s achievements in food production. The Philippines likewise is giving priority to agriculture, with the aim of achieving self-reliance in food production and establishing a solid basis for industrial growth. It will also continue to make reforms and repair in all areas, despite the difficulties.

Permit me at the outset to express my profound appreciation for the invitation of your Excellency the President of the Republic of Indonesia and Madame Suharto to visit this country and enjoy its kind hospitality. This invitation demonstrates the friendship and attention that mark the association of our two countries and it is with a sense of great pride and respect that I am able, on behalf of my people, to renew that friendship today.

Further, I would like to take this opportunity, together with all the Filipino people, to convey my sincere congratulations to the Republic of Indonesia, which has just recently, on August 17th, commemorated the 41st anniversary of its proclamation of independence. The accomplishments of this nation have been great, and its pride well deserved.

The very gracious and warm reception that has been extended to me this evening and during my stay in Indonesia is no small measure of the special relationship enjoyed by our two countries. This relationship has been shaped by the many goals and aspirations that we share and by the similarities that we are fortunate to enjoy.

Ours are both cultures of great diversity, rich in custom and history. We believe, as you do, that it is an ennobling task to seek unity in diversity: “Bhinneka Tunggal Ika.” Ours are both countries and nations proud of our heritage, vigilant in the defense of our independence and of our freedom – for freedom is the birthright of every nation and independence is the product of struggle.

And ours are both countries striving for a better life for our peoples.

This is not a matter of economic development alone, for the process of growing as a society and as a nation involves many facets of development. Nor is it a matter of growth just for the sake of growth, for to pursue such a course is to pursue no course at all. Rather, we are seeking to develop in a manner consistent with the fundamental values of our race and culture, informed by the sad lessons of our recent past, and adapted to the challenges of the future.

Finally, ours are states whose tasks reach beyond the confines of our territories to the well-being of the broader communities of which we are a part. In the birth of ASEAN, we have seen the association of member nations determined to provide for the stability and peace of the region and the prosperity and happiness of its peoples. Further, we each strive for the creation of an order in the world which is based on independence, abiding peace, and social justice. Indeed, these high ideals are enshrined in the preamble of your Constitution.

It is said that Indonesia is a fighting nation, a nation of fighters committed to upholding the ideals of the nation. These emerged from Indonesia’s struggle for independence, even as its fighting spirit was tempered in the fires of that struggle. We too have known the suffering of external intervention, and we have recently emerged from our own struggle to remain true to ourselves and to the aspirations that underlie our society. And we recognize that this is part of a struggle that has no end because it is in striving to realize ideals that we mark our progress as a nation.

If, therefore, our fundamental concerns reveal a kinship greater than the natural affinity of race and proximity, we may consider ourselves and future generations fortunate. For this kinship holds the promise of ever increasing cooperation, and affords the opportunity to gain insight from the experiences of each other. We may draw lessons from our difficulties and comfort from our success.

It is in this spirit that I would like to consider the cornerstone of our countries' respective economic policies and that is agriculture. Allow me to express our profound admiration for Indonesia's achievements in food production. Following a carefully planned series of 5-year development plans that established agriculture as the focal point and prime mover of development efforts. Indonesia has succeeded, by dint of hard work and responsible leadership, in doubling its food production in the past 15 years. This is part of the development movement in Indonesia which takes into account three essential elements known as the trilogy of development: attaining equitable development, economic growth, and national stability. If Indonesia has given priority to the agricultural sector, this has been with the intention of raising the income and well-being of the millions of farmers and their families who form the largest segment of Indonesian society.

Similarly, the agricultural and rural sector of Philippine society must be given the utmost attention so that the 70 percent of our people who constitute our rural population can gain their rightful share of the nation's wealth and purchasing power. The objective is to achieve self-reliance in food production and establish a sound foundation for industrial growth. Therein lies the core of our recovery and development strategy.

The Philippine program of recovery is founded on the rebuilding of its democratic institutions and traditions which can alone provide stability to the political system. Mechanisms to hasten that process are now in place.

As you may be aware, in June of this year we entrusted a 49-person constitutional commission with the mandate to prepare a draft constitution for the country. This draft, soon to be completed, shall be considered by the Filipino people and, if accepted in a national referendum, shall become the fundamental law of the land. Thereafter we shall have an elected legislature to represent and fashion laws for the Filipino people. These will represent important steps in securing the kind of responsible leadership that will assure the political and economic stability of the Philippines over the long term.

These qualities, of course, are already exhibited by Indonesia to a remarkable degree. For hand in hand with carefully executed development plans, the Indonesian economy has been prudently managed. Even in the face of economic adversity caused by falling commodity prices, the Indonesian government has gained praise from its creditors and international financial institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank. Inflation in Indonesia is well under control, the foreign debt is within manageable proportions, and foreign exchange reserves are substantial. Indonesia has shown itself capable of adapting to changing economic conditions while maintaining the trust of the international banking and financial community. Unfortunately, it was profligacy rather than prudence that marked the management of the Philippine economy. But I believe that we have done our part to regain that trust. We excised that profligate management with the care of surgeons working on a patient whose life hung in the balance, careful not to inflict any damage to an already fragile system. We have immensely increased our international reserves, stabilized the exchange rates, effected fiscal reforms, renegotiated our debts with our international creditors, and have started on a massive employment generation program to immediately address the chief affliction of our society's mass poverty. All this while laboring under a 26 billion dollar debt that eats half our export earnings to be serviced and is nowhere reflected among the resources at the disposal of our economy. Indeed, we shall need more than trust from that community; we shall need understanding and sympathy, even as we shall need the encouragement of friends like Indonesia.

We shall continue to make reforms and repair in all areas, knowing fully the difficulties that we now face and addressing them with patience and foresight. We shall raise the funds required to fuel our economy from both domestic and foreign sources. We shall honor our debts and foster an environment in which business and enterprise may flourish. We shall address the needs of the present and establish a sound foundation for the future.

The Philippines now seeks to rejoin its ASEAN neighbors on the path to economic, social and political progress. Nineteen years ago, representatives of Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand gathered in Bangkok with the desire “to establish a firm foundation for common action to promote regional cooperation in Southeast Asia in the spirit of equality and partnership and thereby contribute towards peace, progress, and prosperity in the region.” To the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, we renew our pledge of support. Its purposes of accelerating economic growth, social progress, and cultural development in the region and furthermore of promoting regional peace and stability continue to hold great promise for the future.

To this ASEAN vision of cooperation and amity, Indonesia and the Philippines bring a long history of friendship, support, and sharing of common goals that has had the effect of a catalyst on the ASEAN effort to achieve the same things.

As of today, our two countries have forged no less than 43 bilateral agreements on subjects ranging from extradition to the purchase of oil. The Indonesian government has also consistently extended assistance to the Philippines. We deeply appreciate the efforts of Indonesia to ensure the continuity of our rice and oil supplies during critical times. We are in the same way grateful for her endless patience in allowing our use of the Palapa satellite. To archipelagoes like Indonesia and the Philippines, satellite communication is indispensable for the promotion of national unity and development.

Direct interaction among our peoples is healthy and increasing. In certain areas, they have become important enough to merit regulation by mutual agreement of our governments. A good example is our flourishing border trade.

We have also adopted common approaches to the economic challenges confronting us. Indonesia and the Philippines joined efforts in the adoption of the Archipelagic Doctrine by the International Convention on the Law of the Sea in order to take advantage of the doctrine’s infinite economic implications for our respective countries.

But nowhere has Indonesian-Philippine solidarity found more eloquent and higher expression than in the commitment to the ASEAN vision. Although our two countries are the largest members of ASEAN, we have consistently honored by faithful practice and supported its procedure of decision by consensus among equals. Without doubt, this has contributed greatly to the growing influence of the Association.

We are proud that ASEAN will commemorate its 20th anniversary next year by holding a summit conference in Manila. We believe that it is appropriate to consider fresh avenues and ideas, particularly in the fields of trade and industry, to give greater momentum to ASEAN. Let us invest the organization of our region with all our efforts in order that it may continue to play the valuable role that its history has led us to expect.

I now stand before you holding the reins of a free Republic. We have emerged from a turmoil that brought us to the edge of calamity but that has provided us with a renewed faith in our capacity to overcome our problems and realize the full potential of our nation. And as we set out on our new course, we are heartened by the confidence and support of the Indonesian nation. Recognizing that the interests of our two countries, and those of the region, are closely intertwined, we trust and believe that we will work even more closely together to achieve the ideals of our nations.

In this spirit, I ask you to stand and join me in a toast to the continued good health of President Suharto, the progress of his great country under his leadership, the special friendship of our two nations, and the flourishing brotherhood of the peoples of ASEAN.

OVERCOMING ASEAN MEMBERS' SELF-INTERESTS

To a great extent, the President says, the ASEAN economies have gone their separate ways, emphasizing linkages outside the region and pursuing respective self-interests. Despite this, the members have friendly ties, and the goals of ASEAN have been achieved. The task now is to find renewing gestures of a friendship that will last.

As you know, I have just arrived from visits to two ASEAN countries, Indonesia and Singapore. With the leadership of each country I discussed issues particular to the relationship between the Philippines and that country. But, from both, my people received, in the person of their President, a warmth and depth of affection one could expect only from kinfolk. It was this sentimental outpouring that constituted the ASEAN component of my first official trip abroad. I am sure that I would have encountered the same warm fellowship from the other ASEAN countries, if the pressing duties of my office had not prevented me from extending my trip. So, although I expressed before the ASEAN Ministerial meeting that was recently held in Manila some impatience over the slow progress of ASEAN towards its stated objectives, I must now say that ASEAN will endure regardless of the speed or, I have learned to state things diplomatically, the circumspection with which the Association proceeds towards its objectives. And I have come to appreciate the tremendous value of the mere existence of the Association and the great contribution that a continuing dialogue rooted in durable affection has made to the stability, peace, and, yes, the potential for progress of the region.

I see ASEAN now as the regional analogue of the democracy that my people gloriously reestablished in their country. For the value of a democracy lies not so much in the actual achievement of its present objectives but in the limitless creativity and potential it releases and in the sense of community it fosters. For a democracy is a process of continuing reappraisal and correction, of taking stock from time to time in the belief that the future will always reveal something new that should cause us to reevaluate the steps we have taken and even the goals that we established when we first set out. And this is necessary so that the policies and objectives we set for ourselves do not harden because of long veneration into obstacles to the attainment of our ultimate goals or become distractions from the things we really want.

ASEAN was established as an instrument for fostering regional cooperation. That cooperation, it was felt, would contribute greatly to the economic growth of the particular members of the Association. The progress of each particular country in the region would in turn contribute to its general stability and peace.

If we take this progression of steps as a complete statement of the meaning of ASEAN, then we might well feel disappointed at the record. Particular projects of economic complementation have failed or have never even gotten off the ground. To a great extent, the ASEAN economies have gone their separate ways, emphasizing linkages outside the region, in the pursuit of their respective self-interests. Almost all the steps that were deemed essential to the attainment of ASEAN's objectives and indicative of the respect in which its members held it have largely failed, as I have said. And yet, peace and stability reign in the region. And, as I was delighted to discover in my recent trip, the amity and affection among its members are as strong as one could wish.

Perhaps we have failed to see the forest for the trees. The goals of ASEAN have been achieved. They were there already at her foundation. How else was it possible for our countries to come together and work out the structure of an association dedicated to goals that seemed irrelevant to Southeast Asia at the time? The region was the horrified spectator of a terrible conflict. Never had the world seen such a convergence of so much hate, blood, technology, and anguish in such a small place. We converged in Bangkok to create this Association with a great fund of peace, friendship, and stable affections for one another already in our hearts. We gathered to reassure one another that these good feelings were very much alive and created the ASEAN to serve as the expression of those feelings and as an instrument to make sure that they will abide.

What else is the meaning of efforts at complementarity among economies that are so much alike? So much alike because we come from one family and live in neighboring countries that naturally share nearly identical natural features. The best and brightest of ASEAN's minds bent their intellects to refute the economic wisdom against the integration of the region's economies. That is very Asian and democratic as well. For it is the way of Asians who are deep friends to go out of their way to strengthen a friendship that needs no improvement. This is also the way of democracy. For in the freedom it guarantees, some of us can thrive better if we go our separate ways but we don't. We don't because, in addition to the private fruits of freedom, we wish to enjoy as well the incomparable joy and fulfillment of community.

And so I return from my ASEAN journey bringing back the greatest advantage and benefit that I could have hoped from it. I bring back word of the enduring friendship and affection among the peoples of our region. Now I see the meaning of my ASEAN journey. It was as though I had told my friends and fellow countrymen here that I was leaving merely to visit our friends in ASEAN to bring them our well wishes and assuredly bring back their best regards. To peoples who come from a heritage of hate and enmity, this may seem a slight reason for the grave occasion of a state visit, but not to the peoples of ASEAN who have shared a long history of friendship.

And so I say to you, we reached the goals of ASEAN a long time ago, long before its foundation. Our work today is to find renewing gestures of a friendship that is certain to abide. I know that this message, instead of discouraging you with the redundancy of your tasks, will inspire you to work harder to bring the economies of the region as close together as our hearts.

What I have told you today is merely the unspoken truth of our long standing relations that I have come to fully appreciate. And you will forgive me, I hope, for the excitement and delight of my discovery.

Welcome, our friends, to our home.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Alay sa Kawal Foundation

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the Alay sa Kawal Foundation

REMEMBERING OF FALLEN SOLDIERS

FAMILIES

Being a widow who also lost a husband “in the front lines,” the President feels a special sympathy for the families of fallen soldiers. Unlike her family, however, the families of fallen soldiers have very little resources. For this reason, there is great need for a project like the Alay sa Kawal Foundation.

I have a special sympathy for the families of our fallen soldiers. I say this not just because these heroes of our new armed forces lost their lives in the service and defense of our new government. I have a special sympathy for them because I too am a widow: I too lost a husband in the front lines.

Ninoy, you might say, was with the advance troops of our people power march to freedom, as your husbands and fathers were in the forefront of the defense of this freedom that we had regained. And like them, he fell in the line of duty. I therefore know the pain of loss, the difficulty of carrying on and keeping the family together when the better and stronger half is no longer by one's side, and the pride of being the surviving heir of a great sacrifice.

But my family is more fortunate than the other bereaved families your organization seeks to assist. We had financial and other resources to draw upon even after the head of our household had passed away. The families of our fallen soldiers are rarely left so secure. I am glad you did not simply choose to observe this sorry state of affairs and shake your heads with regret. You have taken the recourse I hope more of our privileged citizens will take in the future. After seeing, you took action. I am particularly appreciative of the efforts of the volunteers that came forward from the Philippine College of Surgeons, some 65 of them so far, who generously responded to the call of Alay sa Kawal with their free and expert services. These volunteers, among whom are some of the most distinguished names in the medical profession, will supplement the services of the military hospitals on a need basis.

Sabihin ninyo na makulit ako, I have said it before and I will say it again – we shall rebuild and we shall recover only by collective effort and we shall heal our wounds only by the help and care we give one another. The wounds of this nation were self-inflicted. Filipino having hurt brother Filipino, the wounds were deeper than the weapons had reached. Only the ministrations of fellow Filipinos will be able to heal them.

But there is an even better reason why it is important that we reach out and help the people around us who are hurt and suffering. We claim to be a Christian nation, and we point to the February Revolution as a marvelous manifestation of our deep faith. Well, those who claim to have faith, but whose deeds do not manifest it, are really not of the faith at all, according to the book of James. And James goes on to say, “If a brother or a sister is naked and short of daily nourishment, and one of you says to them: ‘Go in peace, keep warm and eat,’ but you do not give them what they need for their bodies, what good does it do? So even faith, if it does not have the acts of faith, is a dead thing in itself.” We should show our faith from our actions.

Or to put this more in the context of the goals of your organization, James also writes: “This is the pure and undefiled worship before our God and Father: to care for orphans and widows in their affliction.” I tell the visitors who come to admire the land and people of the February Revolution that no one can understand what happened here who does not see the role of faith in our lives. The work of the Alay sa Kawal Foundation expresses more than patriotism and civic duty: it is the acting out of our faith in the same manner as our Revolution.

God bless you and I wish you all the success you deserve.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Palanca Awards for Literature

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Palanca Awards for Literature

[Released on September 1, 1986]

HONORING THE COUNTRY'S WRITERS

On the occasion of the 36th awards night of the Palanca Memorial Awards for Literature, the President pays tribute to the country's writers, recalling that writers had a special place in the heart of her husband Ninoy (who started his career as a journalist). She declares that writers are the people's conscience, and that they must look deep into their hearts and speak truthfully about what they see. Filipino writers today, she concludes, have a great advantage because they are writing for an audience committed to truth and freedom.

Tonight we honor our writers and celebrate the 36th year of the Don Carlos Palanca Memorial Awards for Literature. I congratulate this year's winners for their creative works and join them in paying tribute to Mr. Carlos Palanca. His unwavering support for Philippine literature since 1950 bears a bountiful harvest every year in fiction, poetry, and drama. It can truly be said, after more than three decades, that the Palanca Awards are the hallmark and pillar of our flourishing literature.

I am honored and happy to be among writers tonight. Writers occupied a special place in Ninoy's heart. His first job, as you know, was as a newspaperman trying to recapture Filipino heroism in Korea. I myself find among my happiest moments those times when I find solace and inspiration in a writer's work.

Today, we enjoy the blessings of our new-found freedom and face the daunting task of rebuilding our country in order to preserve that freedom in which literature flourishes best. I know that you as writers cherish our country's freedom, and that your works glow with love for our people and our way of life. Behind you is a noble and stirring tradition going back to the first Philippine Revolution, when sword and pen went hand in hand. During the long dark night preceding the February Revolution, our writers were at the forefront too, wielding pens for lack of swords, and unwittingly prefiguring the unarmed revolution that succeeded, where weapons could not, in restoring our freedom.

I am confident therefore that you as writers will continue the good fight, for it is not over. Your first Muse, as with Rizal, is Inang Bayan. You are sensitive to issues of justice and human dignity because all great works of literature rest on the inestimable worth of the human spirit.

Where writers are free, there is the truest freedom. There is no surer sign of a true democracy. People often think that the writer is a non-conformist, an individualist, someone, therefore, whose life and work cannot be relevant to real events and pressing issues. The conclusion is wrong. The premises are necessary. A writer does not write for any particular group or ideology, for otherwise he is not free. He writes for himself, he writes for that part of himself that all men have in common whatever group or ideology has them in its grip. The writer must distance himself even from the very things he loves and believes in, so that he can see clearly and dispassionately the truth about them. It is only by this temporary solitude that he is able to rediscover or create values and weave them into the thread that really binds a people together, the thread of their triumphs and disappointments, their griefs and their joys; that make us recognize each other as brothers.

As all men of good will now join forces in rebuilding our country, you as writers have a very important part to play.

You are the memory of the race. Your stories, poems, and plays endow the history of our nation and the lives of our people with form and meaning. You mourn our failures and celebrate our victories. This is an uncompromising task, for a people is only as wise and strong as its memory.

You are our people's conscience. You look deep into our hearts and speak truthfully of what you see. Your vision is not distorted by dogma or prejudice, not even your own. In this, you are selfless. You speak for those who are speechless and powerless, be they rich or poor, but whose lives could speak volumes.

Finally, as a conserver and creator of values, you serve our future. You work in the present because that is all that is within any man's grasp, but you draw from our people's memory and conscience a vision of the future by which our lives in the present are strengthened and enriched.

As the leader of a people trying to rebuild their country, I would like to think that, tonight, I am with one of my most important partners in this task. I would like my presence here tonight to be seen as an indication of the importance I place upon that partnership.

Much has been said about the relationship between the writer and the state, but for all the passion and ink that have been spent to define it, the relationship remains murky and fraught with suspicion on both sides.

All our Constitutions, except that of Malolos, guarantee state patronage of arts and letters. This guarantee remains in the Freedom Constitution and undoubtedly will be preserved in the new constitution. This simply stated guarantee, I believe, describes the ideal relationship between writer and state, and provides the proper measure for evaluating and adjusting reality.

It will be my Government's measure. I am convinced that writers offer a gift to the nation and none should stand as an obstacle between them and the people. I know that the state, wittingly and unwittingly, has sometimes been such an obstacle. There were many instances when the state met the writer with the heavy arm of antagonism or the thick wall of indifference rather than with the hand of assistance.

The cynicism, if not outright hostility, with which many writers view the state was therefore inevitable. I work against that inevitability when I issue my call for their helping hand. The Government now asks writers to help in undoing what Government, with the help of some of their own brethren, has done to the partnership between writers and the state.

This Government hears the many voices that speak of the present plight of writers. It accepts its responsibility to create those conditions, material or otherwise, congenial to the writer's exercise of his craft. My Government acknowledges that freedom to write must be accompanied by conditions that encourage creativity.

The writer must have easy access to the works of literature that are being produced both here and abroad. For a writer belongs to two countries: his own and the world of literature against which he tests his mastery of the craft and the validity of his vision. A tariff reduction measure has been adopted to improve this access but it is not enough. Further measures to enhance it will be seriously studied. Along with them will be measures to encourage the publication of local works of literature. In this respect, media can help, for traditionally the media have been the first door that gives the writer access to his audience. I refer not only to the print media but to radio and television as well.

The writer must have some assurance that his needs as a human being will be met. He must, through his craft and without any violation of its integrity, be able to acquire the means whereby he lives and the recognition which gives fulfillment to his life and labors. Not as a special privilege but as a matter of justice.

If support and assistance to writers and artists in general shall be the orientation of my administration, respect for their autonomy shall be one of its hallmarks. I fully understand the jealous sense of independence of writers because I share it, along with the millions of our people who refused to take any more dictation and did something about it.

Writers today are working with already one great advantage over writers of the past, they write with certainty that they are reaching men and women whose commitment to truth survived and triumphed over 14 years of lies. This is a great consolation, I am sure, and an equally great challenge. And I am sure you will be equal to it.

SEEKING PEACE IN THE SOUTH

In a meeting with leaders of Mindanao before returning to the South on a mission of peace, President Aquino expresses her belief that peace and progress can be attained on conditions that are fair to all sectors of Mindanao. In the Philippines, being now a democratic nation, there is room for coexistence among different ideas, cultures, and societies. Ideas and cultures may be diverse, but there is no conflict in the basic desire for the peace and progress of the country.

I have invited you here, to break bread with me, because you are among the chief leaders of Mindanao. The peace and progress of Mindanao depend on your support. Tomorrow I fly South to meet with the other leaders who were not able to make it here. I shall also meet with Nur Misuari who has come in from Jeddah. This completes the circle of leadership upon which, as I said, the peace and progress of Mindanao depend.

It follows from this recognition of your roles that peace and progress is possible on terms that are fair to all the sectors of Mindanao, just to the Filipino nation as a whole, and faithful to the principles for which it stands. But there shall be no derogation of the integrity of the Republic. I have pledged to transform Mindanao from a land of broken promises, of warring communities, to one of fulfillment in unity.

The Filipino nation is democratic if it is anything. There is room within the broad conception of Philippine democracy for all manner of ideas, cultures and societies to co-exist and thrive. What is needed is our mutual respect and support for the wide spectrum of ideas and cultures that make up the rich diversity of this one nation under God.

There is a rich diversity of ideas and cultures but no conflict in the basic desire we all share for the peace and progress of our one country.

My visit to the South again is intended to start a round of consultations in the areas where Muslims and Christians co-exist in order to bring them together in a common effort to uplift their communities and establish the material foundation of their political and spiritual growth. I invite you to take part in these consultations that are specifically intended to reorient the policies and energies of government in your areas in the direction you think best. No one can presume to know this better than you. That is the character of this government, the nature of a true democracy. Our great people who snatched victory and freedom from the jaws of calamity, by signal acts of self-sacrifice and courage, will have it no other way.

The world envies us for our achievement. It was an achievement not only of oppositionists who stood firm for democracy in the spirit of non-violence but of loyalists who held back in the spirit of brotherhood and patriotism. If we were able to exercise self-restraint and show brotherhood in the heat of partisan conflict, surely we can work together in the common love of country for the peace and progress of all our people.

Long live the Republic!

Address of President Corazon Aquino Before the Zamboangeños

Address of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines Before the Zamboangeños

[Held in Zamboanga City, September 5, 1986]

TOWARD IN THE CITY OF FLOWERS

RECONCILIATION

Addressing soldiers and civilians in Zamboanga City, “the flower of the South,” President Aquino recalls the city’s commitment to democracy and those Zamboangeños who died for freedom, like Cesar Climaco. She declares that the people of Mindanao, whether Christian or Muslim, are brave, strong, and fiercely jealous of their rights. Thus, no side should dictate on the other. Only when Filipinos are united as one people can Philippine progress be achieved.

Your city has been known as the flower of the South, the thriving center of Southern industry and entrepreneurship for nearly four centuries, and the model of Muslim and Christian community. It is also a shining example of commitment to democracy. Last February, the opposition won overwhelmingly in this city. You threw your great numbers and courage behind the effort to oust the dictatorship and reestablish democracy in our country. You have given generously of your brave children, among them Cesar Climaco, to the cause of Filipino freedom. Although you are far from its political center, you are close to the democratic spirit of the Republic, and closer to my heart for the bravery and commitment you have shown.

I am here to bring the national government to you, the democratic government you helped install, on the pledge of its leadership to govern in consultation with the people. No one can presume to tell you your needs for in the end it is you who will bear the burden of meeting them. The policies of government are paid by the people, so let the people say what those policies should be. I am here to initiate a round of consultations with the political and civic leaders of Region 9. I met with some of them in Manila last night. I flew South this morning to meet with the rest. Earlier today I met with Nur Misuari. With that we complete the circle of leadership on whose support and cooperation depends the future peace and progress of Mindanao.

I said to some of your leaders last night that there can be peace and therefore progress in Mindanao only on the basis of mutual respect and support for the various aspirations of the several sectors of this island, Christian and Muslim. We cannot build to the full potential of this great and promising island on the shattered dreams and betrayed hopes of any one of these sectors. That is a weak foundation for a durable peace. There is no way out. The people of Mindanao, be they Christian or Muslim, are too brave and strong and fiercely jealous of their rights to accept any infringement of one by the other of their dignity and autonomy. We shall either progress as one united people or perish as warring factions. Unity is the price we must pay for progress. But why must we consider it a price and not a gift? Look at the freedom and pride we gained by being united. Is there anything our great people cannot achieve in unity? There is little we can achieve divided. We waste our energies and, tragically, our lives fighting for the goal of peace we all desire.

Our country was made poor by tyranny; its riches were wasted, even its future was mortgaged. We have a great deal to do to make up for the years of Philippine progress that might have been if we had not lost our freedom. But even before we launch our country again on the path of progress. There is a triumph that already lies within our reach: the religious and cultural reconciliation of our nation. Let us show the world that Muslims and Christians can live together, not just in the spirit of tolerance, but with the fervor of common patriotism and in a joint endeavor to achieve the progress we all deserve as Filipinos.

I have gone to the South three times since I became President. My first trip outside Manila as President was to Mindanao. My first trip abroad was to our ASEAN neighbors in the South. I reach down South time and again to the well-spring of our race and culture, the fountain of its native courage, to renew my strength, my resolve and my faith in the mission of my Presidency and the vision of our future for which you and I staked our lives and fortunes in the Revolution.

To you, my soldiers in this far-flung frontier of the Republic, I come to see with my eyes the battle-tested honor and valor of our race, and the fidelity of the Filipino to the vision of one united country. When Filipinos, from faction or ignorance, forgot that vision and turned on one another in a conflict that threatened to rend our country apart, you, soldiers of the Republic, stood fast by your thankless duty to keep our country intact. Hated by many, suspected by most, you stood by the flag ready to lay down your lives to stop anyone from ripping the Southern star from its field. Your sacrifices were not in vain nor will they ever be. The peace we seek will be the crowning glory, and not a betrayal, of the unity for which you fought and that I am pledged to preserve.

I have read the record of your bravery and, leaving behind this portion of the Republic, I know I leave it in good hands. I shall work earnestly for the peace the soldier longs for most. He has known so little of it. I shall pray and work that it shall come swiftly so that he can be reunited with his family. But it must come honorably. For honor is the soldier's life and the first virtue of our Republic. In the time before a lasting and honorable peace is achieved, my soldiers, keep watch over our people, protect their lives and properties, their dignity and freedom. I leave you with the noble and mournful duty to preserve them for the peace that may come, even if it means that you yourselves may never see it. That is the fate of the soldier. He reads it in the flag he defends: The blue of peace rests upon the red of sacrifice.

PEACE: THE SOLDIER'S DREAM

Mindanao belongs to all, whether Muslim or Christian, who have shed blood and tears to make it a home for Filipinos. Speaking before soldiers of the First Brigade and constables of the Territorial Command, President Aquino tells them that their sacrifices have not been in vain. She urges the soldiers to keep the faith, and to pursue the elusive dream of peace.

I have come here to renew myself in the spirit of your great courage and unfaltering devotion to our country. Sitting at my desk in the Palace and listening to people complain about others or make requests, of course, all for the sake of the country, I begin to feel a little despondent. That is when I seize the first opportunity to be back among my soldiers, especially those in the farthest and most dangerous frontiers of the Republic. Here, among men who live only by honor, duty, and country, I am able to renew my strength, my resolve, and my faith.

Sentinels of the southern frontiers, I want you to know that your sacrifices are seen and acknowledged. The great distance from here to the capital cannot dim the lustre of your honor and valor. Nor will your sacrifices be in vain. No portion of the Republic can ever be alienated where her soldiers have spilled their blood. Nothing can supersede a claim based on sacrifice. Mindanao belongs to all, be they Muslim or Christian, who have expended sweat, tears and blood to make it a home for Filipinos. It belongs to the Republic as the legacy of her heroes who fought and died for the vision of a Philippines that is free and strong and united from Batanes to Jolo. That vision is still a reality thanks to you, soldiers of the Republic, who stood fast by it even when the communities around you lost sight of it because of faction and misunderstanding. Keep the faith, my soldiers, for I am here with you true to my word that I shall ask for no sacrifice greater than I myself am prepared to make, nor send you to any perils that I myself am not prepared to embrace. I am here also to fulfill my pledge to try to bring an honorable peace to our country, a peace that will meet the just demands of the contending forces without detracting from the honor of the Armed Forces. Peace is the soldier's dream, for he has known it so little, just as honor is his life. You and I will make an earnest effort to achieve the first, but we shall never lose the second. Ninoy's favorite words were those of the soldier who said, "All is lost but honor."

Long live the New Armed Forces of the Philippines!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Pride in Being a Filipino

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the Pride in being a Filipino

PRIDE IN BEING A FILIPINO

The Philippines is still a poor nation, but it has already achieved that for which greater nations bend all their efforts: a glorious and unparalleled achievement that will excite the admiration of the world.

I have given the various reasons for accepting the invitation to visit the United States. I shall meet with the American President and address the American Congress. I shall meet with our expatriate countrymen whose prayers contributed to the happy outcome of our revolution. I shall also be meeting our creditors and the leaders of the international business and financial community. I shall bring before them the problems of our country whose solutions, I believe, should be as much their concern as ours. But no reason will give me as much pleasure as that which really impelled me to accept the invitation. And that is to stand before them, as the President of our people, and the living proof of their power and courage. I shall remind them all of what Filipinos can accomplish when they set their minds and hearts to it. I shall do this to convince them that they can depend on us to meet the unfair obligations that we, out of honor, have taken upon ourselves. But I shall do it principally out of pride, pride in being a Filipino, pride in what he now represents in the eyes of all the peoples of the world, especially those who suffer oppression: freedom, democracy and peace, and the courage to win and preserve them.

We are still a poor nation, but we have already achieved that for which greater nations bend all their efforts: a glorious and unparalleled achievement that will excite the admiration of the world. Whatever others will say, you and I, my people, know that that achievement in the form of a restored democracy will never be lost. Those who are afraid that my absence will endanger that democracy are those on whom we cannot depend to protect it. For democracy here is not held up by me alone but by the Power of the People that won it.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino upon her arrival in San Francisco, United States of America

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Upon her arrival in San Francisco, U.S.A.

[Delivered in San Francisco, September 15, 1986]

AT HOME IN A FAIR CITY

President Aquino shares with Americans proud memories of a democracy won back and the excitement of building a new country.

San Francisco was the first stop on that life or death mission to give my husband, Ninoy, a triple heart by-pass in Dallas. Ninoy felt very weak on the plane. But when we stopped over here and Ninoy breathed in the clear, blue air of San Francisco, he immediately revived. The color went back in his cheeks. That's the effect of freedom on anybody who has been denied it too long. I felt it, too. I can't say I feel it now, for I come from my country that has just won its freedom. And so, now, I guess I feel somewhat at home arriving here in your fair city. I say only somewhat for I feel here the strong and rich earth, and the vigor of America, that has sustained its democracy. We Filipinos are not so fortunate yet to have the progress to keep our democracy going forever. But we are starting. We are starting to put our country back in shape, starting to rebuild a many-pillared house worthy of our new democracy. I have come to America to share with its people our proud memories of how we won back democracy and the excitement of building a new country. I have come here also to thank the American people for their prayers and their cheers as we Filipinos advanced to freedom in our country. My Government has issued several formal reasons for my visit here, having to do with economic and political issues of bilateral concern. They are all valid reasons that I am going to press hard for. But to tell the truth, the overriding reason I am here is because I wanted to see our friends. Thank you for your warm and gracious welcome.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Power of Prayer

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the Power of Prayer

[Delivered at the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D. C., September 16, 1986]

POWER OF PRAYER

Freedom was the Filipino's greatest reward. But the real price was the reaffirmation of his faith, the demonstration of its power.

I would like to thank Filipinos and friends of Filipinos in Washington for your significant contribution to the restoration of freedom and democracy in the Philippines.

Some of you may be asking, what exactly is this great contribution I refer to? Well, aside from the financial assistance and political lobbying and support extended to us by our friends in this state, I refer particularly to your prayers. For I am told that, at the height of our recent political crisis, many Christian groups and individuals in Washington and other parts of the United States prayed earnestly for us.

Those not firm in the faith cannot understand the power of prayers. Those who are, never fail to be amazed and delighted at how they are answered. As proven to us last February, the answers come in the most unforeseen ways, and always exceeding human expectation and understanding.

We know by faith that nothing happens by accident. Christ knows full well what He put into us and what He must put us through to make us what we must be. I do not fully understand why it is I who am the President of a free country today, except that I, who was not made for politics, led a people who had lost faith in politics and led them to victory.

Who of us can claim to have sequenced the events that led to our successful bloodless revolution? How could those cunning minds in the previous government have made the blunder of making a martyr of my husband? And in such an ill-planned way? Why did the dictator open his mouth on American television only to swallow defeat in the snap election? What possessed our people to produce a million signatures to convince me to run? What moved them to risk their lives to protect my votes in the polls and proclaim my victory in the streets? Why did the military defect when it did? Who stayed the hand of Marcos as it poised to smash us? And why were Filipinos, who watched my husband fast nearly unto death, without a murmur of protest or pity, suddenly stirred to concern and action when he was already dead?

It began with the willing sacrifice of one man and ended with the offer of sacrifice of millions.

In assessing the gains of our uprising in Manila, I would say that freedom was our great reward. But the real prize was the reaffirmation of our faith, the demonstration of its power.

The Filipino raised his head and turned a new face to the world, the face of faith and courage.

And so it is that I thank you today for your prayers and ask you to continue with them. I stand here as living proof of their global reach. We need them in our country still. Freedom is priceless but memories are short.

I ask you to pray for me, that I be spiritually guided in every decision that I make. I request that you pray for our government, that we do not become an organization of men for the control of men; that we do not act like kings but rather as servants of the people and the one true king. And so that, once more, there might be peace and prosperity in our land. For it is also written that Christ completes what He has started in our hearts. And I pray that that time will not be far away.

Message of President Corazon Aquino at a Dinner in her Honor hosted by Secretary of State George Schultz

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At a Dinner in her honor hosted by Secretary of State George Schultz

[Delivered in Washington, D.C., September 17, 1986]

A NEW DAY

Once more Filipinos stand proud and are able to honor the democracy that Americans helped them win. No longer need there be shame abroad or repression at home in the conduct of the nation's affairs. The text of Mrs. Aquino's toast is preceded by the text of the toast made by Secretary of State George Schultz.

Secretary Schultz: Tonight is something special.

There are so many good friends here from the Philippines, and so many Americans who care about the Philippines. It's a real family evening.

I can't recall when there has been this sort of genuine enthusiasm for welcoming a foreign dignitary. I'm pleased to see members of the Presidential Observer Delegation. Would you stand up, please?

I note a number of others. Would all the senators and congressmen stand up, please?

Would those here from the American corporate and financial world – all American businessmen – rise for just a moment?

How about those from academic life?

And those from the media, would you stand up, please?

Madame President, these are important people. They make things happen. These men and women play a special role in helping to shape our national policies and major economic decisions. The warmth of their welcome for you shows the kind of support that your leadership has generated on the part of the American people. It clearly says to me – and should say to others – that we are on your side.

Just as the Philippines is itself in the midst of an historic renewal, your visit here has laid the groundwork for a new chapter in Philippine-American dialogue. We have the opportunity to build upon our longstanding friendship and to strengthen our cooperative efforts on the basis of mutual respect and common interest.

Through both good times and bad, our peoples have had a long history together. Today, our partnership makes an irreplaceable contribution to stability and peace in the Pacific. As importantly, our societies share a basic belief in democracy and free enterprise.

Americans were profoundly moved by the courage of the Filipino people in seeking a new birth of democracy in their own land. We were impressed that you have sought not only the return of representative government, but national reconciliation as well.

There is still much to be done. In seeking to reestablish democratic institutions, to bring an end to insurgent violence, and to reanimate the economy, your government faces formidable tasks. These are, at heart, Philippine problems requiring Philippine solutions. Our message to you is simple: We stand ready to help in whatever appropriate way we can. The President, the Congress and the American people energetically support your efforts for democracy, peace and prosperity in the Philippine Republic.

I have been personally heartened by the progress that your government has made. The drafting of a new democratic constitution, the scheduling of elections, and the investigations into corruption and human rights abuses are important steps forward. You have strengthened judicial integrity. You have worked to restore the professionalism of the Philippine military.

The problems of bringing an end to the insurgency in the countryside are particularly difficult – but we have been impressed by the wisdom of your strategy of combining readiness for dialogue with a firm determination to resist insurgent efforts at intimidation and violence.

Your growth-oriented strategy for economic reform – based on free market principles – is sending an important and positive signal about the vitality of the Philippines' future. We have noted your government's initial successes in stabilizing the peso, negotiating an IMF agreement, freeing up producer prices, and dismantling crony monopolies. After two years of decline, real economic growth is now projected for 1986.

Now is an important chance for American firms to support the Philippines' economic recovery. Earlier, I asked all of the American businessmen here to stand up. But we also have some of the leading businessmen of the Philippines in the audience as well. My question to all of you is: Why don't you guys get together? Now is the time to do so. To my mind, increased American investment in the Philippines and greater trade between us is not just a question of good diplomacy – it's good business for both Americans and Filipinos alike.

I'm bullish on the Philippines. And for good reason. I believe in the energy and genius of the Filipino people. I see enlightened public policies on the part of a government commanding broad popular support.

It is with a sense of optimism, friendship and shared purpose that I ask you to rise – one more time – and join me in a toast:

- To President Corazon Aquino and the continuing efforts of her government on behalf of political, economic and military reform;
- To the special commitment to democratic ideals of the Filipino people; and
- To strengthened friendship and cooperation between our two countries in support of our common goals.

Response of President Aquino: Today is a new day in the enduring friendship between our two countries. When I sat down with President Reagan this morning we were meeting as two leaders of free nations. Both our nations again share the same commitment to freedom and opportunity.

So that is why I say it is a new day. We again share a political system which respects and honors the individual citizen. On this basis we can build a mutual respect and confidence that was previously impossible. President Reagan's remarks this morning were a strong demonstration of this.

Once more the Filipino stands proud and is able to honor the democracy that Americans helped him win in the first place. No longer need there be shame abroad or repression at home in the conduct of our affairs.

This places a responsibility on both of our nations to nurture our friendship in a spirit of mutual respect. On the American side there must be understanding and support for the difficult path we have to rebuild our nation.

On the Filipino side there must be a will to preserve our commitment to democratic values. We are a friend of freedom and democracy in the Pacific and we will never again let our leaders snatch that away from us.

We appreciate your understanding in recent months. We know how first your hearts and then your minds were won over to the cause of change in the Philippines.

Yet now that there is a democratic and open government in the Philippines, I think you also understand that we reflect the people's will. I don't need to put your diplomats on warning, Mr. Schultz, that that means we can sometimes be difficult to deal with!

What impresses me about the United States is that in all my meetings with your leaders you have understood this should be a virtue, not a vice, in your eyes. There is so much to be done to put our people back on the road to prosperity, to eliminate the poverty that afflicts two thirds of our nation.

We are completing the restoration of constitutional government and have national elections ahead of us; we are redirecting government away from the private sector and towards basic services; we are liberating the economy from state control; and we are dealing with the insurgency with a firm mixture of political and economic initiatives and military reforms.

It's a heavy agenda but a nation that did what it did last February can do it. We will recover our place as one of Asia's most dynamic economies. We look forward to your continued support.

May I ask you to join me in a toast: To Secretary Schultz, a true and warm friend, whose faith in our new country is deeply felt by us with gratitude; to his gracious wife, to the great American nation, and the new partnership in freedom between our two countries.

Address
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the United States Chamber, United States – Association of Southeast Asian Nations Business Council, and

[Delivered in Washington, D.C., September 18, 1986]

WE MEAN BUSINESS

With democracy restored, the Philippines has created the environment for dynamic private sector business growth. Still, one depends on the other. The nation now needs economic growth to support democracy. This is an invitation to the American business community to invest in the Philippines.

I spoke this morning to the joint houses of Congress, now, I join you to address you, the other audience, American business. Together these two speeches represent the twin working levels of this trip.

I have come to say thank you to the American friends of the Philippines and to make new friends. But I have also come to reinforce the political and economic links between our countries.

We have restored democracy and thereby created the environment for dynamic private sector business growth. Yet, one depends on the other. We now need economic growth to support our democracy. We must reverse the decline in living standards of our people, end the poverty, and put our people back to work. So when we say I am here on an official working visit, I am here not just because I mean business in my dealings with the administration, but because I mean it also in my discussions with you.

Just as we have created a partnership in the Philippines between political reform and economic growth so, here in the United States, I look for cooperation and partnership, not just from the administration and congress, but also from the private sector.

So I stand before you now to say I mean business. We have begun the long process of rebuilding our nation: creating an environment of political stability and economic opportunity. Let me first outline those political changes.

Today, we are a people who believe that our freedom and our prosperity rest on protecting and strengthening our new democracy.

Democracy, at its worst, may be a long, slow, exasperating and uncertain path to progress, but it is infinitely better than dictatorship's shortcut to disaster. We now have a government that is founded on the belief that no one knows better than the people what they want and what they are prepared to pay for.

So this new government also aims to be a lean government.

We judge that this option follows from its democratic character. If a people want self-rule, they must be self-reliant. They should seek no more government than is absolutely necessary to correct the inequities of a free market in an imperfect world. The thrust therefore of my government will be to wean the people away from the idea that they must depend on the government. This should not be hard considering how little government has done for them these 20 past years. What is needed is to make them confident that they have the strength, which they have always had, to go it alone. After the resilience and determination the Filipinos showed at the ballot boxes and in the streets earlier this year, we have all the optimism and confidence to do it.

There are no more cronies with their hands in the till. Rather, government is redirecting its attention and energies to areas that are the proper concerns of free governments: bringing about social justice, building infrastructure, safeguarding the peace and order of communities and the nation's security.

To correct the people's deep and widespread cynicism about government's inability to render even-handed justice, we have recreated a new Supreme Court staffed by judges of the highest integrity and competence, beholden to no one but justice itself. A revamp of the rest of the judicial system is also well under way.

Next, the Constitutional Commission is almost through with its draft constitution. This draft will be submitted to a plebiscite in December for ratification. Its main features, even at this stage, should be familiar to you, for they are the enduring forms of democratic government that are the same everywhere.

Within the first quarter of next year, we shall have elected a new Congress and local officials, so that, at all levels, government will be in the hands of elected representatives, responsive to the needs of their constituents and accountable to them.

We have a new armed forces, restored to the people's trust by its noble part in the renewal of democracy. Together with my defense chiefs, I am overseeing a thorough military reform. A strong army is a vital part of the defense of our new freedom.

After six months, our political framework is in place. Additions, such as those to be made by a new constitution and elections, will only flesh out its democratic character. We can now bend greater efforts to the task of economic recovery and growth in a climate of freedom.

The broad outlines of this second task have also been drawn. We have agreed with the IMF to an increase in liquidity and to a larger budget deficit as a percentage of GNP. This greater latitude might allow my government to begin rural public works which will stimulate the economy at its grassroots. We have finished our talks with the IMF and the World Bank. Tomorrow, I move on to New York to meet with the creditor banks. The negotiations with these institutions will complete the elements of a new debt package.

The country's new financial indicators have improved. The foreign exchange rate has held steady for the last seven months. Interest rates are much lower than they have been in the last three years. Foreign exchange reserves exceed three months' import requirements. Non-tariff barriers to imports are being removed in phases. There is virtually no inflation. But part of the reason for this, unfortunately, is continuing low demand. The economy needs a fresh infusion of capital to get it really moving. And we prefer to have it come, to the extent it is wise and possible, from the private sector.

The Filipino people face the future confidently. American business should look long and carefully at our investment possibilities. I advise it to look as well at the great potential of the region in which we are located. Asia, according to the latest world economic projections, has the largest growth potential of any area in the world.

There are opportunities to be found in established businesses, mismanaged by the previous government and its friends, that are ready to be restarted with fresh capital and new management. There are also sound enterprises, well and frugally managed, that need fresh capital to improve productivity and product quality. And there remain many new areas of investments, some that will complement our major concern in developing our agriculture.

Capital will find in our shores a labor force that is hardworking, eminently-skilled, and cost efficient. It would cost the U.S. Navy six or seven times more to hire elsewhere the skills found in the Filipino. What is good enough to keep the arsenal of American democracy in good repair, should be good enough to assure American profit.

However, I should make it clear that we do not hold out to any investor, Filipino or foreign, profit opportunities by exploiting a meek labor force, prevented by police forces from asserting their basic rights. We invite you to consider investing in the Philippines not only because our labor is cost efficient, but because it is productive, and will more than earn its pay. We have given labor back its motivation. If after 14 years of martial law, labor relations looked temporarily strained as we restored free collective bargaining, that was a honeymoon we deserved.

The Filipino worker knows he has to earn his way in the world. And he has the will and commitment to do so. Now in partnership with our business leadership, our workforce is settling down to the long hard haul of winning back old markets and building new ones.

We are also simplifying the rules and procedures for foreign investment and, in general, for doing business in the Philippines. This is part of our program to deregulate the economy.

Finally, we are fully aware that foreign investment seeks, first and foremost, stability of laws and regulations. Your assurance of this lies in our democratic government, where legislation is the fruit of open debate and government decisions must meet the requirements of due process. There should be no surprises in a democracy.

And that is how it is in my country today. No fears and no favors. Only the pledge of a people that experienced both to a tragic degree that it will never be that way again.

RESTORING DEMOCRACY BY THE WAYS OF DEMOCRACY

The Philippines has swept away absolute power by a limited revolution that respected the life and freedom of every Filipino. Now, the nation is restoring full constitutional government. Still, for democracy to flourish, the Philippines must be able to sustain economic growth, which is greatly hampered by the insurgency problem and a staggering foreign debt of $26 billion.

The government has addressed the insurgency problem with a clear-cut policy to exhaust all peaceful means. Solution to the other problem, foreign debt, is dependent on whether the nation can renegotiate with creditors for fairer terms.

President Aquino invites America to join the Philippines in building a new home for democracy.

Three years ago, I left America in grief to bury my husband, Ninoy Aquino. I thought I had left it also to lay to rest his restless dream of Philippine freedom. Today, I have returned as the president of a free people.

In burying Ninoy, a whole nation honored him. By that brave and selfless act of giving honor, a nation in shame recovered its own. A country that had lost faith in its future found it in a faithless and brazen act of murder. So in giving, we receive, in losing we find, and out of defeat, we snatched our victory.

For the nation, Ninoy became the pleasing sacrifice that answered their prayers for freedom. For myself and our children, Ninoy was a loving husband and father. His loss, three times in our lives, was always a deep and painful one.

Fourteen years ago this month was the first time we lost him. A president-turned-dictator, and traitor to his oath, suspended the Constitution and shut down the Congress that was much like this one before which I am honored to speak. He detained my husband along with thousands of others – senators, publishers and anyone who had spoken up for the democracy as its end drew near. But for Ninoy, a long and cruel ordeal was reserved. The dictator already knew that Ninoy was not a body merely to be imprisoned but a spirit he must break. For even as the dictatorship demolished one by one the institutions of democracy – the press, the Congress, the independence of the judiciary, the protection of the Bill of Rights – Ninoy kept their spirit alive in himself.

The government sought to break him by indignities and terror. They locked him up in a tiny, nearly airless cell in a military camp in the north. They stripped him naked and held the threat of sudden midnight execution over his head. Ninoy held up manfully under all of it. I barely did as well. For 43 days, the authorities would not tell me what had happened to him. This was the first time my children and I felt we had lost him.

When that didn't work, they put him on trial for subversion, murder and a host of other crimes before a military commission. Ninoy challenged its authority and went on a fast. If he survived it, then, he felt, God intended him for another fate. We had lost him again. For nothing would hold him back from his determination to see his fast through to the end. He stopped only when it dawned on him that the government would keep his body alive after the fast had destroyed his brain. And so, with barely any life in his body, he called off the fast on the fortieth day. God meant him for other things, he felt. He did not know that an early death would still be his fate, that only the timing was wrong.

At any time during his long ordeal, Ninoy could have made a separate peace with the dictatorship, as so many of his countrymen had done. But the spirit of democracy that inheres in our race and animates this chamber could not be allowed to die. He held out, in the loneliness of his cell and the frustration of exile, the democratic alternative to the insatiable greed and mindless cruelty of the right and the purging holocaust of the left.

And then, we lost him, irrevocably and more painfully than in the past. The news came to us in Boston. It had to be after the three happiest years of our lives together. But his death was my country's resurrection in the courage and faith by which alone they could be free again. The dictator had called him a nobody. Two million people threw aside their passivity and fear and escorted him to his grave. And so began the revolution that has brought me to democracy's most famous home, the Congress of the United States.

The task had fallen on my shoulders to continue offering the democratic alternative to our people.

Archibald Macleish had said that democracy must be defended by arms when it is attacked by arms and by truth when it is attacked by lies. He failed to say how it shall be won.

I held fast to Ninoy's conviction that it must be by the ways of democracy. I held out for participation in the 1984 election the dictatorship called, even if I knew it would be rigged. I was warned by the lawyers of the opposition that I ran the grave risk of legitimizing the foregone results of elections that were clearly going to be fraudulent. But I was not fighting for lawyers but for the people in whose intelligence I had implicit faith. By the exercise of democracy, even in a dictatorship, they would be prepared for democracy when it came. And then, also, it was the only way I knew by which we could measure our power even in the terms dictated by the dictatorship.

The people vindicated me in an election shamefully marked by government thuggery and fraud. The opposition swept the elections, garnering a clear majority of the votes, even if they ended up, thanks to a corrupt Commission on Elections, with barely a third of the seats in parliament. Now, I knew our power.

Last year, in an excess of arrogance, the dictatorship called for its doom in a snap election. The people obliged. With over a million signatures, they drafted me to challenge the dictatorship. And I obliged them. The rest is the history that dramatically unfolded on your television screens and across the front pages of your newspapers.

You saw a nation, armed with courage and integrity, stand fast by democracy against threats and corruption. You saw women poll watchers break out in tears as armed goons crashed the polling places to steal the ballots but, just the same, they tied themselves to the ballot boxes. You saw a people so committed to the ways of democracy that they were prepared to give their lives for its pale imitation. At the end of the day, before another wave of fraud could distort the results, I announced the people's victory.

The distinguished co-chairman of the United States observer team in his report to your President described that victory:

"I was witness to an extraordinary manifestation of democracy on the part of the Filipino people. The ultimate result was the election of Mrs. Corazon C. Aquino as President and Mr. Salvador Laurel as Vice-President of the Philippines."

Many of you here today played a part in changing the policy of your country towards us. We, Filipinos, thank each of you for what you did: for, balancing America's strategic interest against human concerns, illuminates the American vision of the world.

When a subservient parliament announced my opponent's victory, the people turned out in the streets and proclaimed me President. And true to their word, when a handful of military leaders declared themselves against the dictatorship, the people rallied to their protection. Surely, the people take care of their own. It is on that faith and the obligation it entails, that I assumed the presidency.

As I came to power peacefully, so shall I keep it. That is my contract with my people and my commitment to God. He had willed that the blood drawn with the lash shall not, in my country, be paid by blood drawn by the sword but by the tearful joy of reconciliation.

We have swept away absolute power by a limited revolution that respected the life and freedom of every Filipino. Now, we are restoring full constitutional government. Again, as we restored democracy by the ways of democracy, so are we completing the constitutional structures of our new democracy under a constitution that already gives full respect to the Bill of Rights. A jealously independent Constitutional Commission is completing its draft which will be submitted later this year to a popular referendum. When it is approved, there will be congressional elections. So within about a year from a peaceful but national upheaval that overturned a dictatorship, we shall have returned to full constitutional government. Given the polarization and breakdown we inherited, this is no small achievement.

My predecessor set aside democracy to save it from a communist insurgency that numbered less than 500. Unhampered by respect for human rights, he went at it hammer and tongs. By the time he fled, that insurgency had grown to more than 16,000. I think there is a lesson here to be learned about trying to stifle a thing with the means by which it grows.

I don't think anybody, in or outside our country, concerned for a democratic and open Philippines, doubts what must be done. Through political initiatives and local reintegration programs, we must seek to bring the insurgents down from the hills and, by economic progress and justice, show them that for which the best intentioned among them fight.

As President, I will not betray the cause of peace by which I came to power. Yet equally, and again no friend of Filipino democracy will challenge this, I will not stand by and allow an insurgent leadership to spurn our offer of peace and kill our young soldiers, and threaten our new freedom.

Yet, I must explore the path of peace to the utmost, for at its end, whatever disappointment I meet there, is the moral basis for laying down the olive branch of peace and taking up the sword of war. Still, should it come to that, I will not waver from the course laid down by your great liberator: "With malice towards none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and for his orphans, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

Like Lincoln, I understand that force may be necessary before mercy. Like Lincoln, I don't relish it. Yet, I will do whatever it takes to defend the integrity and freedom of my country.

Finally, may I turn to that other slavery: our $26 billion foreign debt. I have said that we shall honor it. Yet must the means by which we shall be able to do so be kept from us? Many conditions imposed on the previous government that stole this debt continue to be imposed on us who never benefited from it. And no assistance or liberality commensurate with the calamity that was visited on us has been extended. Yet ours must have been the cheapest revolution ever. With little help from others, we Filipinos fulfilled the first and most difficult condition of the debt negotiation the full restoration of democracy and responsible government. Elsewhere, and in other times of more stringent world economic conditions, Marshall plans and their like were felt to be necessary companions of returning democracy.

When I met with President Reagan yesterday, we began an important dialogue about cooperation and the strengthening of the friendship between our two countries. That meeting was both a confirmation and a new beginning and should lead to positive results in all areas of common concern.

Today, we face the aspirations of a people who had known so much poverty and massive unemployment for the past 14 years and yet offered their lives for the abstraction of democracy. Wherever I went in the campaign, slum area or impoverished village, they came to me with one cry: democracy! Not food, although they clearly needed it, but democracy. Not work, although they surely wanted it, but democracy. Not money, for they gave what little they had to my campaign. They didn't expect me to work a miracle that would instantly put food into their mouths, clothes on their back, education in their children, and work that will put dignity in their lives. But I feel the pressing obligation to respond quickly as the leader of a people so deserving of all these things.

We face a communist insurgency that feeds on economic deterioration, even as we carry a great share of the free world defenses in the Pacific. These are only two of the many burdens my people carry even as they try to build a worthy and enduring house for their new democracy, that may serve as well as a redoubt for freedom in Asia. Yet, no sooner is one stone laid than two are taken away. Half our export earnings, $2 billion out of $4 billion, which was all we could earn in the restrictive markets of the world, went to pay just the interest on a debt whose benefit the Filipino people never received.

Still, we fought for honor, and, if only for honor, we shall pay. And yet, should we have to wring the payments from the sweat of our men's faces and sink all the wealth piled up by the bondsman's two hundred fifty years of unrequited toil?

Yet to all Americans, as the leader of a proud and free people, I address this question: has there been a greater test of national commitment to the ideals you hold dear than that my people have gone through? You have spent many lives and much treasure to bring freedom to many lands that were reluctant to receive it. And here you have a people who won it by themselves and need only the help to preserve it.

Three years ago, I said, thank you, America, for the haven from oppression, and the home you gave Ninoy, myself and our children, and for the three happiest years of our lives together. Today, I say, join us, America, as we build a new home for democracy, another haven for the oppressed, so it may stand as a shining testament of our two nation's commitment to freedom.

September 18, 1986

Talumpati
ng
Kagalang-galang Corazon C. Aquino
Pangulo ng Pilipinas
Sa Pinagsanib na Sesyon ng Kapulungan ng Estados Unidos

[Inihayag sa Washington, D.C., noong ika-18 ng Setyembre 1986]

Tatlong taon na ang nakararaan, nagdadalamhati akong lumisan sa Amerika upang ilibing ang aking kaniyap, si Ninoy Aquino. Akala ko’y umalis ako doon upang ilibing din nang ganap ang kaniyang di-makaling pangarap na kalayaan ng Pilipinas. Ngayon, nagbabalik ako bilang pangulo ng malayang sambayanan.

Sa paglilibing kay Ninoy, dinarakila siya ng buong bansa. Sa magiting at mapagpaubayang pakikibakang magbigay ng karangalan, ang buong bansa ay nakabangon nang mag-isa. Ang bansang nawalan ng pananalig sa kinabukasan ay natagpuan yaon sa marahas at lantarang pagpaslang. Kaya sa pagbibigay ay nakatatanggap tayo; sa pagkawala ay nakatatagpo tayo; at mula sa pagkabigo ay nahablot natin ang tagumpay.

Para sa bansa, si Ninoy ang kaaya-ayang sakripisyo na tumugon sa mga panalangin nito hinggil sa kalayaan. Para sa akin at sa aking mga anak, si Ninoy ang mapagmahal na esposo at ama. Ang kaniyang pagkawala, nang tatlong ulit sa aming buhay, ay palaging malalim at makirot.

Ikalabing-apat na apat na taon ngayong buwan ang unang pagkakataon na nawala siya sa amin. Ang pangulong naghunos diktador, at nagtaksil sa kaniyang sinumpaang tungkulin, ay sinuspinde ang Saligang Batas at isinara ang Konggreso na parang gaya nito na isang karangalan ang magsalita. Ibinilanggo niya ang aking asawa kapiling ang ilang libo pang tao—mga senador, pablisar, at sinumang nagsalita para sa demokrasya—habang papalapit na ang wakas ng kaniyang pamamahala. Ngunit nakalaan para kay Ninoy ang mahaba at malupit na pagsubok. Batid ng diktador na si Ninoy ay hindi lamang katawan na makukulong bagkus diwaing dapat wasakin. Dahil kahit gibain nang isa-isa ng diktadura ang mga institusyon ng demokrasya—gaya ng press, Konggreso, independensiya ng hukuman, ang proteksiyon ng Talaan ng Karapatan— pinanatiling buhay ni Ninoy ang alab ng diwain nito.

Sinikap ng gobyerno na durugin si Ninoy sa pamamagitan ng panghihiya at paninindak. Ibinilibid siya sa maliit, halos walang hanging selda sa kampo militar sa hilaga. Hinubdan siya at binantaang ipabibitay pagsapit ng kalagitnaan ng gabi. Pinanindigan lahat iyon ni Ninoy. At gayon din halos ang ginawa ko. Inilihim sa akin ng mga awtoridad kung ano ang nangyari sa kaniya sa loob ng apatnapu’t tatlong araw. Ito ang unang pagkakataon na nadama ko at ng aking mga anak na naglaho na siya.

Nang hindi nagtagumpay ang gayong paraan, nilitis siya sa salang subersiyon, pagpatay, at iba pang krimen sa harap ng komisyon militar. Hinamon ni Ninoy ang awtoridad nito at siya’y nag-ayuno. Kung makaliligat siya doon, pakiwari niya, ang Diyos ay may nakalaang ibang tadhana sa kaniya. Muling nawala si Ninoy sa amin. Dahil walang makapigjil sa kaniyang sigasig na mag-ayuno hanggang wakas, huminto lamang siya nang mabatid na pananatilihin ng gobyerno ang kaniyang katawan makalipas na sirain ng pag-aayuno ang utak. Lupaypay ang katawan na halos walang buhay, winakasan ni Ninoy ang kaniyang pag-aayuno sa ikaapatnapung araw. May inilaan ang Diyos sa kaniya na ibang bagay, ramdam ni Ninoy. Hindi niya alam na ang maagang kamatayan ay siya ring magiging tadhana niya, dangan lamang at hindi pa panahon.

Sa alinmang sandali ng kaniyang mahabang pagsubok, maaari na sanang makipagkasundo si Ninoy sa diktadura, gaya ng ginawa ng marami niyang kababayan. Ngunit ang diwa ng demokrasya na nananalaytay sa aming lahi at nagpapasigla ng kamarang ito ay hindi mahahayaang maupos. Pinanindigan niya, sa kabila ng galimgim ng kaniyang selda at kabiguan ng destiyero, ang demokratikong alternatibo sa hindi mapigil na kasakiman at salat-sa-katwirang kalupitan ng kanan at sa mala-holokawstong pagpupurga ng kaliwa.

Pagkaraan, naglaho siya sa amin nang ganap at higit na masakit kaysa noon. Sumapit sa amin sa Boston ang balita. Iyon ay pagkaraan ng tatlong masasayang taon ng aming pagsasama. Ngunit ang kaniyang kamatayan ay resureksiyon ng tapang at pananampalatayang magpapalaya sa aming bayan. itinuring na walang kuwenta ng diktador si Ninoy. Dalawang milyong tao ang bumasag ng kanilang pananahimik at nagmartsa tungo sa libingan niya. At doon nagsimula ang rebolusyon na naghatid sa akin sa pinakatanyag na tahanan ng demokrasya, ang Kongreso ng Estados Unidos.

Winika ni Archibald Macleish na dapat ipagtanggol ang demokrasya sa pamamagitan ng sandata kapag tinapatan ng sandata, at sa pamamagitan ng katotohanan kapag tinapatan ng kasinungalingan. Nabigo niyang banggitin kung paano iyon ipapanalo.

Naniniwala ako sa ipinaglalaban ni Ninoy na dapat ipanalo iyon sa mga pamamaraan ng demokrasya. Naghintay akong makalahok noong halalan 1984 na inihayag ng diktadura, kahit alam kong dadayain iyon. Nagbabala sa akin ang mga abogado ng oposisyon sa panganib na maging lehitimo ang resulta ng halalang malinaw na dadayain. Ngunit hindi ako nakikipaglaban para sa mga abogado bagkus para sa mga mamamayang ang talino'y pinanaligan ko. Sa pagsasagawa ng demokrasya kahit nasa ilalim ng diktadura'y maihahanda sila sa demokrasya kapag sumapit ito. Ito rin ang tanging paraan na alam kong masusukat narin ang kapangyarihan ikahit sa mga bagay na idinidikta ng diktadura.

Itinaguyod ako ng mga tao sa halalang hitik sa karahasan at pandaraya ng gobyerno. Nagwagi ang oposisyon sa mga halalan, lumikom ng malinaw na mayorya ng mga boto, bagaman ang natamo nila—salamat na lamang sa tiwaling Komisyon sa Halalan—ay halos sangkatlo lamang ng mga puwesto sa batasan. Ngayon, alam ko na ang aming kapangyarihan.

Noong nakaraang taon, nanawagan ng biglaang halalan ang diktadura bilang pagpapamalas ng labis na kapaluan. Tumango ang bayan. Sa bisa ng mahigit isang milyong lagda, iniluklok nila ako na hamumin ang diktadura. At sinunod ko ang mithi nila. Ang sumunod ay kasaysayang nabuksan nang dramatiko sa inyong telebisyon at sa mga pambungad na pahina ng inyong mga pahayagan.

Nakita ninyo ang bansa, na armado ng giting at integridad, na mariing nanindigan sa demokrasya laban sa mga banta at korupsiyon. Nasaksihan ninyo ang mga babaeng tagapagbantay ng halalan na nagsitangis nang manloob ang mga armadong maton upang hablutin ang mga balota, ngunit itinali ng mga babae ang kanilang mga kamay sa mga kahon ng balota. Namalas ninyo ang mga tao na nagtaya sa mga pamamaraan ng demokrasya at handa nilang ihandog ang buhay para sa mababa nitong katumbas. Sa pagwawakas ng araw, bago pa sumapit ang bagong agos ng pandaraya na makapagpapabaligtad ng mga resulta, inihayag ko ang tagumpay ng bayan.

Inilarawan ng iginagalang na kawaksing pinuno ng pangkat tagapagsubaybay ng Estados Unidos sa kaniyang ulat sa inyong Pangulo ang nasabing tagumpay:

Marami sa inyo na narito ngayon ang gumanap ng papel sa pagpapanibago ng patakaran ng inyong bansa hinggil sa aming bansa. Kami, ang mga Pilipino, ay nagpapasalamat sa inyo sa ginawa ninyo: na sa pagtitimbang ng estrategikong interes ng Amerika laban sa mga usaping pantao ay maliliwanagan ang Amerikanong bisyon sa daigdig.

Nang ihayag ng sunod-sunurang batasan ang tagumpay ng aking kalaban, nagsilabasan sa mga kalye ang mga tao at inihayag na ako ang Pangulo nila. At tapat sa kanilang winika, nang ang iilang pinuno ng militar ay naghayag ng pagsalungat sa diktadura, ang mga tao'y nagbayanihan upang pangalagaan sila. Totoong kinakalinga ng mga tao ang kaisa nila. Sa gayong pananalig at pananagutang taglay nito nanungkulan ako bilang pangulo.

Isinantabi ng nauna sa akin ang demokrasya upang ilitas umano ito sa komunistang pag-aaklas na hindi lalabis sa 500 tao. Masigasig niyang nilabag ang mga karapatang pantao at ni hindi inalintana ang paggalang dito. Nang tumakas ang diktador palayo, ang armadong pakikibaka ay lumago sa 16,000. Wari ko'y may leksiyon dito na dapat matutuhan hinggil sa pagsisikap na supilin ang isang bagay sa pamamagitan ng mga pamamaraang magpapalago rito.

Walang tao sa aking palagay, sa loob man o labas ng bansa, na may malasakit sa demokratiko at bukas na Pitipinas, ang magdududa sa mga dapat isagawa. Sa pamamagitan ng mga pagkukusang pampolitika at lokal na programang pagtanggap ng mga tao mula sa armadong pakikibaka, kailangan nating pababain ang mga maghihimagsik pababa sa mga burol at, sa bisa ng pangkabuhayang progreso at katarungan, ay maipakita sa kanila ang lantay na layuning ipinaglalaban nila.

Bilang Pangulo, hindi ako magtataksil sa simulain ng kapayapaang nagluklok sa akin sa kapangyarihan. Gayundin, at walang sinumang kapanalig ng demokrasyang Pilipino ang mapasusubalian ito, hindi ko palalampasin at pababayaan ang pamunuan ng maghihimagsik na talikdan ang aming handog na kapayapaan at paslangin ang aming kabataang kawal, at magbanta sa aming bagong kalayaan.

Kailangan ko pa ring maghanap ng landas ng kapayapaan sa sukdulang paraan dahil ang wakas nito, anuman ang kabiguang masalubong, ang magiging batayang moral para sa pagpapalaganap ng kapayapaan at pagsusulong ng digmaan. At kung sumapit sa gayong yugto, hindi ako matatakot sa landas na iginiit ng inyong dakilang tagapagpalaya: "Walang malisya sa sinuman, may pagkalinga para sa lahat, at may katatagan sa mga karapatan, gaya ng mga ibinigay na karapatan ng Maykapal, tapusin natin ang trabahong nasa atin, bendahan ang mga sugat ng bansa, kalingain ang sinumang sumabak sa digmaan, at para sa kaniyang balo at mga ulila, ay gawin ang lahat ng matatamo at pahalagahan ang makatarungan at pangmatagalang kapayapaan sa atin at sa lahat ng bansa."

Gaya ni Lincoln, nauunawaan kong kinakailangan ang puwersa bago ang kapatawaran. Gaya ni Lincoln, hindi ko iyon gusto. Gayunman ay gagawin ko ang dapat gawin upang ipagtanggol ang integridad at kalayaan ng aking bansa.

At pangwakas, hayaang dumako ako sa iba pang kaalipnan: ang aming $26 bilyong utang panlabas. Sinabi ko noon na kikilalanin namin ito. Ngunit ang mga pamamaraan ba para magawa iyon ay ipagkakait sa amin? Maraming kondisyon na ipinataw sa nakaraang gobyerno na nagnakaw ng inutang ang patuloy na ipinapataw sa aming hindi nakinabang dito. At walang tulong o liberalidad na katumbas ng kalamidad na ibinigay sa amin ang pinalawig. Gayunman, ang amin ang pinakamatipid na rebolusyon marahil. Kaming mga Pilipino, na kakaunti ang tulong na nasagap sa ibang bansa, ang tumupad ng una at pinakamahirap na kondisyon sa negosasyon ng utang: ang pagpapanumbalik ng demokrasya at responsableng gobyerno. Sa ibang pook, at sa ibang panahon na higit na mahigpit ang mga pandaigdigang ekonomikong kondisyon, ang mga planong Marshall at kauri nito ang naisip na mahalagang kasama sa pagpapanumbalik ng demokrasya.

Nang makaharap ko si Pang. Reagan kahapon, nagsimula kami ng mahalagang diyologo hinggil sa kooperasyon at pagpapalakas ng pagkakaibigan sa panig ng dalawang bansa. Ang naturang pulong ang kapuwa kumpirmasyon at bagong simula, at dapat mauwi sa mga poslibong resulta sa lahat ng panig ng pangkalahatang usapin.

Hinaharap namin ngayon ang mithi ng sambayanang dumanas ng labis na kahirapan at matinding kawalan ng trabaho sa loob ng labing-apat na taon, ngunit inialay pa rin ang kani-kanilang buhay para sa malabong demokrasya. Tuwing nangangampanya ako sa mga pook maralita o liblib na nayon, lumalapit ang mga tao sa akin at sumisigaw ng demokrasya. Hindi trabaho, bagaman tiyak na nais nila iyon, bagkus demokrasya. Hindi salapi, dahil ibinigay nila sa akin ang anumang munti nilang naipon para sa kampanya. Hindi nila ako inasahang magbibigay ng himala na magpapalitaw ng pagkain, damit, edukasyon sa kanilang mga anak, at trabahong maglalaan ng dignidad sa kanilang buhay. Subalit nararamdaman ko ang pananagutang kumilos nang mabilis bilang pinuno ng mga tao na karapat-dapat matamo ang mga bagay na ito.

Hinaharap namin ang armadong pakikibaka ng komunista na lumulusog sa pagguho ng kabuhatan, kahit nakikibahagi kami sa mga tanggulan ng malalayang daigdig sa Pasipiko. Ito ang tanging dalawang pasaning dinadala ng aking mga kababayan habang sinisikap nilang magtatag ng karapat-dapat at matibay na tahanan para sa kanilang bagong demokrasya, na makapagsisilbi ring tanggulan para sa kalayaan ng Asya. Gayunman, hindi pa natatapos maglatag ng bato ay dalawa naman ang tinatangay palayo. Kalahati ng aming kita sa pagluluwas, na tinatayang $2 sa $4 bilyong dolyar, ang tanging naiipon namin sa labis na mahigpit na merkado ng daigdig, at ibinabalik pa upang bayaran ang interes ng utang na ang benepisyo ay hindi natatanggap ng mga tao.

Lumaban kami nang matamo ang dangal, at kahit man lang sa dangal, handa kaming magbayad. Ngunit dapat pa ba nating pigain ang pambayad mula sa pawis sa mukha ng aming kababayan at ilubog ang lahat ng kayamanang natipon ng tagapanagot na dalawang daan at limampung taon kumayod nang dibdiban?

Sa lahat ng Amerikano, bilang pinuno ng marangal at malayang bansa, ipinupukol ko ang tanong na ito: Mayroon bang hihigit sa pagsubok ng pambansang pagtataya sa mga mithi na inyong pinahahalagahan kaysa sa dinanas ng aking mga kababayan? Gumugol kayo ng maraming buhay at maraming yaman upang maghatid ng kalayaan sa maraming lupain na pawang bantulot tanggapin yaon. At dito ay may sambayanang nagwagi nang mag-isa at kailangan lamang ang tulong upang mapanatili ang natamo.

Tatlong taon na ang nakalilipas ay sinabi kong Salamat, Amerika, para sa kanlungan ng inaapi, at sa tahanan ibinigay mo kay Ninoy, sa akin at sa aking mga anak, at para sa tatlong masayang taon naming pinagsamahan. Ngayon, sinasabi kong, samahan ninyo kami, Amerika, habang itinitindig namin ang bagong tahanan para sa demokrasya, ang bagong kanlungan para sa inaapi, upang makatindig ito bilang kumikinig na—testamento ng ating dalawang bansang nagtataya sa kalayaan.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Advisory Committee of Creditor Banks

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the Advisory Committee of Creditor Banks

OARSMEN IN THE SAME BOAT

Freedom and economic growth are inseparable factors. One cannot flourish without the other. One of the reasons for President Aquino's visit to the United States is to renegotiate with the Philippines' creditors for more reasonable terms. From its end, the Philippines has based its development program on a labor-oriented and rural-based strategy that will in the long run enable it to pay all its legitimate debt. In the medium term, the nation should grow at an average rate of six to seven percent a year in real terms. Given this goal, it is hoped that the nation's representatives and its foreign creditors can hammer out the appropriate debt-restructuring program to allow the Philippines to achieve its modest target.

I thank you for the welcome you have given me and the officials of my government. I come to you as the head of a nation whose rebirth you witnessed in splendid detail on your television screens almost seven months ago. Truly, it is with enormous pride that we recall those moments when a people threw caution and fear to the winds and staked their lives, for that was all they had, to restore democracy in their country.

Words cannot add to the vivid images you surely recall, nor will I try. It is not my purpose here to recall that triumph but to affirm my people's determination to move forward from there.

Even before my government was established, I had made clear what its underlying philosophy would be. We would have, I promised during the campaign, an open government, conducting its affairs in the full glare of public scrutiny. Its policies, I pledged, would be as accurately reflective as possible of the people's wisdom and preferences. I believed then, and still do, that no one can know better than the people what they want and what they are prepared to pay for it. Even more important than my believing it, the people are convinced of it after 20 years of unilateral direction by a leadership that claimed to know all and ended up stealing everything. We have an open, democratic government, proceeding to the extent possible, by wide, popular consultations. We have such a government as an expression of our faith in the wisdom of the people, a faith justified by their political achievement. We have it also because, as I said, the nation will have it no other way. The political marketplace has spoken. The Constitutional Commission that I appointed is completing a draft whose ratification by the people before the end of the year will give enduring form to the insistent democracy of Philippine politics. Within the first quarter of next year, a new Congress will be sitting to represent and fashion the laws of the Filipino people, thereby imparting a character of stability and predictability to the political system as a whole.

As with the structure of government, so with its policies. Unless these have taken into account the interest of the people as the people see it, unless the people can accept these policies as clearly contributing to their welfare, they will fail. You need not worry that my people will accept only policies that pamper them. My people offered to make the last sacrifice. With their families around them, they faced down the entire array of tyranny: guns, goons and gold during the elections; tanks, troops, and threats during the four days of February. They have seen the nobility of sacrifice in the death of my husband, they have experienced the power of an iron resolve in their democratic triumph. They are prepared to take on whatever burdens are required to rebuild their nation and make it worthy, by its material progress, of its great, unprecedented and unequalled political achievement.

If you still question their capability, consider the sacrifices they have already made: sacrifices that have borne us to where we are today. The present stability in our prices and exchange rates, the balance in our current account, have been achieved at tremendous cost in terms of our national product, our employment and our living standards. In 1985, for example, our real per capita income levels were down to what they were ten years before, while our external debt had increased by $22 billion dollars. We lost ten years in our growth process and had nothing to show for it but the dubious distinction of being the country with the fifth largest debt in the developing world.

Undaunted, we have embarked on a consistent and realistic economic recovery program which was drafted in consultation with the people and premised on social justice and private enterprise.

Mr. De Larosiere's approval of a standby program for the Philippines two days ago is an affirmation of my government's program and the confidence of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank that our objectives can be attained.

As you know, the government's program is based on a labor-oriented and rural-based growth strategy that will in the long run enable us to pay all of our legitimate debt. We have determined that in the medium term, the Philippines should grow at an average rate of six to seven percent a year in real terms. This target was chosen for two reasons. One, because we would like by 1991 to regain our 1981 real per capita levels of income. And two, because it has been predicted by independent international studies that the average growth rate of Asia in the next five years will approximate that figure. You will agree with me then, that this growth target is, at the very least, eminently reasonable.

Given this goal, I leave it in the hands of your goodselves and my government's representatives to hammer out the appropriate restructuring program that will allow us to achieve this modest target. For after all, ensuring our economic recovery in the short-term, and sustainable growth in the long run, also ensures that your own ultimate self-interest will be served by enhancing our ability to service our future obligations in full.

I should like to believe that when you and my government sit down for these negotiations we shall not do so across an adversarial table but beside each other, like oarsmen in the same boat, pulling in the same direction, for the haven of the same shore.

A NEW PARTNERSHIP

There is no question about the strength of the relationship between the governments of the United States and Philippines. The two nations have forged a new partnership, but it must be fueled by the contributions of the American private sector.

I come here tonight from a successful few days in Washington. I thought Washington was a sober city that gave its visitors a restrained welcome. Now I know differently. I must confess Washington has given New York competition.

You will also forgive me if I am very brief. New Yorkers have responded to Washington's challenge today and it has felt like one long party since I arrived this morning.

In Washington my main purpose was to reaffirm official contacts with the political leadership of your nation. This evening I'm back to doing what I enjoy doing most – I'm campaigning. This time not for the votes of the Filipino people, but for the confidence and support of the American business and banking community.

The last few days have removed any question about the strength of the relationship between your administration and Congress and my government in the Philippines. We have a new partnership, but it must be fueled by the contributions of the American private sector. That is why tonight's joint hosting of the reception by John Whitehead, as well as Jim Robinson and Hank Greenburg, is such an important symbol. I extend my thanks to all of you.

For our part, through imaginative debt for equity conversions, encouragement of foreign investment, privatization of government assets, a liberalizing of trade and, above all, the restoration of motivation to our skilled and able work force, we have created the environment.

Now it is your turn. Jimmy Ongpin and my other ministers have worked out in detail the ways you can join us. I just want to say, accept the challenge: join us in rebuilding a democratic, free, and prosperous Philippines.

YEAR OF LIBERTY

The Statue of Liberty holds the torch in her hand and scans the horizon for refugees in search of freedom.
The Filipinos also hold a torch that shines as bright in their hearts.

It's good to be in New York.

I regret that I am two months late for the spectacular celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the Statue of Liberty and its physical restoration. But I was able to watch that dazzling affair on Philippine television. Filipinos understood and shared your mood of jubilation. I told myself, if the struggle for Filipino freedom was still going on, we would have used your celebration of American democracy as a symbol of our desire and struggle to get back our own.

But just eight months ago, Filipinos, too, were dancing in the streets, celebrating the restoration of their Liberty. That celebration, the night the dictatorship fell, had no fireworks. Thank God for that. But as you know the Filipinos won back their freedom in a unique way.

I was last here in New York as a tourist with my husband, Ninoy, and our children. I wish he could be with me today to revisit your city which he admired for its energy and creativity. But in a way he's the reason why I'm here – to complete the mission he started, and to convey our thanks.

Your Lady holds the torch in her hand and scans the horizon for refugees in search of freedom. We hold a torch that shines as bright in our hearts as we seek ways and means to make that freedom more meaningful for masses of Filipinos still huddled in poverty.

I'd like to take this opportunity to convey a personal message of thanks from Ninoy, myself and our children. Six years ago, we sought asylum from tyranny here in the United States and it was granted to us. Your Lady Liberty was true to her words.

And that's why I say I'm happy to be here in New York. You and I, and here I speak for the Filipino people, sure know how to celebrate freedom. From nearly opposite ends of the earth, we made 1986 the Year of Liberty.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Peace Corps

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the Peace Corps

A COMMON YEARNING FOR PEACE

The Peace Corps and the Philippines share a common faith: love for and belief in peace. Filipinos believe peace has a chance in their country. They have made a great investment, individually and as a people, in order to see it work.

Your organization, my government, I as a private individual and my late husband, Ninoy, share a common faith and foundation. We love and believe in peace, and we know it is attainable.

My initiation into the search and discovery of peace was first necessitated by personal need. I learned to seek peace when circumstances conspired to have me lose it. I was 21 and had led a life of relative serenity when I married the most intelligent, articulate and endlessly driven man I had ever known. He had my head, my heart and then my entire life caught in a spin. He became our country's youngest mayor, and then governor, and then again its youngest Senator and I had to keep in step as the politician's wife.

That was the beginning of the end of my days and nights of quiet and peace.

Ironically, it is to a dictator who upset the established, if hectic, pattern of my life, that I owe my search and attainment of the deepest, most satisfying inner peace I was yet to experience. And Ninoy owed this to him, too. We found this under a climate of persecution during the dictatorship, in the confines of Ninoy's prison cell where he was isolated for almost eight years.

Little did the dictator know that by throwing Ninoy into jail, he actually set him free. The yoke of Ninoy's cares, career and ambitions were abruptly lifted from his shoulders. This was painful, for Ninoy had grown attached to these things which weighed on him, indeed, but had imparted a certain ballast and meaning to his life.

In his cell, Ninoy became a man of prayer and reflection. His endless search for the summit of political achievement became a quest for the center of peace within. It was in prison where he developed his own unshakeable personal philosophy. Its central values were reconciliation, non-violence, religious faith. And the yield of all these was peace.

I on my part had to cope with the world from which he had found a retreat. I found myself the pioneer of the opposition cause, a rather lonely state of affairs considering there was to be no significant opposition to the dictatorship for the next ten years. I, too, shed quite a number of encumbrances: a large collection of fair weather friends and associates, my family's place in the center of political and social events, all easy means towards emotional and psychological well-being.

In adversity, I found the strength I needed to cope, the grace not to be bitter, the wisdom to cling to the moral values and political ideals that Ninoy in prison symbolized and that many Filipinos privately espoused, though they were devalued currency in the New Society. The secret source of this fortitude and renewal was, like Ninoy, our Faith. For even in our poor country, that was always in abundance.

But it was during the worst of times, at the height of my anguish over Ninoy's suffering that I found the core of real peace. Ninoy had completed a gruelling 40-day hunger strike, and a military commission had sentenced him to death by musketry. Left with nothing, and facing the bleakest prospects ahead, we found the most unexpected and unshakeable peace. We had also discovered the limits of power.

It was that same perspective, that same grounding in adversity and Faith that must have galvanized my countrymen when we opted for peaceful political change last February. We were a people who, after 20 years of suffering and shame, had come to terms with ourselves. When the troops of Marcos and the unarmed forces of our people stood face-to-face on the streets last February, we saw in each other's eyes not pride, or zeal for our respective causes, but a mutual love and a common yearning for peace. That was all we had, and all we wanted to keep.

We gave peace a chance then, as we continue to do so now. At this stage, we are striving to promote peace in the cities and in the countryside, using methods the Peace Corps is most familiar with. We are employing emergency measures and economic incentives to immediately alleviate hunger, disease, homelessness and poverty. We are trying to bring such resources and services as the government has to the grassroots level.

Simultaneously, we have opted to pursue ceasefire negotiations with the communist rebels as an initial measure, rather than escalate hostilities.

Peace has a chance in our country. We have all made a great investment, individually and as a people, in order to see it work.

May I close by commending the various activities, objectives and sacrifices made by your organization. You are fortunate indeed, for peace is a great and worthy cause.

[Delivered in New York City, September 19, 1986]

THE POWER OF THE MEDIA

Media is effective as the instrument of truth, from which it draws its real power. Media does not make or unmake governments, tanks do that, and, more rarely but surely, people do. And, even armed with the truth, media is a frail power. Without the people's support, it can be shut off with the ease of turning a light switch.

I am delighted to be able to accept Time's invitation to speak before this distinguished audience. When I was first featured on the cover of Time magazine, my youngest daughter, Kris, who was 14 then, excitedly proclaimed: "Mom, this is the ultimate! Now you can die." Thank God I am still around to be with you today, and to thank you, the media, for the invaluable role you played and continue to play in the transformation of my country.

That role, as I said, was invaluable for it was truth that set us free. In the early years of the dictatorship, it was the truth about the suppression of rights and the abuse of dignity that were taking place beneath the dictatorship's pretensions of working for its progress. In creating public opinion through your reporting, the media inhibited, I believe, the even more brazen oppression of the poor and powerless that could have easily happened. In the last three months of the dictatorship, you revealed the truth of its inevitable fate under the peaceful but unrelenting assaults of People Power.

The assassination of my husband was the turning point of the Marcos regime. You helped make it the historic and galvanizing event that it was. The images of my husband, apprehensive but courageous, being led out of the plane by soldiers in one moment, and the next moment sprawled on the tarmac, and then thrown into the back of a van, revealed the notion of an ordinary day's work for a murderous regime. The images became the icons of our revolution. They gave the full measures of the regime's arrogance of power and contempt for human life, while the bare narration of the funeral march attended by millions prefigured the end of the regime.

The images and events during the elections and the revolution are deeply etched in the memory of our people and give inspiration to the other nations of the world: men and women linked arm-to-arm guarding the ballot boxes; computer technicians hired by the government to do the official count walking out of the fraudulent tabulation; tens of thousands of men and women, with their children about them, in vigil, half in fear half in joy, guarding with their bodies the small detachment of rebel soldiers; nuns kneeling in the path of oncoming tanks; a nation rising to a new dignity. These images and more chronicled for all the world the courage and pride of a people, their deep faith in the rightness of their cause, the protection of God, and the ultimate triumph of democracy.

And so, you, the foreign media, have been the companion of my people in its long and painful journey to freedom.

But even as I briefly recount these momentous events, one should recognize an underlying reality that they reveal. And that is why I thought the half-joking remark of my daughter carried with it a grain of wisdom. For with the transparent insight of the innocent, she expressed the reality that you, more than others, should recognize: the liberating virtue of truth and the power of the media to make it happen.

It is a power, it seems, that feeds one man's hunger for truth, a hunger that accepts no substitute, neither promises of material progress nor safe and comforting lies, and will overcome the most intricate and comprehensive web of censorship. Although the Marcos regime effectively controlled the Philippine media, there was never a period when some kind of "alternative press" did not attempt to report the facts and challenge the misinformation published by the government. In the later stages of the Marcos regime, such alternative press took the form of small newspapers that operated from day to day under the constant threat of closure or arrest or para-military terrorism. But throughout the whole Marcos regime, there was always what may be described as the "xerox media" and the "Betamax media." News items and opinion columns in US newspapers and magazines were widely photocopied, and US national newscasts were lifted in videocassettes, smuggled into the Philippines, and reproduced over and over again by innumerable and spontaneous networks of Filipinos hungering for the truth.

The rebirth of Philippine democracy is undoubtedly the showcase of media power, but less obviously, it is also a demonstration of its limits.

Fourteen years of lies in the controlled Philippine press, once the most respected institution in the old Republic, did not dull the appetite for truth or save the dictatorship from it. Marcos had the media and the guns, we had the truth.

Eleven years – up to the death of Ninoy – of the foreign media's sporadic attention to Philippine events, and its occasional dismissal of the prospects of a democratic restoration in the face of a "firmly entrenched dictatorship," did not deter Ninoy or "the increasingly small and irrelevant opposition" – another phrase familiar to you, I believe – from carrying on the fight.

Media is effective as the instrument of truth, from which it draws its real power. Media does not make or unmake governments; tanks do that, and, more rarely but surely, people do. And, even armed with the truth, media is a frail power. Without the people's support, it can be shut off with the ease of turning a light switch. An official threat to your advertisers, a grip on your paper supply or a squad of soldiers at your doorstep, and your last issue becomes your paper's valedictory.

These things are inconceivable here because the enemies of democracy believe that the people won't allow them to happen. But study what happened in the small version of your democracy and media that was my country on September 21, 1972. The people did not protest the shutdown of the media, and there was nothing media could do about it. But from the assassination of Ninoy onwards, the people demonstrated massively against any attempt by the government to shut down the alternative press and Radio Veritas. The media did not restore democracy in the Philippines, the people did. They made the Revolution and protected their media.

A few months ago, I gave a brief speech to the foreign media on the occasion of the book launching of Bayan Ko. I told them that they had been privileged with the story of a lifetime and the rare opportunity to live up to the highest standards of journalistic objectivity and yet be part of a moral and, on top of that, victorious crusade. They all looked a little sad that it was over. But I could not share their sadness. They could go off to other crusades. But I had become the leader of a nation working to rebuild a house worthy of its new-found pride. And that is another story. It will be many years from now before its success deserves a headline.

We have a long way to go and it will be a hard climb uphill. I hope that just as you sympathized with us in our hard days of struggle, so will you support us now in our efforts to build a country to match our pride. As you channelled your power to undo a dictatorship, so may you channel it now to help create an enduring democracy. In short, I ask that you use media's tremendous power to build up rather than to tear down, to create rather than to destroy.

I would ask you to report the truth about the Philippines within the full context in which alone the truth is really true. And the context, for the Philippines, is that of a developing nation ravaged by years of mismanagement and abuse by the Marcos regime, of a people struggling under difficult circumstances to arrive at the maturity and self-sufficiency of a sovereign nation. Do not despair too easily, for that is as infectious as courage proved itself contagious. Do not be too hasty in projecting the failure of other post-dictatorship societies onto our future. For you write about a unique people. They put their lives on the line to take part, just for the principle of the thing, in an election they expected to be rigged from the start and, on top of that, they defeated the effort. These people, who lived under military terror for 14 years, offered their lives, without the least hesitation, to protect the forlorn revolt of a handful of men in uniform. Give them the benefit of the doubt, and the justice, that they can preserve the democracy they restored with such distinction.

It is these qualities of a people, that will be present in the Philippine scene, more and more visible as we return to normalcy. Do not turn a cynical eye on them: for every corruption you will also find instances of generosity; for every inefficiency, you will also find dedication; for every foolishness, there will also be a flash of greatness.

We have nothing to hide in our country. On the contrary, we take pains to reveal the full extent of the devastation we have inherited and the difficulty and confusion of rebuilding from it, given the little we have left to build with and the democratic principles that we are pledged to abide by. Do not be hasty to judge us by the efficient principles of a dictatorship, whose inefficiency, cruelty, and waste you yourselves did so much to expose to our people.

And so I ask you to report the truth, the whole truth, about the Philippines. Of the truth, which made us free, we have obviously no fear.

You can look at our problems. But you can also look at our solutions: to restore faith in the administration of justice we named good judges. We are cleaning up the electoral process, the perversion of which led to widespread disenchantment. We are setting a very high moral tone in government. Many men and women are serving us for nothing or next to nothing. We are professionalizing the military. We are reaching out to the rebels and the disenchanted. We expect to have a new constitution soon. We shall have elections early next year at the national and local levels. We are rebuilding our economy. We have regained our respected standing in the community of nations. We can look anyone in the eye and say we are Filipinos.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Philippine American Chamber of Commerce and the New York Club
of

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines

To the Philippine American Chamber of Commerce and the New York Club

[Delivered at the Hilton Hotel, New York, New York, September 19, 1986]

A NEW VISION OF THE PHILIPPINES

The Philippines has risen from the ruins of a 14-year tyranny, stronger in faith, politically united and thus able to fashion a dynamic economy. To bring about economic growth, the country is cutting back on the role of government even as it is setting up the basic conditions for entrepreneurship and industry. The three main areas of concern are outright assistance for start-up costs, money to produce and markets to sell in, and more liberal terms for debt-servicing.

Investors will find in the country a raft of business opportunities: an English-speaking, educated, cost-efficient labor force, renewable natural resources, some $7 billion of idle and under-used assets to dispose of.

Filipino economists propose an idea that foreign investors should find worth considering: putting the country's foreign debt to work by allowing investors to buy discounted Philippine paper and use it, at full value, for peso-equity in the Philippines.

Since I have come to America to talk to the private sector as well as to your government, it is not only a pleasure to be here tonight but a need as well.

I suspect there are two thoughts uppermost in your minds tonight: curiosity about the unlikely looking revolutionary you see before you, and concern how a people's power revolution can be a good basis for business.

You may feel that, while what happened in our revolution was true to American ideals, we remain a political risk. One woman's people power could be another man's mob. You watched in suspense and sympathy the birth of a new Philippines, but you wonder now how it will grow up. So, though you share our hopes, yet, as experienced observers of risk, you know how unstable post-dictatorship governments can be.

So tonight, you are looking for reassurance from me. Your hearts are with us but your minds are still uncertain. Well, I think I can reassure you. But I want to do more than that. I want to describe a new vision of the Philippines rising like a phoenix from the dust and ruins of a 14-year tyranny.

It is a vision of a Philippines strong in faith, united behind its political leadership, and thus able to fashion a dynamic economy. Once the second wealthiest Asian country after Japan, we have since plummeted off the charts. We call our economic malaise "crony capitalism." You would call it state capitalism. Neither phrase captures its essence. It was plain theft, plain but incredible. Only a tiny fraction of the $26 billion Mr. Marcos borrowed actually ended up in productive local investment. You have heard of capital flight, my predecessor broke the sound barrier – with a cargo plane.

When we went to the polls and then to the streets to oust a discredited regime we were fighting for many of the same economic goals that business America has embraced in recent years. The same objectives that have marked the Reagan revolution here – getting government off the backs of people and out of the pockets of business – are behind what we hope will prove to be a second or economic revolution.

Now, I don't want to overdo the parallel. Our revolution was rooted in the religious, political and cultural context of the Philippines. Although religion is a strong force in your national life, I doubt you would call your revolution a miracle. We believe ours was. For there is no other explanation for unarmed people standing against tanks and guns.

Nor do I expect you to understand the depth of our nationalism. A lot of what is now happening in our country is about recovering our self-respect. It would be hard for a proud and independent nation like yours which has never suffered tyranny to imagine the sense of degradation we Filipinos have felt in recent years.

This faith in ourselves which was reborn along EDSA is essential to our economic recovery. Don't let it make you nervous. You only have to look at Japan, Korea, Singapore and Indonesia to see that a strong nationalism was the inspiration to success.

What you now see in us is a nation experiencing a rebirth of pride and freedom. To a puzzled outside world, we may appear at times to be a trifle intoxicated with freedom; the changeover seems confused. But in fact, we enjoy more stability than we had when our country presented the monolithic facade of a dictatorship to the world. Behind that facade an armed insurgency grew from a mere 500 to over 16,000, and its 14 year-old dictatorship fell to a three months' siege of peaceful people power. Now government in the Philippines has recovered legitimacy and can pursue a credible twin-track policy towards the Communists: the olive branch of negotiations and the insurance of military reform.

The Filipinos believe in their government and are committed irrevocably to democracy. Over the past 14 years, we learned a hard lesson. Nothing is worth trading off freedom. It is this underlying stability that should reassure you. Do not be misled by the froth and antics of a handful of malcontents in Manila. We are moving forward steadily and on course. We have restored integrity to the Supreme Court and honor to the Armed Forces. The draft of a new constitution is about to be completed. A plebiscite is next and national elections after that. All in the next six months.

Like you, we, too, are cutting back on the role of government. We, too, are putting faith in the private sector. But the costs of doing so are high. Two-thirds of our nation live beneath the poverty line. The remaining one-third requires government to set up the basic conditions for entrepreneurship and industry. For ours, unlike yours, is not a land of virgin promise, amber waves of grain and fruited plains – but a country emptied of hope and stripped of its riches.

But we still have our respect for one another. Our people is our greatest asset, and our new economic order will be built on basic human values and rights. There will be no trading off freedom for prosperity.

This common path we are treading as two proud and independent nations gives us a basis of friendship that we have rarely had before: mutual respect. And it is on this basis that my message to you is made tonight. Invest in the Philippines. Not because we need your money although we clearly do; not because our people are poor although they are. Invest in the Philippines because it is to our mutual advantage.

Ours is an English-speaking, educated, cost-efficient labor force. Others took away our price advantage, now we are getting it back. Our wealth rests on our renewable natural resources, our agricultural abundance, despite the past neglect of this sector, and on a high level of human skills that have shown a remarkable capacity to innovate, copy and move quickly into new markets and products.

The escape from the repressive labor laws of the dictator has resulted, quite naturally, in more strikes than in the previous seven months, but these were settled more quickly. Why? Because the political consensus that underlies good labor relations has been restored. Filipinos believe in their country again. So what we now have in the Philippines is a committed workforce and a free one. One which understands that it must deliver a competitive cost advantage over its international competitors.

The astounding victory during our February revolution where we stood against tanks with our children around us, tells us that the country can now politically afford a liberal decentralized economy. At every level, this confidence factor is telling in our favor: our international reserves have nearly doubled the past six months, the peso has stabilized against the dollar, the foreign exchange black market has virtually vanished, and there is a positive GNP growth rate. For the next year, the IMF expects “a substantial recovery of six to seven percent.” That will be a dramatic turnaround, but my economic ministers will tell you that that is just the beginning.

Another business opportunity is to be found in our idle or underutilized productive capacity. As the government gets out of business, there is some $7 billion of idle and underused assets to dispose of.

I invite you to join us. We have fair and clear guidelines about foreign investment. I am keen to encourage joint ventures because this seems to me the way to ensure the long-term acceptance of foreign investors. We have sectors like public utilities, where, like any independent country, we wish to preserve full Filipino control but there also remain pioneer and export-oriented sectors where we give an equally warm welcome to 100 percent foreign ownership.

In conclusion, allow me to restate briefly and clearly what are our three main areas of concern.

First, outright assistance. We badly need what you call in business start-up costs, and we badly need funds to modernize our agricultural industry and provide jobs that will in turn energize our own local markets. I realize only too well, in view of your new tax laws, how constrained your budget is. Can you, however, match our miracle with one of your own and help us get started?

Second, trade. All the economists tell us we must export. But export requires two things: money to produce and markets to sell in. Yet almost everywhere we look, the markets are closed to us.

Third, debt. As a sovereign nation, we will honor all our legitimate obligations. However, given the many national needs that we have to fill, it wrenches my soul to think of using 50 percent of our foreign trade income to service interest payments. The monkey remains on our back. That monkey is the only thing we ever saw from the $26 billion.

Our own economists and financiers have proposed an idea that is worth considering. We will put the debt to work by allowing investors to buy discounted Philippine paper and use it, at full value, for peso-equity in the Philippines.

Earlier, I used the image of the phoenix, the mythical bird that dies only to rise again, more brilliantly, from its own ashes. Out there on EDSA, when my people placed their bodies against the tanks, when a single curse, a single act of violence would have pushed us beyond recall and forgiveness into calamity, our nation experienced a kind of death and rebirth. We died to our fears and were reborn to courage, and thereby recovered our freedom. We face our future with confidence because we are moving towards it with courage. This quality is not unknown to American enterprise, nor is the attraction of a great challenge. With the surety of success that courage gives, I invite you to join us in meeting the challenge of Philippine recovery and progress.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Benigno S. Aquino Foundation

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the Benigno S. Aquino Foundation

[Delivered in Boston, Massachusetts, September 20, 1986]

MY DREAMER'S DREAM

Non-violence was the wellspring from which flowed the current of the Filipino's yellow revolution. The current swept Corazon Aquino to power and the Philippines to freedom. It was not a destructive flow, as revolutions are wont to be, but rather a cleansing tide without a spot of blood to stain in the brightness of the future.

The word "Foundation" has such a ring of finality to it. When the Benigno S. Aquino, Jr., Foundation was setup after my husband's death, I was honored but sad. It seemed then that Ninoy and all he fought for were now to be buried and relegated to history. How could I have known then that years later, and to this day, we would still be involved in the making of history?

And so the Aquino Foundation did not serve, as I feared it would, as a marker on a grave, as a memorial of a solitary struggle and a passing outburst of public sympathy.

Your Foundation, and I hope I do not sound too presumptuous as I say this, might now function as the word "foundation" suggests. It serves to commemorate Ninoy's sacrifice, his principles, ideals and faith. For these have served, as much by Provident design as by his deliberate intention, as the foundation of that series of glorious actions by our people by which they recovered their pride and restored their freedom.

Last August 21, on the third anniversary of Ninoy's death, one of the afternoon events involved the laying of a plaque on the tarmac of the Manila International Airport. A memorial slab was placed on the exact spot where Ninoy was sprawled in a pool of his own blood. Earlier that day, at Santo Domingo Church, I had summed up the meaning of this image that served as the icon of our Revolution.

"One man sprawled on the tarmac; one seed fallen to the ground, watered with blood. Tyranny had sowed a bullet and reaped a revolution. One man had worked the reluctant field of his people, finally threw in his life, and brought us home a harvest of freedom."

Coretta King, widow of American martyr and hero Martin Luther King, had joined me on the tarmac. It occurred to me, as we watched the plaque being fitted in its place, how Coretta and I were so privileged. We had walked with our husbands as they sowed their message of liberation and watched them moisten the seeds of their ideals with their own blood. And then they had left us and our people to reap and enjoy what they had planted so well.

Coretta King spoke of both Martin Luther and Ninoy, "Both of these men," she said, "shared a passionate commitment to the philosophy and strategy of non-violence. And both men knew they would pay the highest price for their commitment to freedom. They proved that the forces of repression and brutality can slay the dreamer but not the dream."

That founding philosophy, revolving around the ways of peace as the means of change, with brotherhood, justice, freedom, as the fruits of that change, was the wellspring from which flowed the current of our yellow revolution. That current, as you know, swept me to power and our nation to freedom. It was not a destructive flood, as revolutions are wont to be, but rather a cleansing tide without a spot of blood to stain the brightness of the future. Indeed we reaped, not the nightmare predicted by so many, but my dreamer's dream.

I had never before that day seen that place on the tarmac where Ninoy fell. The traces of his blood, certainly, were gone. A permanent marker, cut of stone and metal, had taken its place. As I stood above the marker to read it, I felt myself on solid ground. My standing as chief executive of our recently liberated country is moored on Ninoy's legacy and sacrifice. My role is to nurture our people's commitment to reconciliation, unity, peace and democracy. These are the offshoots of the seed sown on August 21, 1983.

In that task of helping these ideals take firmer root, I am glad that Ninoy is my foundation. I have used what I had learned observing him as a brave correspondent, a young and fast-rising politician and already the champion of democracy against the growing threat of dictatorship, and then as a prisoner of that dictatorship, an exile from it, and finally as the victim of its arrogance and the nemesis of all its victims.

It was here in Boston and in the fellowship of his expatriate countrymen that Ninoy found the comforting community and the tranquil surroundings needed to refine his vision and prepare himself for the final struggle. And it was in Harvard, in its libraries and among its students, its learned fellow and faculty, that he found the wide perspective and the intellectual rigor to fully understand the nature of the struggle he had been waging and the further requirements for its success. Certainly, his respect for American libertarian ideals was strengthened here, where the seeds of modern democracy were first planted. It was here in Boston where Ninoy had his first taste of the good life, the free life, after almost eight long years of suffering. It was here that he had his last taste of it. Forgive my immodesty if I point out with pride that my husband went willingly to his death, not to escape desperate circumstances, but from the joys of freedom and family.

I must thank the Benigno S. Aquino, Jr. Foundation for remembering my husband, for preserving the memorabilia of our years in this Camelot of a city that was the last home he knew. For Ninoy was snatched away at the last moment before he could step into his old home again and spirited away to the pantheon of our heroes. I must thank you for giving me this opportunity to be among you once again. Ninoy is no longer with us. But as he was wont to be in life, he is once again the center of attention, the life of the party, the dominant figure in this gathering. In only one aspect have I managed to outdo him today. For once, it is I, and not he, who has done most of the talking. But he will forgive, as long it is he who is the main topic of all conversation. And that, I think, we will gladly oblige.

A SUPERHIGHWAY OF JUSTICE

There is a community of aspiration that unites all of humanity in one single-minded effort to lift up the quality of life everywhere. There is a link between the tragedy that struck down Martin Luther King, John F. Kennedy and Robert Kennedy, and the tragedy that took Jose Rizal and Ninoy Aquino in the Philippines. A tortuous road which has led from Montgomery to Manila to Massachusetts is a road over which millions of individuals have traveled to renew their sense of dignity. The Philippines and the United States can help widen that narrow road into what Martin Luther King referred to as a superhighway of justice.

In receiving me here today and giving me this very high honor, I know only too well that it is the people of the Philippines whom you really honor. And I know that in paying them this tribute you do so in recognition of the ideals we share despite distance between us.

Therefore I will respond in behalf of all my countrymen: we deeply appreciate this expression of your regard. We accept it in all humility, conscious that the fight for democracy and freedom is never won once and for all, least of all in the soil of ferment and change which is the Philippines today.

To be honored in this way by this distinguished University in this famous City of Boston has for us a very personal meaning and importance. For Boston for a time was the home in exile of my late husband, Senator Benigno Aquino, and our family. At a time when the prospects for change in our land still looked forlorn and distant, your city and its great institutions of learning provided us understanding and support, and enabled us to keep the flame of hope alive, the hope that we could go back home in freedom.

Standing again in your company, almost seven months after that hope was fulfilled, we are encouraged to believe that our present labor to rebuild a devastated nation will just as quickly find fulfillment.

The story is told of your Reverend John Winthrop, upon first sighting the land that would be Boston, said: "we must always consider that we shall be as a city upon a hill – the eyes of all people are upon us."

Something close to that is the challenge we now face in the Philippines. The eyes of the entire world are upon us. Before us the way is daunting and perilous, and uncharted in some parts. But we do not intend to fail.

I long to be able to tell you that there will unfailingly rise on Philippine soil a community as strong, as stable and as progressive as you have here in Boston, in Massachusetts and in America. But this is, as you say here in your country, "a tall order." But our present labors – resolute, unyielding and total – will fill out the rest of the story, a success story.

Remember if you will, that, not too long ago people were telling us that effecting a peaceful change of government in the Philippines was an impossible task. Yet we have done the impossible!

Who is to say that we cannot do it again? That we cannot carry the rebirth of freedom in our country to a new day of peace and progress in our land?

Boston University calls to mind Martin Luther King who received here his divinity training and degree. He too had a dream which in his lifetime looked impossible of realization. Yet we now see how he brought that vision before the conscience of America and gave it life, and how it lives on as a standard for millions to carry and live up to today. You did yourselves proud in erecting a monument to his memory.

This city and state call to mind another martyr, John F. Kennedy who raised before this nation and the world an image of government placed in the service of the highest purposes and ideals. Violence struck him down, but his legacy has never been lost. Camelot is not forgotten, and as Senator Edward Kennedy has said: "the work goes on, the cause endures and the dream shall never die."

There is a community of aspiration, I believe, that unites all of humanity in one single-minded effort to lift up the quality of life everywhere. There is a link between the tragedy that struck down Martin Luther King, John F. Kennedy and Robert Kennedy and the tragedy that took our own Jose Rizal and Ninoy Aquino in the Philippines. And there is a link between the triumphs that these tragedies all brought to fulfillment.

We are "riders on the earth together," as the poet Archibald Macleish memorably put it, "brothers in the unending night." While the everyday world may bear to us tidings of conflicts and divisions from all corners of the globe, something else incessantly unites us in our common humanity, cutting through the boundaries that separate nations from one another.

No human institution better fosters this thread of union than our universities and places of learning. For it is here, I believe, where the kinship of people is sustained and enabled to grow.

Here at Boston University you have a center for democracy, whose work, let me say now, has been of the deepest relevance to what has happened and is happening in my country today. I take this opportunity to acknowledge publicly on behalf of my people and government the center's and the university's support for us. And let me say also that I have asked our own University of the Philippines to formally take part in the inauguration of the proposed "Democracy Hall" being put up by the center and the City of Boston, by providing an exhibit of our experiences, at once unique and universal, in bringing democracy back to the Philippines.

After nearly a century, relations between the United States and the Philippines have become the subject of many clichés. There is one, however, that seems to me to have survived time and abuse, and lives on in the experiences of our two peoples. It is that one which says that Americans and Filipinos drink from the common fount of democracy.

This is so because there will always be people like Martin Luther King and Ninoy Aquino who belong to their dreams. Our peoples will always respond to leaders who can agree with what Dr. King said: "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere," or be inspired by what my own husband said of his oppressed people: "The Filipino is worth dying for."

Dr. King's principle of non-violence was often mentioned in the dying years of the dictatorship in my country, when we would go back to him, Rosa Parks, Gandhi, and Henry David Thoreau, all the way to Antigone, for models of peaceful protest. Thus we can paraphrase him and say that the tortuous road which has led from Montgomery to Manila to Massachusetts is a road over which millions of individuals have traveled, to renew their sense of dignity. And after this morning's touching occasion where you honor my country, let us do what we can to help widen that narrow road into what Martin Luther King referred to as "a superhighway of justice."

A SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY

To the Aquino family, Boston is a special city. It gave them the last home that they shared together. But beyond personal reasons, President Aquino is endeared to Boston because it is a cradle of freedom.

For me, this is a sentimental journey home.

Once I made up my mind to come, there was no question I would visit Boston, which gave us the last home that Ninoy and I and our children shared. And Boston, of course, gave him his first taste of freedom after almost eight years in a tiny, windowless cell. That was a God-sent gift to feel free at last in the mother city of American freedom. Boston gave us the happiest years of our lives together.

But Boston and the Great Commonwealth of Massachusetts has more than a personal meaning for one Filipino. As early as 1796, a vigorous trade was carried on between Salem and Boston, on the one hand, and the Philippines, on the other. No Salem boy thought the Philippines were canned goods! Indeed, it is recorded that “four and a quarter million pounds of sugar were landed at Boston in 1843.” What a change for the worse since then for Philippine sugar in the United States! But while direct trade in goods between Salem and Manila ceased in 1858, a nobler trade in ideas developed.

We recognized this even greater contribution. Ninoy was in love with this city, its history, and its institutions that are so congenial to reflection and learning. Not for nothing, he would say, is this city called the Athens of America. Boston was in his Athenian exile, the fount of liberty; the city on the hill that beckoned to him in his thirst to know more about freedom and the rights that protect it. For me, Boston was just the plain loveliest city I have known, and, of course, the home of the Celtics, in the State that gave birth to basketball.

If sugar and liberty were our historic links, basketball is what brings your fair state to vivid life for many Filipinos, who are even more fanatic about the game than you are. Indeed, some people might want nothing better than for us to pirate Larry Bird, a household name back home, to play in Manila. However, this might wipe out our foreign exchange reserves and imperil my talks with the New York bankers on Monday. And the last thing we can afford at the moment is a two-front war, against communist insurgents at home and Celtic fans over here.

Let me acknowledge the contributions of your learned statesmen, judges, writers, educators, businessmen, and politicians to the effort of everyone and every country in the world, mine especially, to achieve freedom through the liberating power of truth and progress through freedom. It was with the words of one of them, Ralph Waldo Emerson, that I consoled myself when Ninoy was killed. The shot, I prayed, would be “heard round the world” and rouse at least my people.

Despite some nitpicking as to the background of some guests at the Boston Tea Party, that great social event was the great inspiration of our passive resistance, even as your Thoreau was our teacher.

And today, as the leader of a people who yearn for peace so they can bind their wounds and rebuild their house, I take the counsel of your bold son whom Filipinos loved and admired as much as you did. “Let us never negotiate out of fear, but let us never fear to negotiate.” And in my desire to have peace at last, I am as determined as he was to “pay any price, bear any burden, and meet any hardship.” With those words, I overcame the objections of my advisers and security officers and went to the site of our country’s most bitter conflict to talk peace with the chief of the secessionist movement.

Clearly some of the world’s broadest and most penetrating intellects were from here. It is a little ironic that it should be said that the streets of Boston are laid out along 17th century cow paths and that to drive around here you have to think like a cow. The fact is, no more forward-looking and broad-perspectived citizens, who see the world without blinders, are to be found than here.

I therefore stand extremely honored and awed in this cradle of freedom.

I think I have gushed enough over this city of happy memories for me. Let me just conclude by saying that I believe that the Boston Red Sox and Roger Clemens will continue to be on top of the American League: they will win the pennant, the playoffs and the World Series. And I wish you many splendid autumn memories this winter, and as happy as those my children and I will always have of Boston.

On remembering Ninoy

[Delivered at the St. Ignatius Boston College, Boston, Massachusetts, September 21, 1986]

REMEMBERING NINOY

Ninoy's life had run its full course. Not a minute or day could be added or subtracted. He left exactly at the appointed time, in the fullness of his development, a worthy sacrifice to a noble cause: the rebirth of democracy whose time had come.

I am glad to be here again among familiar faces: in this church that offered a place of solace and meditation, in this city that provided the last home Ninoy, the children and I would ever share.

I wish now to speak less about myself than of Ninoy. Since many of you were his friends and you miss him as I do, I thought you might want to spend a few moments of remembrance.

I have stood, for the past ten months, in the vortex of political events, first as the challenger to the dictator and then as the President that took away his place. If I had plotted the scenario of those events, I would not be at the center but Ninoy. I would have given to Ninoy the role of populist leader and revolutionary. After all, he was the star of the family. And he was better rehearsed for the part. Ninoy had been our country's youngest mayor, governor, and senator. He was the chief challenger to Marcos' ambition. He seemed the logical choice for next president. He became, at any rate, Marcos's logical choice to be the first in jail.

But scenarios in the real world, I've learned, do not unfold as we expect them to. People have remarked what a waste of a life Ninoy's was, what a waste of brains, of political savvy, of vast experience and knowledge, of sheer energy that flowed through him more abundantly than most other men. But perhaps no less than the sacrifice of a man for all men was needed to give freedom back to a whole nation.

Still the question: Why should others, who did not push the plow and sow as tirelessly as he had, enjoy the harvest?

Faced with questions like these, I am glad my foundations are in my Faith. For I am certain that Ninoy is savoring the fruits of his labors with greater relish than any of us. For Faith tells us that men of faith are meant for greater ends and richer rewards than we can imagine. And adding to Ninoy's joy is the knowledge that he pulled a fast one on me. Once again, he has gone his merry way and left me behind to pick up after him.

Thanks to my faith also, I can see that Ninoy's life had run its full course. Not a minute or a day could be added or subtracted. He left us exactly at the appointed time, in the fullness of his development, a worthy sacrifice to a noble cause: the rebirth of democracy whose time had come.

Ninoy was a man in a hurry, rushing through his incarnations as local politician, national leader, and champion of the opposition, to meet his appointment in jail so he could begin his education as a man fit to be the liberator of his people.

For it was during those seven and a half years in a military stockade in Fort Bonifacio, most of it spent in solitary confinement, that Ninoy grew to his full measure as a man. It was in that empty, windowless cell, that Ninoy saw the things that had eluded him: the vanity of ambition, the true meaning of freedom, the limitless endurance of the human spirit, and the real purpose of his life. By shutting one door on Ninoy, Marcos opened the other one to his destiny.

From the teachings of the Bible, which he read and reread, Ninoy formed a new strategy for political change. It was a strategy of mercy, peace and gentleness, of the Christian virtues of forgiveness and self-sacrifice. The pragmatic politician in Ninoy remained to work out the means, but it was his Christian conscience that shaped those means for their noble and gentle purpose: the return of freedom through reconciliation.

Still there are those who would say what a waste of manhood Ninoy was, to be cut down in his prime, the perfect leader for his country and time. But it is said in the Old Testament that only the most pleasing sacrifice would move heaven to give an abundant harvest. I would like to believe that in a very similar way Ninoy was such a sacrifice. He came from our people, and thus atoned for our apathy. He came from the discredited world of democratic politics, so no one else or less could redeem it in the eyes of our people. We had failed so miserably to protect our cherished freedoms that only the best of us could make up for our neglect and failure. I would like to believe that his martyrdom is an assurance of the abundance and prosperity that might someday be restored to our land.

Perhaps I read too much into recent events, in which case I hope you will forgive me. Like Ninoy, I find so much hope and strength in my Faith. Also, I know I speak before an audience of his friends; and who else will indulge and be patient with me, than you who were so supportive and indulgent during our years here in exile? Among you he regained his good cheer and confidence. With the resident professors and wits of Boston academe, Ninoy matched and sharpened his wits. In this liberal and reflective atmosphere, Ninoy found the space and atmosphere to work out and refine his vision of non-violent change in the Philippines.

In the lives of those who are committed, nothing happens by accident. Even when Ninoy won too many rounds of mahjong, I knew there was more to it than luck. In fact the word is out that those of you who played with him would let him win to lift him out of his occasional depression. He would never have admitted that. But I suppose, with the victory of his cause, he can afford to be magnanimous. And so, in his behalf, I thank you for these little things and for the big things; for making Ninoy's stay here so pleasant, for helping to fill his cup of joy before he went home to drain it in sacrifice, and for extending to me the same familiar warmth and acceptance.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights

[Delivered at the New York Westin Hotel, New York, New York, September 21, 1986]

HUMAN RIGHTS FOR ALL

The rule of law is the only human order. Its perversion, going by the name of “law and order” or “national security,” should fool no one except those willing to be fooled. To think of human rights at all, to be concerned about them, should be to think universally of human rights for all.

Exactly 14 years ago to the day, my predecessor proclaimed martial law, jailed my husband, deprived us all of our freedom and made us conscious of what human rights were all about.

It seems only fitting then that I should begin by paying tribute to some of those who helped us regain our freedoms.

The Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, was for many years, supportive of our struggle. In the dark years of the dictatorship, these lawyers would go to the Philippines to offer assistance and good cheer to the human rights movement there. It is one of several organizations world-wide which contributed to our liberation. These groups enabled the world to have a window on the gross violation of human rights in my country.

To speak of human rights to those whose Declaration of Independence holds the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness as unalienable, may be presumptuous as it is unnecessary. But, what is familiar is taken for granted, like breathing, until it is taken away. Then the heart stops. Then it is realized too late that one cannot live without it.

My late husband used to say, in moments of introspection, that one reason we have to be grateful for martial law is that, by it, we came to appreciate our cherished freedoms.

On August 21, 1983, the forces of evil violated my husband’s human right to life, as well as his right to return to live in his homeland. But the soil watered by the blood of our numerous martyrs – my husband was only one of them – soon reaped for us the blessing of freedom.

The spectre of “salvaging,” and disappearances, we hope, will soon be gone completely. We are committed to respect the right to human dignity, the right not to be tortured, the right not to be held incommunicado, of everyone.

We likewise guarantee the basic human right to take part in the political process, by way of free speech, free assembly, voting and being voted for.

Our government sponsors a liberal atmosphere. Here, you may have three or four newspapers. We have about two dozen back home.

I am confident that the whole world learned something from our peaceful revolution, a vindication of the principle that one can only continue to govern with the consent of the governed.

My predecessor arbitrarily imprisoned tens of thousands without charges, for merely opposing or criticizing him. For my part I have not caused to be arrested even a single person for merely espousing dissenting or critical views, no matter how intemperate or vulgar.

Where my predecessor thrived on secrecy, I have an open presidency. If I have taken steps that might seem to some remarkable, kindly note that I could not have just taken over as if the transition from a dictatorship to a democracy were the most ordinary, routinary thing in the world.

True, democracy is subject to pressure by all sorts of interests, some enlightened; many, if not most, grossly not. Lobbies are a democratic institution. In my country the gap between the rich, who are not many, and the poor, who are not few, remains, and it is the purpose of the new government to close or at least narrow it. It cannot be done in a few months or even years, but surely not never! In any case dictatorship cannot do the job at all. Terror supports greed.

The record of our government so far is mixed, given the complexity of the problems we inherited. Some things are however totally within our control without having to be bothered by objective conditions at home and abroad. Setting a high standard of public morality depends on us. Corruption at the highest levels permeated the previous regime. We have reversed this.

The vast majority of our people reject insurgency and have kept faith with the democratic principle. As President of the Philippines, however, I am the leader of all Filipinos. Therefore, I am obligated, while trying to eliminate the insurgency, to be careful about how rebels as human beings should be treated.

As has been said, one does not defend democracy by totalitarian means. And only last September 5, our Supreme Court once more cautioned the authorities against committing human rights abuses in its campaign against rebellion and subversion, saying that these do not help in solving the problem.

“A cavalier attitude towards constitutional liberties and protections,” the court said, “will only fan the increase of subversive activities, instead of containing and suppressing them.”

This has created some problems and tensions, but this too we will solve, in our own time and in our way.

The rule of law – not of one man, junta or party – is the only human order. Its perversion, going by the name of “law and order” or “national security,” should fool no one except those willing and eager to be fooled, perhaps expecting to profit from the cruel masquerade.

Democracy is the worst form of government except all others, as Churchill put it. We live as human beings, not as objects to be manipulated at another’s whim. We are subject only to impersonal law. We are not subjects but persons of inherent worth. But we may not enjoy this status all by ourselves. No man is an island, to quote John Donne. We are involved in mankind.

To think of human rights at all, to be concerned about them, should be to think universally, of human rights for all. I need not quote Donne again about the tolling of the bell. You know for whom it tolls.

Do continue your efforts then until your kind of human rights lawyering becomes almost unnecessary. But today, the struggle for human rights is far from over. A lot remains to be done all over the world.

Our Constitutional Commission now in session has an admirable Bill of Rights, containing lessons distilled from the bitter crucible of Martial Law. And we say, “never again.”

This we intend to insure with the help of all our golden friends like the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights.

If I may be permitted, I would also like to take this opportunity to acknowledge at the same time the splendid, continuing efforts of other groups and individuals who are helping us extricate ourselves from the mess we inherited.

In my first Executive Order, after the February Revolution, I created the Presidential Commission on Good Government. I tasked it with recovering the enormous wealth that had been stolen and concealed, not only in the Philippines but in the other countries of the world, including the United States and Switzerland. In this country, where a good portion of the ill-gotten wealth is located, we needed – and fortunately obtained – the pro bono services of distinguished lawyers connected with the Center for Constitutional Rights. They represent us with skill and vigor in various courts, without thought of material reward. In addition, we obtained the counselling service of an eminent group of international law experts associated with the best law schools and law firms in this country. These men and women of the law have sent a clear message everywhere: no dictator may pillage his country and retire unchallenged on the spoils of his corruption.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Asia Society

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Asia Society

NINYO'S LEGACY

By Ninoy Aquino's death, he gave a new life and added new force to the Filipino people's longing for liberation. As he predicted, Marcos had to step down and thereby make it possible for the Filipinos to lay the basis for national unity.

The Asia Society will always be close to my heart. It was the first major organization to give my husband, Ninoy, a forum when he was in exile. Early this year, in its desire to provide Americans with an accurate basis to assess and understand important events in Asia, the society also sent to the Philippines a very distinguished study group. It came out with an authoritative report on the February elections and on the events leading to the departure of the dictator.

When Ninoy Aquino came here as a politician in exile, he spoke to you of convictions that we both shared. Those convictions did not die with him. I treasure them because they are his legacy not only to the Filipino people but also to me personally.

The strong convictions that the Filipino people and I have should not surprise you. They are the same ones Ninoy Aquino had already articulated before you.

He spoke to you about the right to elect the officials of the people's choice in free, orderly and honest elections. Only when this right is respected can there be a peaceful transition of power. And any tyrant who makes a mockery of this rightful exercise of freedom would suffer the consequences of his arrogance. This is the path the country took and events have vindicated both Ninoy and his people.

This vindication did not come without pain and sacrifice. As fate would have it, his challenge to again willingly face death in a freedom struggle was taken only too literally by a government that refused to heed the voice of conscience and moderation. By his death, he gave new life and added new force to my people's longing for liberation. Thus, as he predicted, Marcos had to step down and thereby make it possible for us to lay the basis for national unity.

He came here six years ago to express to you how much he dreaded the prospect of mothers weeping over their sons being sacrificed at the altar of revolution. Because he placed the highest value on human life, he did not relish the prospect of Filipinos dying senselessly in a revolution where everyone suffers because in the end, there can be no true victors, since the cost in human lives is unaffordable and even the apparent victors end up inheriting a graveyard.

The mantle of leadership of the Filipino people has fallen on my shoulders. In moments of loneliness, under pressure, I find solace in Ninoy's faith in the Filipino. I draw comfort and confidence from his assurance that I am leading a great people: one that he died for, one that I must live and work for!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at a special meeting with friends of the Philippines

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At a special meeting with friends of the Philippines

[Delivered on September 22, 1986]

AN OPEN ECONOMY

The Philippines has a strategic vision of what it must do in order to build a strong national economy over the long term. In the same way it runs an open government, the Aquino Administration opts for a more open economy – one that welcomes any legitimate investor, regardless of nationality, provided he shares the Filipino's interest in developing the Philippine economy.

My friends, I wish to thank all of you for accepting my invitation to come to this special meeting of friends of the Philippines.

I had already talked about the past and about the many problems we inherited from the previous administration. I have also given an indication of the solutions we are trying to implement to resolve our many problems. But I want you to know that we cannot limit ourselves to simply putting out fires from the past. We must also have a strategic vision of what we must do in order to build a strong Philippine economy over the long-term.

In trying to formulate such a strategy, we in the Philippines have found out it is not enough to secure peace in the labor front. We also have to put in place all the necessary infrastructure at standards of efficiency that modern business demands. Our telephones must work. Our electricity must be available and affordable. All public utilities must be kept in proper working order.

Allow me to tell you, however, that based on our experience, it is not only the technical aspects of economic policy that determine the business environment in the Philippines. It is also the sincerity of the government itself, and the integrity of government leadership. I know we have to win your respect and keep our credibility. I can only assure you that we are trying our very best.

Please do not doubt the commitment of my administration to a program of reforms that will make our investment climate favorable to private business. We are committed to a strong, independent financial system, freed from the abuses of the past. We want to speed up our privatization program. We are putting back market rules. We are removing unnecessary regulations that only stifle and strangle business initiative. We are liberalizing all aspects of our economy, not only because it is good for us, but also because we are fully convinced it will attract the investors we want.

I am running an open government, one that is open to the wishes, aspirations and advice of my people. I would like a more open economy also, one that welcomes any legitimate investor, regardless of nationality, provided he shares our interest in quickly developing the Philippine economy.

It is in an open economy that investors best thrive. It is there that you can be of most help.

Your help can come not only in the equity funds you are trying to raise for investment in the Philippines. Your help can count the most if you can come and interact with us.

We can openly tell you what our problems are, what we are trying to do about them, what our progress is, and what our difficulties are as we travel up the path of growth and development. But we recognize there are other views, other perceptions, other suggestions we can listen to with profit.

Your advice will be welcome; but also your understanding and support. As friends of the Philippines, in a spirit of candor, you can tell us what we can do to further improve the conditions under which business thrives and investments flow in. You can help monitor the consistency between our words and deeds; and you can tell your friends as well as your respective constituencies of our problems, our programs and of the business opportunities we have to offer.

I deeply appreciate the efforts you are making to bring equity funds into the Philippines. But I am even more appreciative of the openness you have shown towards our offer of friendship.

In closing, let me emphasize that we would like the Philippine economy to work, and that I want you and your friends and constituents to work very closely with us.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Non-violence as the Key to Peace

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Non-violence as the Key to Peace

[Delivered at the Saunders Theater Memorial Hall, Harvard University, September 22, 1986]

NON-VIOLENCE: THE KEY TO PEACE

Non-violence is not the only force that can collect the power of the people and bring it to near overwhelmingly on an object. Religious fanaticism, class hatred, and military patriotism can serve as well. But only non-violence can achieve a moral purpose without compromising it, especially if that purpose is peace.

I am most grateful for your invitation to speak at Harvard. It was in Harvard where Ninoy found the leisure and atmosphere to reflect on the meaning of his prison years for his country. And it was from our home in Newton, so close to Harvard, that he made his final trip to bring home the fruit of his reflections.

He had written out his thoughts for an arrival statement. His statement said in part: "I have returned of my own free will to join the ranks of those struggling to restore our rights and freedoms through non-violence. . . . According to Gandhi, the willing sacrifice of the innocent is the most powerful answer to insolent tyranny that has yet been conceived by God and man." He did not have a chance to read that statement. Instead he lay on the tarmac of the Manila International Airport, his head in a bright pool of blood, a vivid statement of his final testament on non-violence and a stark image of insolent tyranny's response to it. Allow me therefore to tell you the story of non-violence in my country. It is the story of a man, my husband Ninoy. It is the story of a people who, with that stark image before them, still took the course of non-violence. And it is the story of Faith, our faith, that gave us the courage to take it to the end.

Ninoy, before he came to Harvard, had spent seven years and seven months in prison, each day an eternity to a man of his restless energy. It was there in his lonely suffering that he found himself. And it was partly what he read: Gandhi, Martin Luther King, and others. Much more though, it was the personal revelation that came to him as a result of struggle and prayer.

He came to Harvard to rest his thoughts in an atmosphere so different from his tiny cell in Fort Bonifacio. His conclusion remained the same – I shall return of my own free will to my troubled land to join the ranks of those struggling to restore our rights and freedoms through non-violence. It was the hard-earned gift he was bringing home to his people when he was shot down at the airport.

His assassins meant to steal that gift. Instead they ended up playing their part in a chain of non-violent events that was to purge our nation of dictatorship. Two million people threw aside passivity and fear and marched for ten long hours in his funeral procession. Until then, non-violence was the "unpopular alternative". After that day of mourning it was the face of the Philippine revolution.

The ground swell of non-violent activism grew by leaps and bounds. Demonstrations multiplied. Already one of its strongest elements was emerging: the women. The women in the demonstrations reached across wire and human barriers to the impassive soldiers who kept sullen guard on what was happening. When you touch the humanity of your opponent, you find a way to his basic decency. That is the central part of non-violence change.

In late 1985 the announcement came of "snap elections." In conventional political terms the opposition was not ready for snap elections. We did not have a unified political ticket. The Marcos political machine – with its guns, goons, and gold – seemed unbeatable. The regime also controlled television and most of the radio and press. It had control of the Commission on Elections and of everything else needed by a dictator who considered elections a public relations exercise for foreign consumption and not the essence of democracy for his people. But for non-violence the timing was correct. Any longer and the forces of conflict and polarization that were building up might have been uncontrollable. And Marcos lacked the one thing he needed to keep power when confronted by the full force of non-violence. He did not have the people.

The Filipino people offered their lives to deliver the election from Mr. Marcos. In the case of Evelio Javier, an alumnus of Harvard's Kennedy School, the offer was taken after he won his province for us. One of my campaign leaders was brutally gunned down; his thumbs and forefingers were slashed off so he could no longer make the Laban "L" sign. Across the land ordinary people, volunteer poll-watchers and campaign workers, offered themselves for the ultimate sacrifice. Women tied themselves to ballot boxes. Still the cheating went on. Authorities announced the results without counting the ballots. A desperate regime sought to construct a win for itself within the secret world of computers. But People Power was everywhere. And from the inner sanctum of the regime's computer center, computer operators walked out in protest and sought sanctuary in the protective walls of a church. Nervously huddled together, they announced the fraud to assembled newsmen and foreign election observers.

Rally continued to follow rally. And when Mr. Marcos's paid parliament announced his "election," a million people assembled at the Luneta Park, where our national hero, Jose Rizal, another advocate of non-violence, was shot, to proclaim their true victory. I announced to them a campaign of boycott and passive resistance. To some it seemed tame. People's blood was up. Yet what was irresistible was our determination and our numbers; what was irrevocable was his fate. I was advised to capitalize on the nation's rage and direct it towards a confrontation with the Palace. But I believed that the path we chose to victory must continue to prefigure the end we had proclaimed: non-violent change and reconciliation. Marcos had claimed a hollow electoral victory; and in the final act he fell to the unique force of People Power.

On February 25, seven months ago, I took the oath of office. Across town, Marcos clung on for a few more hours. As I placed my hand on the Bible to take my oath, I knew deep within me that Ninoy's death was indeed; as the Bible says, the dying seed that had to fall to the ground to bring forth new life. I don't think that I need say how much I wished for myself and for my children that it had been Ninoy standing there bring sworn in. Yet I understood why it could not be.

Let me now examine more closely with you non-violence, and particularly its Filipino manifestation, People Power.

Imagine if we had come to power through the barrel of a gun. Yes, we could still have emptied the prisons of political prisoners; but would we not have had to fill them again with our new sworn enemies? How indeed could we have effected violent change without creating an opening for the communist insurgents? How, with two-thirds of our people below the poverty line, could we have asked them to come out to fight and then sent them back to their barrios when there was still not enough food in their stomachs and no decent set of clothes on their backs?

I make these points because it is wrong to see non-violence as somehow being the amateur political option. Despite all the wars that have been fought in the name of democracy, may I say that democracy's essential values are peaceful and are best preserved by peaceful means. Yet I must also admit that a war conducted through non-violence cannot succeed merely through efficient organization. In our case, one has to look to wider roots in Philippine society.

Inevitably one starts with our faith and our Church. People Power is prayer power. That is the force that lifted it up and gave individuals and the mass the courage to do what they did. If you ask ordinary Filipinos for their recollections of the weekend of revolution, more likely than not, the images they recall will have a religious metaphor. For example, there is the story of the old man, with his lunch box in the crowd outside the military camps, breaking bread with a soldier. There were the indomitable nuns at every stage of the election and revolution. And it was the Cardinal's call that sent hundreds of thousands into the streets to make themselves a human shield for the military revolt. There is the image of the military who joined us, clinging to the statue of the Virgin, for the protection that the guns slung over their shoulders could not give them against the impressive deployment of Marcos tanks that surrounded them.

The non-violence movement began, as I have said, with Ninoy's funeral procession. From then on masses, religious rites on the anniversaries of significant dates, and a strong religious symbolism throughout, kept non-violence entwined with our Catholic faith. We believe that the revolution was a miracle. By that we don't mean a flash of divine intervention. That would negate everything I have said about the steady build-up of the non-violence movement. But how, if not by a miracle, did a people find the courage that had eluded them throughout 14 years of abuse and shame? An aborted coup attempt by a brave handful of military leaders who had seen the light was not a promising start for the final act of the struggle. I, myself, had suspected we would have to pursue our campaign of boycotts and passive resistance through two or three difficult months before the dictator would topple from his throne. As one of our bishops has written, "The fact is that the revolution was a remarkably extraordinary event and when it ended four days after it began, no one – absolutely no one – could say that its results were what he or she had expected them to be four days earlier, when it all began."

That may not amount to a miracle that will satisfy a theologian's standards. But for the man or woman in the street and for us, politicians, at the center of the struggle, I cannot think of a better word.

Now let me offer some thoughts and predictions on the future of the philosophy of non-violence in the Philippines. My government, you will say, faces an armed and determined communist insurgency, an army impatient to get at them with military means, and the remnants of the right still loyal to Marcos. Faced with these, am I not going like a sheep to the slaughter by espousing non-violence and harmony as methods of government?

Non-violence is a strategy that is politically sophisticated, or I would not have entered the political fray with it. My political strength in the Philippines rests on my popular support. No traditional politician let alone Communist leader can come anywhere close to it. Despite the intimidation and fraud, the conclusion of the international observers, who have reconstructed the genuine electoral vote, is that I won by a historic landslide. Anybody who joined us in the campaign trail will know there was a quality of fervor that is absent from normal politics.

This comes from the niche I occupy as the result of my husband's life, the circumstances of his death, and the nature of the political movement that grew from it. In other words, my support is rooted in People Power and what made it: the non-violent approach. It would be a foolish politician who jeopardized all that by reaching for a gun whenever he or she is challenged. Other people need guns precisely because they have not got my People Power. In the elections, Marcos had money but I had what he wanted and couldn't buy: the support, the power of the people.

Does this mean that I reject the use of violence to solve political problems? Let me turn to the words of Archibald MacLeish: "How shall freedom be defended? By arms when it is attacked by arms; by truth when it is attacked by lies; by democratic faith when it is attacked by authoritarian dogma. Always and in the final act by determination and faith."

I believe in the Christian doctrine of the just war. But that is a war that People Power would never oppose because it would be on the same side.

Let me outline to you the conditions under which I would resort to arms. The moral imperative of my Presidency is that we do not resort to violence where there is a peaceful way. There must be no slippage in our commitment to human rights, democracy, and the rule of law. For on these rest our moral authority and our power. When a handful of drunken Marcos supporters set up court for a few days at the Manila Hotel, the military, as a reflex action, brought up artillery. I could have drowned their revels in its thunder and still have been widely applauded for it. Instead I talked them out of their silliness. More significantly, we have tried all means at our disposal to strike up a dialogue with both the Communists and the Muslim separatists. There is a tacit contract between myself and the Filipino people: I would be the President of all the people and would keep power as I had come to it; through the popular will and the pursuit of peace.

Obviously it is a terrible strain on the military when they are asked to honor a suspension of active hostilities that the other side seems reluctant to follow. But the success of any later military action depends on the moral basis of a sincere effort to explore the path of negotiation to the utmost.

Non-violence is not the only force than can collect the power of the people and bring it to bear overwhelmingly on an object. Religious fanaticism, class hatred, and a militant patriotism can serve as well. But only non-violence can achieve a moral purpose without compromising it, especially if that purpose is peace. For all its unwieldy size, it cuts through to its objective with the precision of a surgical knife, neatly excising the cancer from the body politic without damage to the surrounding tissue. The healing comes faster as a result. Let me pursue this medical metaphor. Non-violence is suited to the political surgeon who wishes to heal the body and not punish its failing. If revenge is the purpose, then a blunter instrument is necessary. That was not our purpose. We wanted a change for the better and the swift healing of the wounds of the past.

Let me close with what would have been the last sentence of Ninoy's arrival statement. It sums up and predicted the non-violent formula of our victory.

"I return from exile, and to an uncertain future, with only determination and faith to offer – faith in our people and faith in God"

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 41st Session of the United Nations General Assembly

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 41st Session of the United Nations General Assembly

[Delivered in New York City, September 22, 1986]

A MESSAGE TO THE UN

There are many ways to run a country: but there is only one way to treat people – with decency and respect for their uniqueness as individuals. Only if those who have the responsibility of leadership respect their fellows and the essential right to find fulfillment in their lives can they hold their head high at the UN.

It is the irony of the United Nations that so many new leaders have stepped to this podium, as I have today, with mixed feelings. Yes, we took power to implement so many of the ideals that the UN stands for. We have restored human rights; and liberated our people from the oppression and corruption of a government that had long since lost their support.

Yet, like so many other leaders before me, I am obliged to say that we did this by ourselves. It was the Filipino people alone who braved intimidation and cheating at the polls; and when their victory was stolen from them, turned out in the streets by the millions to reclaim and secure it.

Indeed, as our country bled at the hands of a government that had lost all respect for the rights of our people, its leader's wife came to this podium piously to call for a new human order. This, when thousands of Filipinos were political prisoners. And, in the final months of the dictatorship, international solidarity was expressed by ordinary people everywhere who sat in front of their television sets and watched and cheered our revolution.

In this year of all years, when in so many parts of the world we see people struggling to establish their human rights, I believe one must be frank to be relevant.

I mean to use this occasion to share with oppressed people everywhere my own experience of how change is brought about.

My basic conclusion can be stated very simply: to be free, you can, as a people, appeal effectively to international standards of human rights set by others such as the United Nations. Yet, in the end to vindicate those rights, to achieve freedom, you are on your own.

The UN has stayed out of the internal affairs of nations. Its charter orders that that should be so. Obviously, this is wise insofar as it prevents abuse of the sovereign independence of nations. Yet, it has also been an invitation to hypocrisy. The value of this chamber should rest on us, its members, doing what we preach.

To my mind, that requires both realism and concern when we address the affairs of others: realism in that we should not promise more than we can deliver. We should acknowledge what the Filipino people have learned: there is no substitute for action by an oppressed people themselves. But there should be concern about allowing this chamber to be abused by those who claim one standard of behavior and behave according to another back home. Don't misunderstand me – the UN should never be an exclusive club for one ideological model. For that would defeat its primary purpose, to keep peace in an imperfect world.

There are many ways to run a country, but there is only one way to treat people – with decency and respect for their uniqueness as individuals. Only if those of us who have the responsibility of leadership respect our fellows and their essential right to find fulfillment in their lives can we hold our heads high here at the UN.

The UN would lose all purpose if it were to set about judging one political system against another. Yet, equally, if the UN does not notice how governments treat people, it is nothing. I need only go back to the rousing words of the UN charter. The UN is about people. If it fails them, can it be any better than its most corrupt and oppressive member state? Even diplomacy, which is preeminently about states, cannot ignore, without peril or embarrassment, how states treat their people.

And so, as the leader of a country which has this year enjoyed the sweet taste of freedom, again let me reconfirm our support both for what the UN at its best stands for: the peace, freedom, dignity and partnership of mankind. But let me also serve warning to those denied freedom and dignity: don't look beyond yourselves to find them.

We in the Philippines were strengthened in our resolve by knowing that people around the world shared our struggle. On their televisions and in their newspapers, they followed our drama. Further, we know that the rights we fought for are universally sought after; they are enshrined – not entombed, mind you – in the UN conventions. The importance of such international support should never be dismissed. It helped us knowing we were not alone.

But even when the authors of the UN Charter stopped short of endorsing any right of interference in any nation's internal affairs, they were responding to more than the jealous realities of inter-governmental relations. Rather, they were reflecting a more lasting truth about how man prefers to order his life on this planet.

People must be masters of their own fate. The Filipino people have known and been grateful for liberation at the hands of others: in 1898, a liberation that was swiftly betrayed, and in 1946, one which we promptly wasted. Yet now, having known the exhilaration of throwing off our bonds ourselves, I think every Filipino would agree there is only one real liberation.

Only a people, already sovereign in their hearts and deeds, can win and keep their independence and freedom: this is not a pessimistic conclusion because, additionally, I believe that no government can indefinitely resist a people united against it. It may have the guns, the goons and the gold. Yet, as we found in the Philippines, there is no government that can indefinitely resist a people determined to be free.

And so, while the UN may not intervene to bring the sovereignty and freedom enjoyed by nations to the peoples who are denied them, it should carefully avoid becoming an unwitting partner of their oppressors.

I turn now specifically to the great moral issue that confronts this General Assembly: the situation in South Africa. To Nelson Mandela and his wife, Winnie, and all South Africans, my prayers are with you. Mr. Mandela's long incarceration in prison, separated from his wife and family, inevitably reminds me of the imprisonment of my own husband, Ninoy.

The lesson in my country and so many other places such as Argentina, whose President Alfonsín recently visited Manila, is that every act of repression reaps its final return. In the end, human values cannot be held down. They couldn't be in Argentina; they couldn't be in the Philippines. They won't be in South Africa.

It is right that we all play our part in creating the environment for change in South Africa. The Philippines will support any action the international community takes to hasten the advent of peace and freedom in South Africa and to show solidarity with its people. But it would help the case a great deal if this forum were to make equal note and action against oppression wherever it occurs, wherever people are abused and degraded, be it blatantly or in their name. I do not believe that the force of moral action is diminished by being spread wherever it is needed. It is strengthened by exercise and weakened by neglect.

Let me say directly to the millions of victims of apartheid in South Africa, to the families of those who have given their lives. Don't waiver in your unity. Look only to your own strength and determination.

If there is one tactic that served us above all others in our movement for freedom, it was espousing a program of action that kept us united. In our case this meant the use of non-violence and constant vigilance against the provocation of the authorities. Often, I was urged to go further: to call for a more confrontational line. But my constant concern was to keep the wide coalition of forces that backed our campaign together. Often, I disappointed some of my supporters by approving only limited actions against the government. Yet, it was the rock-like unity of the opposition and the enormous support it enjoyed that overwhelmed the government. That meant not going faster than any of our supporters were prepared to go. This allowed us to overcome where more narrow-based opposition challenges had failed to dislodge the dictatorship.

Perhaps, the UN cannot go faster than its most reluctant member towards its stated goals of peace, freedom and dignity for the peoples of all nations. And perhaps, for its more significant achievement, we should look rather to the peace it has helped preserve, and the cooperation it has fostered, between nations already friends, than to the peace it has failed to keep between nations bent on war. In the same light should we regard the salutary influence of its freedom-practicing members in the counsels of the world. Even so have I come to appreciate the achievement of our own regional organization, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. Asean's faltering steps towards economic cooperation and complementation, in the name of peace and stability in the region, are meant to serve and express the abiding peace and amity among its members that were there from the start.

To nurture a vigorous peace wherever it abides and strengthen long-standing friendships: perhaps, this is all that lies in the power of international organizations to do.

I have always been a firm advocate of peace. Perhaps it is only the tragedy of conflict that teaches us the true value of peace. Let us, who are the loyal friends of peace, continue to resist the temptation to exploit the conflicts of our neighbors. Those of us in Asean understand the crucial importance of these goals. Each of our countries has passed through periods of crisis when great rifts of weakness appeared, yet none of the others, for all our differences in political systems and beliefs, exploited the occasion. On the contrary, they rose to it with encouraging expressions of sympathy and offers of help and mediation, ever respectful of the integrity of their tragic neighbors.

And so my message today is an effort to bring this mission of the UN into sharper focus to the end that there shall be no more disappointments over unwarranted expectations. There will be no more wasted hopes on the part of those who must save their strength for the long and difficult struggle for peace and freedom. There will be, on the other hand, a clearer recognition by the UN of its irreducible commitments and values, a more jealous regard for their integrity, and, for that reason, perhaps, a surer prospect of realizing the UN's goals of peace, freedom, dignity, and the partnership of mankind.

A NEW FRONTIER FOR FILIPINO AND AMERICAN BUSINESS

The Aquino administration will refrain from going into business where private initiative will be adequate. It has done two things to create long-lasting and attractive conditions for investment. The first is the liberalization of laws to make them conform with the free climate of the new Philippines. The second is the preparation for the disposal of the large number of enterprises, about 250, that the government inherited from the previous regime and its cronies. There is a lot in store for those wishing to help develop the new frontier that Filipino courage opened up when it restored the freedom where free enterprise and initiative can flourish.

I am about to conclude a brief visit to your country, which I hope will strengthen the bonds of friendship between our two nations.

I believed that it would be fruitful if, before returning home tomorrow, I meet with a group of businessmen operating in the West Coast of the United States, who recognize the vast potentials of the Pacific. I thank the Stanford Research Institute and the Pacific Basin Economic Council for arranging this meeting.

I don't have to sell the potential of the Eastern Pacific region to you, the members and friends of the Council. Instead, I am going to make a pitch for a specific place where you should invest: my country.

The Philippines now has a government that sees private enterprise as the engine of the economy. Private initiative helped to effect the country's immediate recovery from the Second World War and placed it second to Japan in economic growth. Under the last administration, it experienced a local variant of state capitalism, called crony capitalism. It was 90 percent theft and 10 percent ineptitude. We were left with a $26 billion dollar debt, only a small portion of which went into productive investment while most of it can be seen gracing the New York skyline. So I can say with confidence that we pretty much disagree with the notion that the state has any business being in business in the Philippines. The Filipinos, and the government they have set up, believe that the greatest latitude given to business offers the best prospects of growth for everyone, capital as well as labor.

We have essentially done two things to create long-lasting and attractive conditions for investment. The first is the liberalization of labor laws to make them conform with the free climate of the new Philippines. Right after we assumed power, labor activities increased. We expectedly had more strikes in the past six months than the country had during the same period a year ago. The strikes however were resolved more quickly, with less man-hours and efforts wasted, and in a more lasting fashion. This was labor stretching its limbs after being confined in the vise of Martial Law for 14 years. You may think that a vise is the best place to keep labor in. I hope you don't belong to that breed of businessmen, because the AFL-CIO will have something to say about that to you. While the restraint of labor by state terrorism did induce a surface calm, it nevertheless intensified and encouraged the radicalization of the labor movement. If the law could not protect the basic rights of labor, it would rely on a revolution to vindicate them. That was the logic of the Philippine labor movement under Marcos. The return of democracy brought things back to proper focus. Hence, the increased agitation but also the wide consensus of labor that law and due process must again be depended upon to protect their rights. I might point out one statistic. Labor unrest barely touched multinational businesses, which generally paid their laborers a little better than their less privileged local counterparts. The hardest, most frequently hit were the sweatshops. But even in that area, I have taken measures to reconcile the rights of labor with the constraints under which a capital-starved local business community operate.

The second thing we have done is prepare for the disposal of the large number of enterprises, about 250, that my government inherited from the previous regime and its cronies. I invite you to study these enterprises with a view to buying and operating them jointly with local investors. My government will refrain from going into business where private initiative will be adequate, because I so pledged during my campaign. But more importantly, because my people want it run no other way. I won't say more to encourage you to invest. Study our offers as hardnosed and sensible businessmen because that is the type we want to join us in rebuilding our country and setting it on the road to progress. We want pioneer stock; brave, smart, and enterprising, for the Philippines can be a new frontier for Filipino and American business.

I will add the assurance, however, that you will be operating under a lean and strong government, rather than under one that will lean on you with all the weight of bloated operations. We have cut state expenditure to the bone. We have reduced the budgetary deficit in the second quarter to one billion pesos. Compare that with the budgetary deficit of 10 billion in just the first quarter of this year, the last quarter of the Marcos regime.

We have also reduced inflation from 50 percent to near zero. Interest rates have fallen from a peak of 50 percent to the present level of 14 to 15 percent. The exchange rate has stabilized. The black market for foreign currency has virtually vanished. For two consecutive years under Mr. Marcos, our economy posted negative growth. Now the IMF expects "a substantial recovery of six to seven percent" next year.

While Philippine labor duly regards its rights and dignity as priceless, it maintains its cost comparatively well, one-fifth the levels prevailing in Taiwan, South Korea and Singapore. Add to that the benefits of its English-language proficiency and high level of skills.

With all these advantages, we stand on the doorstep of China and its vast markets. We are the gateway to Southeast Asia and the lynchpin of stability and security in the region. The Philippine economy will recover because Filipinos believe in themselves and in their country again. I invite you to join us in developing the new frontier that Filipino courage opened up when it deposed the dictatorship and restored the freedom where enterprise and initiative can flourish.

Let me tell you this, in closing. People will continue to speculate about the short term future of the Philippines. We were sold short for the past 14 years. Old habits die hard. Well, it won't happen. The Philippines has a long and bright future ahead of it. The Filipino people will overcome! They have the skill, the resources, and, more importantly, faith in their strength and confidence in their country. We will recover from the economic disaster that is our legacy from the late dictatorship – we will recover and prosper. And in that prosperity we invite you to join us.

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On her official visit to the United States

THE TIME FOR ACTION IS NOW

President Aquino reports on her official visit to the United States. “Our friends understand and sympathize,” she says, “but let us not hold our breaths for total answers coming from anywhere but our own efforts.”

I am so happy to be home again. It was a long and exhausting trip but also and always exhilarating. We were met everywhere with great warmth and much respect for what we Filipinos have accomplished. This respect and admiration are the reward of our heroic struggle. Poor as we are, we already have that for which great nations bend their greatest efforts: the admiration of the world.

I met with President Reagan and I believe I have established a personal rapport and sympathetic understanding for what we are trying to do.

I addressed the Congress of the United States and laid before them the painful sacrifices of our struggle, the glorious moment of our victory, the enormous problems we have so unfairly inherited, and the great promise that our new democracy represents not only for us Filipinos but for the free world as well. But over and above that I tried to convey the great pride of the new Filipino and the only basis of Filipino-American partnership: the mutual respect of those who, though not equal in progress, are certainly so in pride and in the sacrifices they have made for democracy.

I met with our creditor banks and got them to understand the imperatives of Philippine growth, which will be as much to their advantage as to ours.

I laid bare our plight and I did so, I believe, with some effect. Our friends understand and sympathize. We have done our part. I have worked with all my might, prayed with all my heart and the rest I leave to God and to you, my people. Let us not hold our breaths for total answers coming from anywhere but our own efforts – by which we won our freedom. The main effort is ours to do, so that the greater honor will be ours again. Let us get on with it then. What else is there to wait for? The time for talk and hesitation and criticism is over. The time for action is now.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Berkeley University

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the Berkeley University [Delivered at Berkeley University, California, September 25, 1986]

SALUTE TO BERKELEY

The Philippines and Berkeley have much in common. Berkeley has provided a “model,” if a controversial one, for protest action. It was protest action of a peaceful kind that drove the dictator out of power in the Philippines. Berkeley can look at the Philippines’ problems today and be reminded of its beginnings as an institution. But it can also look at some of the Philippines’ solutions. Like the University, the Philippines will keep asking, seeking, inquiring in search of answers to some of the seemingly “permanent problems” of the human race.

As some officials in this university know, one of the very first invitations I decided to accept was from this distinguished institution. It is hard to say no to Berkeley.

First, let me salute you for your long commitment to human rights and to action in support of what you believe in. This university has never been a laggard in the area of human rights, or for that matter, in other fields.

President Kennedy said in his inaugural address, “Americans are unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed. . .” For some time, we wondered whether the word “always” had lost its meaning. We are glad that in the end, America’s political leadership decided, as Jesse Jackson puts it, to be on the right side of history. As Senator Ted Kennedy said the other night in New York, human rights violators have reason to fear visits by human rights groups – or by Senator Paul Laxalt.

We realize how Berkeley has provided a “model,” if a controversial one, for protest action. But a university must not shy away from controversy. And it was protest action of a peaceful kind that drove the dictator out of the power last February in our country. To the students of Berkeley, our people power revolution must have recalled some of the glorious excesses of your university’s famous “radical” politics. Yet without wanting to sound competitive, I must say that student power is only a shadow of people power. What makes our people power is that it is everybody: young, old, rich, poor, nun, soldier and student. All came together to turn out a dictator. And they were welcome. Ours was a broad coalition. Yet one selfless devotion to a higher goal, one spirit restless for freedom. These kinds of ideals that drove our revolution are the ones you share.

There is some irony in the fact that someone whom my predecessor derisively referred to as “Cory who?” a year ago, is now known to many Americans. But I am not alone. Another of your great Presidents, Abraham Lincoln, knew the feeling and was candid enough to admit: “Nobody has ever expected me to be president.”

So it is that we see mysteries in the political life of a nation.

This has been a long trip, but a refreshing one.

I do not wish to add much more to what I have been saying all these days.

After all, as we have been reminded, President William Henry Harrison spoke at his inauguration for nearly two hours, caught pneumonia and passed away within a month.

On the other hand, the first President of your country delivered an inaugural address of just 135 words and is now remembered as a great president.

Let me just give you a capsule version of the changes that can now be seen in our country. For perspective, kindly note that we have been in power barely 200 days, not enough time to rebuild what was hardly a Rome to start with, and that was systematically ruined and looted for twenty years. Allow me to examine parallelisms between the beginnings of this university and the country seeking to rebuild from the ruins left by my predecessor.

I understand that it was the Rev. Dr. H. W. Bellows, a noted Minister from the east who exhorted, “mind before mines,” as soon as he had surveyed the dismal prospect in these parts more than a century ago. He then wrote back to Yale and Harvard for suggestions.

I have also been informed that the original plan of this university to admit “men only” was changed by the regents in 1870, and eight women registered that fall. Four years later, President Daniel Coit Gilman was to remark that the proportion of women who ranked high in scholarship was greater than that of men.

So what else is new? There are other parallelisms.

It was never easy going; “The university’s financial problems seemed endless for a long time,” so wrote the university historians. So might one write of my country’s problems today. The problems seem endless, the going won’t be easy. However, Berkely, whatever its financial headaches, was spared from a $26 billion debt. That is a special burden of our nationhood, a legacy of our recent sorry past.

You can look at our problems today and be reminded of your beginnings as an institution. But you can also look at some of our solutions: you can, for instance, look at our attempts to restore faith in the administration of justice by naming good judges. We are cleaning up the electoral process, the perversion of which led to widespread disenchantment. We are setting a very high moral tone in government beginning with the presidency. Compare this with the massive corruption of the past. Many exceptional men and women are serving the country for nothing or a fraction of what they could get in private life. We are professionalizing the military, we are reaching out to the rebels and the disenchanted. We expect to have a new constitution soon. We shall have elections early next year at the national and local levels. We are rebuilding our economy. We have dismantled the monopolies. We have a free press. We have regained our respected standing in the community of nations. We can look anyone in the eye and say we are Filipinos.

Yes, we too will be a success story by virtue of hard work and the help of our friends.

We are never too proud to look to others for models, inspiration and guidance. However, where there is a home-grown solution that fits the culture, we will do it our way, in the same manner that we did it our way last February. For like this university, we will keep asking, seeking, inquiring in search of answers to some of the seemingly “permanent problems” of the human race. For as long as the human spirit can soar, nothing is impossible. In this, your institution and our country can share the same vision validated by experience.

In this spirit, I humbly accept with deep appreciation the highly coveted Berkeley medal.

Tonight, we head for home, physically exhausted but emotionally exhilarated.

Summing up, I feel I have achieved what I have set out to do on this trip. I have met the top political leadership in this country. I have met people from all walks of life, in the private sector. I know I won’t be spoiled by the outpouring of warmth, kindness and affection shown me at every stop of my working visit. But have no fear that my feet are now, firmly planted – in mid-air.

We go home confident that we have the best wishes – of the American people. To them I say thank you.

I could only wish that for their part, my own beloved countrymen in this country would rise above party and faction. I intend to be President of all Filipinos, and hear out everyone, if only for the sake of those who will come after us. Our country needs the help of everyone who continues to care for it and our people. We cannot afford division, for even in unity, candor requires that we admit the road ahead is a rough one. But I am not new to crises and challenges.

May I conclude by recalling the words of a law school dean amidst the student crisis of the Sixties: "Like a family, we must survive our crises, mend the ruptures of our discord, and continue to live and function as a unit."

For my part, I will, more than ever, pray with all my heart, work with all my might, and the rest, I leave to God.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the FINEX Dinner

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the FINEX Dinner

OVERCOMING THE ECONOMIC CRISIS

Fresh from several state visits, the President outlines the many tasks before her and the Filipino people: We have to restructure our $26 billion debt under easier terms and conditions, generate jobs, improve the material welfare of the people, “pump-prime” the economy, win markets for our exports products, and strive for greater self-reliance on options other than more debt.

Here I am, just recovered from a long journey, and now having to plan for my next official visit. Were I a member of a frequent traveler program, I would have amassed by now enough mileage points to take me on a vacation in some islands, but I assure you, not Hawaii.

Many of you have counted the dozens of thousands of kilometers that I have logged these past six weeks. Many of you have commented that my first six months in office were a period of confinement to get our initial homework done. But the past six weeks have been a period of wide travels: First, for a call on our close neighbors within ASEAN; then, for a pilgrimage of peace to our very own estranged brothers and sisters in Jolo and in the Cordilleras; and lately, for a working, grueling, but also exhilarating visit to America.

I hope more than a few of you will agree that I cannot solve the problems that face our nation and discharge my duties as President by merely sitting in my office or presiding over Cabinet meetings in Malacañang. Now that we have laid the basis for a new Constitution, for a new economy, and for a new full-term Administration, I have to go out and bring to bear the full weight of the Presidency on the problems wherever they are, and behind prospects where they may arise. Next week I shall be going to Negros and Iloilo to continue the nationwide consultations I pledged to carry out, and which I started on in Region XI and then in Region X. Confinement to one's desk can narrow one's vision and deepen the disquiet one gets from the press of problems that come pouring in. You and I know how important it is to look real people in the eye and talk with them in person.

I have been given a tonic by President Suharto and Prime Minister Lee who freely shared their experiences with me. For as long as we have our priorities clear and our focus trained, we should not worry if in six months we have not been able to solve all the problems bequeathed by more than 20 years of official theft and incompetence. Nur Misuari and Conrado Balweg also gave me more hope for peace and for the non-violent approach to settlement of differences than the briefing papers and official documents had allowed me to entertain. I shall seek out meetings with other leaders out in the regions to explore with them paths to the peace and development we all desire.

President Reagan, the Congress of the United States, American business and financial institutions, and the American public at large were receptive and mostly sympathetic to our cause. After all, we Filipinos reflected in the Campaign, Election and Revolution the ideals that are their meaning and purpose. Poor as we are, we gave them the inestimable gift, as they told me, of seeing again the living reality of democratic commitment, thereby strengthening their own. They grasped our message: Yes, we are heirs to a mountain of debts and an earful of problems that can fill the pages of all our 26 newspapers and magazines that, to put it mildly, add flair and color to them every single day; but we are biting the bullet and have been doing our homework.

That homework has been detailed and specific. We have gone way past general policy pronouncements and broad statements about programs. International reserve targets are clear and time-bound. Commitments to reduce our budget deficits are firm. Our fiscal program is in place. All outstanding issues concerning the rehabilitation of the DBP and PNB have been cleared. Policy statements for the strengthening of our weakened financial system have been drafted and agreed upon. The program for public sector investment spending and for export promotion by industry have been finalized. We have covered the whole breadth and width of the agenda for economic reform. We have not been shy nor slow about doing what must be done. It is no surprise therefore that both President Conable of the World Bank and Managing Director De Larosiere of the IMF agreed with me that the green light could be flashed for the 508 million dollar stand-by loan from the IMF and the 300 million dollar economic recovery loan from the World Bank.

You already know that these are only the first steps. They can now be followed up by steps that will set the stage for our recovery. We now are in a position to formally negotiate with the consortium of our creditor banks. We have to restructure our 26 billion dollar debt under easier terms and conditions that will permit our economy to grow, jobs to multiply, and the material welfare of our people to improve. We have to reopen the channels of normal financial relationships between our economy and the economies of our trading partners. I have talked with the members of the Advisory Committee of our creditor banks: they gave me more than applause; they also assured me of their understanding and support.

Within this more favorable environment of trust and confidence in the new Philippine government, we are seeking to defer 3.25 billion dollars of principal payment for the next 5-6 years. Since interest rates have gone down, we are also consolidating the 1984-1986 rescheduling into the 1987-1991 rescheduling. In this way, our overall interest burden on some 3.25 billion dollars should be lightened. Another three billion dollars should be affected by rescheduling a portion of our trade facility and by extension of the trade facility beyond December 1986. The bottomline result we seek is the reduction of our annual debt-service payments to a level that will allow our economy to grow and enable us, among other priorities, to pay our debt. We will achieve this not by fiery rhetoric about unilateral interest caps, although the injustice of our debt legacy should entitle us to indulge it, nor by running away from the responsibilities of a sovereign government whose animating spirit is honor. Rather, we intend to get to this result by quietly doing our sums, patiently but firmly presenting our positions, and above all, by working effectively to make our economy grow out of our debt.

Our economic strategy however calls for much greater reliance on options other than more debt. While it is essential for us to normalize our relationship with international financial institutions, it is even more imperative that we work in other fronts.

We have to win markets for our export products. The prospect is good that our sugar quota in the U.S. market will be increased by about 30%. A whole range of trade questions with the United States is to be examined. GSP items are up for review. The United States has made a commitment to a "Buy Filipino Policy" for U.S. defense facilities in the Philippines and elsewhere in Asia. We are also setting up a business promotion council to continue to explore and exploit more opportunities for Philippine exports to the United States. Let me make this clear: We cannot achieve a real economic growth of 6 to 7% per year, unless we succeed in our export drive. We must be ready to do everything possible so we can effectively compete in many more markets to which we must gain access.

In the meanwhile, as we begin to get out of the depth of our economic crisis, we count as a welcome bonus any help we get from friends. We have to prime our economic pump. We have to spend on programs that create jobs and help us win peace. We have to get on with the task of industrial rehabilitation and especially of rapid agricultural development. All these require financing, and we have been very short of resources. The 100 million dollar Economic Support Fund signed by Secretary Baker and Minister Ongpin; the 50 million dollar military assistance grant; and the 20 million dollar donation of medicine to our military and civilian sectors; and the 200 million supplemental aid package, favorably voted by both houses of the U.S. Congress: all these are helpful, not because of the sums involved, but because of the goodwill and broad support they express. No proud and sovereign people, however great their need, would measure friendship and understanding by dollars and cents exchanged and given. Rather, it has to be in the warmth of their mutual respect and in the substance of their mutual dealings in matters of business and government where the true measure can be taken.

As Senator Lugar told me after the Senate vote on the aid package: “This is convincing testimony to the extraordinary success of your visit to the United States. Even more importantly, the vote is proof of the strong underlying faith Americans have in the endurance and resolve of Philippine democracy.”

Having said all this, must I depend on the words of a foreign friend to say: “And who says we haven’t done anything?”

But more remains to be done. And by you. We are building a new economy – one where the government provides the framework for growth but where the private sector must flesh out the full potential of this great country of ours. I stand here hoping that I do not end up merely telling you what transpired during my trips abroad but getting you to answer the call to take up your part in our thrust towards economic recovery. I said it when I arrived: Doleouts won’t bail out our economy; our own efforts alone will do that. And that is how it should be so that the credit and honor, and the major profit, of our recovery shall be singularly ours. My government can do only so much in loading up the bases. In the private enterprise economy that you demanded and fought for and won, it is you, private business, that must hit the homeruns and pile up the scores. It is now your turn at the bat.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the members of the Manila Overseas Press Club

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the Members of the Manila Overseas Press Club

ISSUES BEFORE THE PRESIDENCY

In brief but wide-ranging remarks before the members of the Manila Overseas Press Club, President Aquino comments on the draft Constitution which she describes as merely the stage for the real effort that must be made to transform our country; the “economic miracles” of South Korea, Japan, and West Germany; the PCGG; and, finally, her own term as President.

The draft constitution I received this afternoon is an experiment, as all life is an experiment. In this particular case, it is an experiment in liberty, progress and justice; whether we can arrive at and work together towards common goals, solving our many problems along the way, within a democratic context. I barely had time to go over the text but I am satisfied that we have here the essentials of a democracy: the institutions that give voice and effect to the popular will and the guarantees that protect our inalienable rights. It sets forth also some of the deepest concerns of the forces that propelled us to freedom, the fears that continue to haunt us about the perishability of freedom, and the ideals that fired our revolution.

I am told it is not an elegant document. But democracy is not an elegant affair, it is just the best thing yet devised by men for the arrangement of their affairs consistent with their dignity. It does not try to cut through differences or hammer them by oppression into conformity. Instead it provides the mechanisms by which these differences and the energies that uphold them can be drawn together in compatible goals that can be achieved by collective effort. It is not the answer to our many problems, but it is the indispensable instrument for meeting what we would prefer to call the challenges that confront us: the challenges of peace, justice, and progress for all our people. As I said this afternoon, democracy is safe with this Constitution. Safe in regard to its necessary institutions and in regard to the inalienable rights of our people. The powers of government are wisely divided in the time-honored fashion of enduring democracies, where the energy of the single hand, as one would refer to the executive, finds its counterpoise and guidance in the collective wisdom of an elected Congress and in the strict accountability of all elected officials. More than safety, democracy finds in this Constitution the firm ground from which to step upwards to the other goals of our nation: its material progress and the well-being of our people.

There is nothing in this Constitution that gives reason for fundamental differences among reasonable men, differences that would argue strongly against its ratification. I see nothing here that endangers the deeply held values for which our people struggled with such distinction, but on the contrary much that protects those values. Yet, I am sure that in the ratification campaign there will be attempts to becloud and distort the issues. But the essential rightness of this document will come through to the people in whom I have always reposed my final confidence.

Even as I am confident that the people will receive this attempt to give enduring form to their values and effective expression to their aspirations with gladness and approbation, in the spirit of candor that has marked my administration, I must say that it is merely the stage for the real effort that must be made to transform our country.

Yesterday, Vice President Laurel reported to the Cabinet on his recent trip. One of his salient points was that the No. 1 factor behind the phenomenal success of South Korea is HARD WORK. This country must support a huge military effort to answer a perceived threat to its integrity, and yet has risen from the depths of war ruin, underdevelopment and poverty to challenge the modern economies of the world. Today, Japan, another Asian miracle, still has the so-called MacArthur Draft as its constitution. Its foreign provenance did not dampen the efforts of this extremely proud race to outdo any country on any terms. The West German Constitution was adopted when the Allied powers held sway over it. The Japanese and the West Germans never used history as an excuse for failure, for not giving their all to the reconstruction and progress of their countries. Little politics and much hard work would explain the fantastic success of these countries I have mentioned.

There have been suggestions that I lift the ban against the members of the Constitutional Commission running in the coming elections. I am strongly inclined against it. And I reject any insinuation, made without the least effort to investigate, that I struck a deal with the honorable men and women of the Commission to lift the ban. Contrary to what some critics believe, there are honorable Filipinos. And they are legion. I would have thought that the Philippine Revolution of 1986 proved this beyond all doubt.

But yes, there was a deal struck between myself and the Commissioners which was that the integrity of this document, as attested by the self-sacrifice of its drafters, would never be put in question by suspicions of selfish motives. They took the commission to draft this constitution together with the prohibition to appointment or election to public office. I stand by that deal and reject any suggestion to remove the ban.

What will I do should the people vote down the draft? Frankly, I am persuaded that the vast majority of our people are sensible citizens, who will go beyond the narrow, partisan, personal, and parochial points of view of a few, and will examine the great question on the basis of what is good for the country, now and in the future.

There is concern about the PCGG. The country must make up its mind whether we should continue to go after those who stole the country's wealth, who emptied our future, who condemned us to working hard for many years to come only to pay off what they looted. Today, in other parts of the world, they are still looking for war criminals. I believe that our people will support the continuing effort to go after those who plundered our nation's wealth. This is not vendetta but plain and simple justice. Yet, at the same time, this reaffirmation on my part to continue the quest for justice in this area should not be construed as a license to disregard the basic values for which we fought, of which due process is eminently one.

Finally, what about my term? You will recall that the Batas Pambansa Blg. 883 under which Doy Laurel and I ran had been condemned as unconstitutional because there was no vacancy. But the Supreme Court said in effect: let the people decide. And so they did. That law gave them the opening to freedom and the government of their choice, the government of Cory Aquino. The event that established my claim to the Presidency, and Doy's to the Vice-Presidency, was our election by the people. The act that put the reins of power in my hand was the rising of a people to defeat the attempt of my predecessor and his unlamented Batasan to frustrate their will.

A new Constitution does not negate everything that preceded it, when that Constitution builds upon the cornerstone of the people's victory in my election to the Presidency. This constitution will not close the book on one phase of our history and start another, but will rather establish for posterity the link between that glorious moment when the people took the fate of the nation into their hands and this when you and I, the government and the people, must build upon what they accomplished. My election by the people is the one certain landmark we have as we move towards the future. The people spoke so clearly, the whole world heard them. But I am not surprised that some people in this country could not hear them as the walls of tyranny they had helped to build crashed around their ears. That is their problem. As the Chinese saying goes: Despite the barking of the dogs in the night, the caravan moves on.

And so we shall. From the ratification of this constitution to the election of Congress until all the familiar landmarks of a democratic country are in place to guide us on our way to the future we have dreamed of.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Constitutional Commission

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the Constitutional Commission

AT LAST, A NEW CONSTITUTION

Presented with the draft of the new Constitution, the President declares that democracy is safe with this document. It is a Constitution which distributes wisely the powers of government; it is the framework for the house of democracy that we hope to build.

The last time I stood before you was on your invitation to witness the opening session of your Commission to draft a new constitution for our people. I stood there and declared the absolute independence of a body I had appointed, an independence I would respect but for two pieces of advice I offered for the Commission to take or leave as it chose. First I said, be quick. For the people are impatient to have a full-blown democratic republic, with all its necessary institutions and safeguards in place, in the shortest time possible. I reiterated my promise when the Freedom Constitution was promulgated that the draft would be ready within three months. My promise was, of course, in no way binding on you, and that is obviously how you took it. But I have heard of the great investment of time and energy that you made to come out with the draft by today. I had received appeals from Commission members to intercede for lenity with Cecilia Muñoz Palma, who was not among those who dropped like flies, to use the words I heard, from the exertions she demanded. Well, she's a woman. So what else is new? I, of course, refused all appeals. Fortunately for the Commission she relented. And so now we have a document after four and a half months of effort whose worth the people will soon judge. And among the standards they will apply, and this was the second advice I gave, is whether the document fits the general conception of a constitution that is broad enough to meet every exigency that arises and yet is specific enough to protect the essentials of a true democracy.

We have here a Constitution that meets these needs. Democracy is safe with this Constitution, safe in regard to its necessary institutions and in regard to the inalienable rights of our people. The powers of government are wisely divided in the time-honored fashion of enduring democracies, where the energy of the single hand, to use Jefferson's reference to the Executive, finds its counterpoise and guidance in the collective wisdom of a representative legislature and in the strict accountability of all elected officials. More than safety, democracy finds in this Constitution the firm ground from which to step upwards to the other goals of our nation: its material progress and the well-being of our people.

With this Constitution, we have the framework of the house of democracy that we hope to build, a house worthy of the great collective act that made it possible: the rising of the Filipino people to vindicate their voice, a rising that continues to be the wonder of the world.

To the Commission members the country expresses its thanks. I said when I called to the task that yours would be no easy task. Those words fail to convey the tremendous investment of time and energy, the sacrifice that went into the making and the timely completion of this draft. In the short span of time it took, you compressed the idealism, the dedication, the patriotic fervor that I said would be the necessary elements of any attempt to give enduring form to the victory of the Filipino struggle for freedom and to our aspirations of a better life for all our people. It was no easy task indeed, but, on the other hand, yours would be no small glory. You have truly deserved it.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on aid for Negros

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the aid for Negros

[Held at Paglaum Stadium, Bacalod City, October 16, 1986]

AID FOR NEGROS

The collapse of the sugar industry has hit the province of Negros hard. The government, however, is ready with various assistance packages to help the province get back on its feet.

I said when I returned from the United States that the time for talk is over, the time for action is now. I have come here to learn at first hand what your problems are and, equally important, to learn from you how you believe these problems should be addressed. But above all I have come to see the work that you have already began to get your great province back on its feet and on the road to progress and justice. The consultations with the various sectors of Negros society start this morning. But I have done my homework and can say already now some of the initiatives that your government will take.

I have instructed the Philippine National Bank to make sugar lands that were mortgaged to it available to displaced sugar workers. The PNB has told me that it is now prepared to implement my instruction. Some ten thousand hectares will be parcelled out soon and sold to the sugar workers. Some financing will be available, thanks largely to the initiative of your own governor, but the ultimate decision of ownership will depend on you, the sugar workers, on your industry, on your determination to prove that the Filipino farmer can hold his own.

I know that land reform isn't just parceling out land. It means just as importantly providing the means to make it productive. The Ministry of Agriculture and Food stands ready to extend technical expertise to the new land beneficiaries. And I am assured by your governor that the private sector stands equally ready to pitch in with its assistance. The PNB is studying the possibility of extending crop loans to new farmers under a special financing scheme for the crop year 1987-88.

Your government is ready to do more. We have programmed some P6.13 billion to finance the building of infrastructures such as roads, bridges, ports, and wells over the next six years. Not only will this program improve your productivity and access to markets, it will by itself generate the jobs that are so desperately needed in the countryside.

And we are striving to bring you peace, the peace in which to work without fear, the peace to enjoy the fruits of your labor, and build a future for your children. You know of our efforts to bring the insurgent leadership to the negotiating table, to call for a ceasefire so that the killing will stop and we can save our sons and daughters for the nobler task of rebuilding our country together. Nothing is lost by making the effort to find peace by the ways of peace. Instead we gain time and save lives. And contrary to what some critics say, there is evidence of some success in our efforts. There is peace in the Cordilleras and peace in the Muslim South. I continue to pray that we shall have peace throughout our beloved land. At any rate, we have made the first moves, we have signaled our sincere desire to stop fighting, and use the democracy we achieved to reach the goals we all desire: progress and justice.

Yesterday, I received the draft of the new constitution. The campaign for its ratification starts here in Negros. This new Constitution enshrines the ideals we sacrificed for in our Revolution. It gives us the form of our new democracy, the permanent framework of our freedoms, and the general direction we must take to achieve justice and progress for all our people. I urge you all to campaign for its ratification. It will be one giant step towards the stability we need to work single-mindedly for the reconstruction of our country.

Before I conclude, I want to express, out here before Negros, the gratitude of your government and of our country for the generous assistance extended to the people of Negros by foreign governments and institutions, and by private corporations and civic groups. As I said about the recovery of Filipino freedom: it happened by our own efforts, but the help and encouragement of friends of democracy abroad strengthened our determination to stay the course. It will be the same in the rehabilitation of Negros. You, the people of Negros, will bear the main burden, but the sympathy and understanding of friends are always welcome. My countrymen, we showed last February what courage, faith and perseverance can accomplish. The task here in Negros is daunting. But we shall make it. We shall succeed in this as in anything the Power of the People sets its mind to.

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To Governor Lacson at the testimonial dinner

[Delivered in Bacolod City, October 16, 1986]

REBUILDING NEGROS' ECONOMY

President Aquino calls on the middle forces to rally to the aid of Negros.

I think that Governor Lacson and I have a few things in common. When the situation all over the country, just as conditions in Negros, were reaching crisis proportions, we were both called upon to lead. And we both did not want the job.

In my case, a petition of a million signatures gave me no choice but to take on the dictator for the Presidency. In Bitay's case, I petitioned him for an hour at my Guesthouse office, after which he too was left with no choice. I can tell you it gave me great pleasure to do unto Bitay what Filipinos in the opposition had done to me.

Governor Lacson and I have now been some time in our respective government positions, and I suspect we continue to share similar experiences and perceptions. Our people desperately want change. And we, as their leaders, have the burden of affecting it. But we both know we cannot do it alone. There is a price that must be paid for change. And those with more resources and opportunities must shoulder the better part of it. To quote Governor Lacson: "What is freedom worth to us? What percent of what we have?" Whether that percentage be a percentage of our land, our time, our expertise, or our caring and concern.

In Negros, as in the rest of the country, the huge debt of past excesses and neglect, of a previous complacency, must be paid. The old pace of life is lost forever. If we move forward too slowly, we could be overwhelmed by developments whose trends are clear for all to see. If we move too fast, we leave behind a great part of the population still rooted in the habits of the past and unaccustomed to taking matters into their own hands.

For Negros, for the nation to survive, the middle forces must take the initiative: the private sector, the Church, the middle and upper classes, and outdistance the counterforces of anger and despair. I do not envy Bitay the enormous demands and perils of his job, as I am sure he does not envy mine. We are both racing against time and hoping the people are following behind us. I pray for the governor and his new wave of concerned and activist Negrenses – that they may forge ahead in their race against time.

I just received word from DBP Chairman Jess Estanislao that the Bank has allocated half a billion pesos to the province of Negros Occidental for short-gestation projects such as palay, pineapple, cassava, or ramie production, prawn culture, and broiler contract growing. The amount is available now.

The DBP is also putting together another half a billion pesos for Negros Occidental for long-gestation projects: black pepper, and coffee production, and agro-forestry.

I want to mention this as government's contribution to encourage the transformation of the Negros economy.

[Delivered at a Military Camp, Iloilo, October 17, 1986]

STAND TALL, MY SOLDIERS

The fight for democracy is not yet over. The Armed Forces should remain vigilant – particularly against those who seek to subvert and destroy our freedoms.

In the way of soldiers, I, your Commander-in-Chief, have one direct message for you. You are needed and you are appreciated. The new democracy that you helped establish, you are now called upon to defend. The enemies of our new democracy, the friends of the deposed dictator, have tried to demoralize you by saying that our peace initiatives derogate from the indispensable role and honored place of the soldier in our Republic. But I know your intelligence is proof against their lies. I am pursuing the path of negotiation with the insurgents because I want to spare our country further bloodshed and the loss of precious lives we need for the reconstruction of our country. Every Filipino life is inestimably valuable. This is not appreciated by those who oppressed and murdered many of their own countrymen in the satisfaction of their limitless greed. But you, whose daily life it is to protect the lives and liberties of your fellow countrymen know the worth of the Filipino. Your belief in that value is what justifies in your eyes the daily sacrifice you make. The path of negotiation that I am pursuing finds the best hope of its success in the continued vigilance of the Armed Forces, in its increasing capability to overcome the forces that seek to subvert and destroy our precious freedoms. The end of Communist Insurgency in our country, as I have said, again and again, lies in provision of hope to all our people by the development of our economy and in the insurance of a Reformed Armed Forces. And so I say to you, stand fast, my soldiers by the Flag and the Republic for which it stands, stand vigilantly for the safety of our people, stand tall with pride in your indispensable part in the rebirth of our nation.

A CHALLENGE TO ILONGGOS

The President calls on Ilonggos to forget the wounds of the past and move forward under the force of People Power. Iloilo has lands and natural resources that are the envy of the North, and the province holds the promise of prosperity.

I am here in Iloilo province for three reasons. First, I want to thank you for your support, your courage and your prayers. Second, I would like to witness for myself people's power, Ilonggo style. And third, I would like you to know that the revolution that began in Manila must continue in your province as it has throughout the country.

My challenge to all Ilonggos is to step forward and forget the hurts, the resentment and the hopelessness of the recent past. I know that even here, Marcos managed to cast his shadow. But today, thanks to the unity and determination we displayed last February, that shadow has receded. And we can no longer blame the dictatorship for what we are and what we cannot become. Freedom is indeed a bright and unsparing light. In its glow, we are now forced to see where the influence of the Marcos era ends, and where our basic shortcomings and strengths as a people begin. In the light of freedom also, we can better see the work that must yet be done. And the paths that must be cleared so that the forces of people's power can move forward.

I know that here, as in the province of Negros, reconciliation must yet take effect. I know that the memory of repression and exploitation continues to divide you. I know also that poverty and unemployment weaken your strength and resolve. But just by looking around me, I have hope for Iloilo. You have lands and natural resources here that are the envy of the North. And Ilonggos are people with a history of creativity, resilience, and good humor. I also know that Ilonggos look for their strength in the Lord.

More than in other parts of our country, your province and region hold the promise of prosperity. If the people of Iloilo can rebuild and recover, we will look to you as a model and hope.

Your government is here to help. But only the Ilonggo can see and understand what Iloilo needs. And in the final analysis, it is you who will take your province into your own hands and mold it into a better place for your children. I urge recovery effort. God will grant us our reward.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at a business luncheon

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At a business luncheon

[Held in Iloilo, October 17, 1986]

THE END OF SUGAR

The glory days of the sugar industry are over. President Aquino asks the Ilonggos to cut their dependence on sugar and go into new fields.

I bring to you essentially the same message I brought to Negros: You, the social and economic leaders of this island and I, the National Leadership, have essentially the same daunting task before us and that is to dismantle the heritage of the past and build essentially from scratch. As I have encountered opposition and recriminations in this task of national rebirth, so shall you. I have endeavored, and I believe with success, to take down the oppressive structures of the previous regime and abolish the privileges of its favorites in order to liberate the genius and enterprise of the Filipino.

Twenty years of spoon feeding Philippine business by the government ended up with the government feeding itself and its friends exclusively and at the expense of Philippine business. The revolution we fought was not to redirect that spoon back to the mouths of Philippine business but to put it down and let business grow up and mature.

This is the course I have embarked on out of deep conviction that our best bet in the recovery of Philippine economy and the achievement of progress and prosperity lies in the unfettered activity of private enterprise. It is also the course I have to embark on because frankly, twenty years of Marcos, has left nothing to feed Philippine business with. This is the program on which I campaigned, so what I am telling you is nothing new. I do not know if all of you agreed with it. I would not understand why not, since those who profited from the previous way of doing things are enjoying the fruits of their privilege at your expense. At any rate, it is on that program that the people first voted me to the presidency and, when the dictator tried to frustrate their will, offered their lives to vindicate their victory. This program of self-reliance carries the stamp of the people's will. I ask you, share my implicit and total faith in their wisdom.

And here in Region VI, it is not only a matter of accepting the popular will but facing the reality of your situation.

Sugar is finished, not only here but throughout the world. There are just too many substitutes or alternate sources of sugar for the markets of the world to absorb.

Our revolution won us many friends among the world's democracies and they are eager to help us. And yet when I brought up the plight of the sugar industry, I could feel them hold back. They would hesitate to extend any assistance to Philippine sugar that might delude the industry into taking it as a new lease on life. I felt, even among those most sincere about helping the lot of the people who depend on sugar, that they would rather the suffering continue if only to drive home the point that sugar is finished and the sooner we turn away from it the better for our long term good. I had to appeal to them to at least give the sugar industry and its workers the time to develop another kind of agriculture, the time to adjust to another mode of life after over three centuries of singular devotion to sugar, the means to survive, to eat, while all these things are taking place. Such support, therefore, as I received for this industry has been largely a gesture of support during my American visit.

The U.S. Senate approved in the last week of September, two bills that would effectively increase the Philippine share of U.S. sugar imports for 1987 from 13.5% to 34%. Both bills are still pending. But in the meanwhile, the Senate vote to override the veto of the South Africa sanctions bill effectively adds 23,000 tons for the Philippines. In addition, your Sugar Regulatory Administration is working to get the balance of the South Africa 1986 sugar quota for the Philippines.

Even as we pray, and our friends lobby, to get the Industry this much needed boost, let us begin the work of turning the economy of this region away from its fatal dependence on sugar and developing more productive uses for the richness of its soil and the potential of its labor.

Even as I have asked others to consider the distressing plight of the sugar people, your government will move in care in certain measures for the reform of our economy. While your government is determined to rationalize the Sugar Industry with dispatch, it is aware that even excess sugar mills play an essential role in the viability of the farms around them and in the livelihoods of those dependent on them. We shall consult widely before carrying out any foreclosure of sugar mills, but in the end, you may as well know it, we shall push it through. I know you support this move.

I should like to take this opportunity to reiterate my clarification of the PNB's financing policy. Starting crop year 1987-1988 the bank will extend loans to sugar planters based on their sugar quotas for 1986-1987. Penalty charges incurred during 1984-1985 will be waived and interest rates will be lowered to approximate the mere cost of handling money, somewhere around 21.23%.

Your government will continue to explore other ways by which, given its limited resources, the transformation of your economy can be made less onerous. But in the end we must all bite the bullet and carry through our reforms. It is always painful to cut ourselves off from our past, especially one as rich as the history of sugar. The glory days of sugar are over but remember that a greater future for your region is not foreclosed. The Ilonggos are surely greater than their traditional product. And the exhaustion of the potential of sugar cannot mean the exhaustion of the Ilonggo's potential for growth and greatness in other endeavors. Remember what they said about the Filipino before the election and revolution of 1986: The Philippines is finished, they said. In the confrontation between the armed might of tyranny and unarmed anger of the people the only result can be the self-inflicted destruction of that country and all hope of its recovery. We proved them wrong on the first count. And that was the harder part. We shall prove them wrong everywhere they have underestimated the Filipino.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at a Plenary Session

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At a Plenary Session

[Delivered in Iloilo, October 17, 1986]

NEW DIRECTIONS FOR ILOILO

Iloilo, like Negros, must turn away from sugar and cultivate other areas. The private sector will play a big role in transforming the economy of the region. Government will do its part. It will increase rural employment and income through the community economic development program, and will strengthen the community-based health program, among other concerns.

I have listened to the various concerns of the sectors represented here and share your sense of urgency regarding them. While the various consultations have brought up specific issues and problems, and have proposed solutions which require further study, I have isolated a few basic concerns that I want to address now.

The first is the island's worsening economic situation. To a great extent this has to do with the island's singular dependence on sugar, but the general neglect of this island by its local leaders is equally to blame. For even those areas where sugar is not the dominant crop, poverty, hunger and disease are widespread.

This noon I addressed the business community and read to them the handwriting on the wall; sugar is finished. I have bought us some time to turn this region away from its bondage to sugar. But the work of transforming the economy of this region must start now. I said the work of transformation will be largely the responsibility of the private sector, in whose initiative and industry lies our country's hope for recovery. But the government knows that the economy, especially here, needs a shot in the arm to get it moving. We are going to do our part. I need not tell you that we don't have all the resources we would like, but with what we have, we hope to address some of our most pressing problems, particularly here in this region.

The community economic development program is an example of this. The project aims to increase rural employment and income. A total of 1,461 projects amounting to P227.9 million have been lined up by the CEDP for the region. Another program is the special financing program that involves an initial P500 million to finance small and medium scale industries.

Our best hope of revitalizing the rural economy is through infrastructure projects. Some P6.13 billion has been programmed for 1987 to 1992 for Region VI for the construction of schoolhouses, roads, wells, and ports. With specific regard to power availability and cost, a major project of the National Power Corp. in Region VI is the on-going construction of submarine cables between Panay and Negros which will transmit power from the Palimpinon Geothermal Plant. This should lower the power rate in the region.

Your health problems are an offshoot of the state of your economy, the plight of your unemployed and underemployed. The emergency employment we hope to generate should address some of these problems. There is a community-based health program that we hope to strengthen. But a lot can be done right now by the communities themselves practicing basic hygiene and sanitation in their surroundings. Government will try to provide the basic services; sewage, potable water, garbage collection. But the people themselves must respect how much of the urban blight can be removed without complicated systems as expensive services, just by the members of the communities themselves.

The last concern I shall discuss here is the peace and order situation. I shall pursue the path of negotiation to the utmost. My chief concern is to stop the killing. With every death of a Filipino, our country dies a little. But while that is my chief concern it is not my only duty. My primary duty is to protect the integrity of the Republic and its democratic institutions, assure the safety of my people and guaranty their enjoyment of the precious rights and liberties for which they fought. Let me make this clear, I shall use any means necessary to the discharge of my primary duty to protect our democracy and keep it a nation under God. I want peace. I believe that in the hearts of all Filipinos there is an intense desire for peace, for the peace in which we can work with singular dedication to the speedy reconstruction of our country. On that hope I base my effort to negotiate a peace, but on the continuing reform of our Armed Forces lies our assurance that peace is not bought at the price of honor or slavery.

Before I conclude, let me add one specific thing I have discovered.

The insurgency is not the only, nor perhaps the basic cause of the peace and order problem in this island. A lot of it has to do with the continued presence of gangsters in the hire of the stalwarts of the old regime, with the criminality that has not been addressed although attention has been repeatedly called to it, with failure of local officers to live up to our expectations and of the people that brought us to power. I say to them now, shape up, before you are shipped out. This particular problem will get my special attention.

Let me conclude by wishing you the best. I have learned much from these consultations. So long as we continue to help each other, we shall attain our goals.

Tribute of President Corazon Aquino to the Mother Butler Mission Guilds

Tribute
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Mother Butler Mission Guilds

[Delivered in Santuario de San Antonio Parish Center, October 18, 1986]

PAYING TRIBUTE TO THE LITTLE PEOPLE

The Mother Butler Mission Guilds do their work quietly, attending to the little touches: sewing vestments, and providing altar fixtures for poor parishes. In a way, they are like the ordinary people who put food on our tables and clothes on our back. It is a style, the President says, that we must all adopt as we work to rebuild the country.

In government, I have found, it takes different types of people to handle a variety of tasks. There is a President to do presidential functions, there are Ministers to do the ministerial work of the Presidency, protocol officers to handle “protocolar” work, to use Minister Villafuerte’s descriptive word for that sort of thing. And then there are a few persons who iron out the wrinkles in all these things, including in the daily running of the Guesthouse itself; people who, without calling attention to themselves, take the initiative to smooth out the fold in the carpet, so to speak, so that in the sudden rush of a crisis no one falls on his face.

In the same way, the Mother Butler Mission Guilds are self-effacing but indispensable to the Catholic Church in its rituals of worship. You attend to what might be called the little touches, the embellishments – the sewing of vestments, the purchase of liturgical paraphernalia, the provision of altar fixtures for poor parishes, and so on. But without such painstaking attention to detail the practice of the Catholic faith would be wanting indeed.

Mother Butler Guilds do their work quietly, invisibly, but effectively. And that is the working style that I, personally, subscribe to. For as you work, no one gives much noise. But, when you are no longer there, that is when you, all that you contribute, are sorely missed. Fortunately, the Catholic Church in the Philippines has not had a chance to miss the work of the Mother Butler Guilds. After 31 years, you are still here, still working tirelessly, and still growing.

But it is not only our style, but that of plain, ordinary people everywhere, the kind of people throughout our country who put the food on our tables, the clothes on our back. These are the plain people, incidentally, whose multitude of individual, unrecognized acts of courage added up to the sweeping rejection of tyranny and the restoration of our freedoms. It is the style we must all adopt as we work to rebuild our country.

The heroic phase of our new history has passed into deathless memory; now the larger, longer work must start. It is here where the virtues of people such as those that mark your Guilds are needed: the virtues of quiet perseverance and industry; of attention to the details that make up the larger picture; of faith that by our many small acts we shall change the world. They are the virtues to which Robert Kennedy referred when he said:

“Few will have the greatness to bend history itself, but each of us can work to change a small portion of events, and in the total of all those acts will be written the history of this generation . . . It is from numberless diverse acts of courage and belief that human history is shaped. Each time a man stands up for an ideal, or acts to improve the lot of others, or strikes out against injustice, he sends forth a tiny ripple of hope, and crossing each other from a million different centers of energy and daring, those ripples build a current that can sweep down the mightiest walls of oppression and resistance.”

Ever since my return, my message has been essentially the same: let us buckle down to work, to the tasks we have respectively taken on. Our problems are not the kind that we can split apart as a solution, but the kind that require slow, painstaking and determined efforts to unravel. We inherited a mess of an economy and a political system. We have made great strides in politics, but much remains to be done. But in the economy, the basic work has just begun. After all the discussions both here and abroad, the promises of help, the expressions of confidence in our ability to surmount our problems, the real work must be ours. And it is work that requires the virtues of which I spoke as distinguishing your Guilds.

Here I speak to the converted. So, help me instead to spread the words I uttered when I arrived: the time for talk is over, the time for action is now.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the MILF-Christian Consultations

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the MILF-Christian Consultations

IN SEARCH OF PEACE IN MINDANAO

Continuing her quest for peace in the South, the President declares that those who call her weak should not put to the test her commitment to democracy. She is willing to go to any lengths for peace, with no concern for her safety; her fate she leaves to God.

The President also announces that to encourage wider consultations, she will appoint a Commission for Peace and Development in the autonomous region.

In everything I do or say, I am the President of all our people.

I went south personally to reestablish on a firmer footing the uneasy peace that has obtained in Mindanao. I went there hoping to find in one Muslim leader, and later on, in others, the same desire for peace as I have, the same admission that we cannot hope to recover and make progress unless our people are assured of peace.

That meeting was meant to be just the beginning. The beginning of a round of consultations in the areas where Muslims and Christians co-exist so as to bring them together in a common effort to uplift their communities and establish the material foundation of their political and spiritual growth. The intention is to orient the policies of government in your areas in the direction you think best. No one can presume to know this better than you. That is the character of this government, the nature of a true democracy.

This is an open government. Open to ideas and making every effort to be sensitive to the feelings of the people. It is neither in the character nor the spirit of this government to make any decisions behind the backs of the people affected. I speak for this government, and I hope, in so speaking, that my words also reflect the sentiments of those with whom it deals. If this is not the case, then I have been misunderstood. So let me make it clear.

Whatever political arrangements or structure must be made to accommodate the ways of life and beliefs of the diverse people of Mindanao, one principle will never be compromised: we shall have democracy across the length and breadth of our land. Any changes from the general structure of government and laws that special circumstances may dictate for certain areas of our country must bear the stamp of popular approval obtained through democratic means. We took our stand on democracy in the last elections in the face of intimidation and violence, although we were unarmed. Is it conceivable we shall not stand by democracy now that we have the armed might of the Republic in our hands?

There are some who say that it was neither prudent, in terms of personal safety, nor becoming, in the light of my high office, to go anywhere for peace, as I have done. With prudence regarding my safety, I have no concern. I leave my fate to God. You who are Muslims should appreciate this more than others. With regard to the dignity of my high office, let me say that a higher dignity is found in the good use of the Presidency to bring peace to our land than by standing on protocol. And to those who fear that my willingness to go to any lengths for peace will be construed as weakness, let me say: Let those who want, so construe it. It does not bother me to be spoken of as weak by the ignorant, but let them not make the mistake of putting me to the test: to the test of my commitment to democracy and to the safety and well-being of my people.

Rest assured therefore that any provision against paramilitary protection of the public safety will be respected only after adequate provision is made for the safety of all communities by other means, even if it takes a larger military establishment to do it. We must, in principle, yield to the public clamor for more responsible guardians of public order than the CHDFs have proved to be, but we will never compromise on the safety of our people, and the protection of their rights and liberties. It is unfortunate that the bad elements in these forces have brought a general discredit to the concept of community-based defense forces. But the over-all aim of community protection against subversion and terrorism remains our first priority and the paramount and exclusive duty and prerogative of the national government.

Again, let me repeat. This is a government of the people, pledged to lead them only in the direction they point. It is a government by consultation. The discussions today were animated, to say the least, and this is good for it shows that the idea is taken seriously. We, the government, are, of course, serious about it.

We therefore encourage that wider consultations be held following this, consultations that should involve all groups and sectors.

We shall appoint a Commission for Peace and Development, to be composed of people from the autonomous region and to report directly to me. It is this Commission that will review the problems brought up in the consultations and the solutions proposed, and recommend these to me. Their mandate will cover all issues regarding the peace and order situation in the autonomous regions.

Pending its recommendations, we have held in abeyance any further appointments or replacements of officials in the Regional Autonomous Governments in Regions 9 and 12 after the people have been consulted and I have studied the matter with Minister Pimentel.

We shall continue to disagree on many points. This is the price we must pay for freedom. This is also the chief advantage of a democracy, that we have the benefit of the widest spectrum of views on our many problems. But this diversity must have a center to hold it together. That center is our common conviction that all we do and say in all sincerity must always be for the good of our one and only country, the singular object of our total loyalty.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the women of Sigma Delta Phi

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the women of Sigma Delta Phi

[Delivered on October 22, 1986]

THE GREATER STRUGGLE LIES AHEAD

During a tense month filled with rumors about a coup, President Aquino reports on numerous important developments: There is no falling out between her and Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile; inefficient OICs will have to shape up or be shipped out; the International Monetary Fund is expected to approve our Standby Program; and she will soon fix a deadline to mark the end of our efforts to achieve peace with communist-led rebels through talks.

It was before you, the women of Sigma Delta Phi, that I announced the rebirth of Philippine democracy by declaring that I would challenge the dictator to the Presidency. It is only right therefore that every now and then I should stand before you to announce how this new democracy is faring.

You have heard many rumors the past few weeks. Rumors of a coup to be staged by Minister Enrile, rumors of counter-action taken by the government. The height was yesterday when, on the one hand, I was told I had ordered the arrest of Enrile and, on the other, Enrile had started his coup by calling on the service chiefs to declare their loyalties one way or the other. This together with a press conference he is alleged to have called, and where he strongly intimated his intentions.

Those of us who actually made a revolution, as opposed to those who merely talk a good coup or revolution, have nothing to gain by falling out with each other. We have, on the contrary, a lot to lose by doing so; mainly the meaning of the sacrifices we respectively made to return democracy to our country and the trust reposed on us by the millions of Filipinos who made the same sacrifices with us.

If we fall out with each other, the only gainers are the enemies of freedom: the Marcos loyalists and the die-hard communists who, by thus far ignoring our offer of peace and our people's burning desire to see an end to killing and fear, increasingly reveal their real intentions for our people, the real character of their regard for our people's well-being.

This is why there is no falling out between Minister Enrile and myself. We are not stupid. We did not sacrifice, and more important than that, we did not ask our people to offer the supreme sacrifice of their lives, just to create openings for their enemies to take control over their lives and their future in the differences that have arisen between us. From the start of our talk last night, this was clear. We are one in seeking the common good, in realizing the potential of our country to recover and to achieve progress and keep its precious freedoms.

Those present at the meeting, aside from Johnny and myself, were Doy Laurel, General Ramos, Joe Concepcion and Teddy Locsin. We spoke frankly about our special concerns, our respective ways of viewing the problems of the country and how to go about solving them. You may say this comes late in the day, but better late than never. It is understandable that we, who had not known each other, who had made our plans to restore democracy, should take some time to understand each other. But now we do. Many differences remain, but the common ground of patriotism is clearly shared by all. Our styles will continue to differ; we are different people, struck from different molds that were created out of radically different experiences. But we are first Filipinos and committed to democracy.

And those differences, as our discussions went on, were increasingly being resolved in a common impatience over the slow progress of some of our initiatives.

We swept the local political infrastructure clean to prepare the ground for responsible and truly representative local governments. We removed local government officials throughout the country in order to paralyze and hopefully dismantle the deposed dictatorship's electoral machinery to prevent its return by the back door of local governments. Necessarily this meant appointing OICs in place. By and large, our appointments were good. But quite a few, as I pointed out in my speech in Panay where the common complaint was of absentee OICs, have fallen way below our expectations. These officials, who derive their mandate only indirectly from the people who put my Government in place, have betrayed the trust I reposed in them by a gross and inexcusable indifference to the efforts of the National Government to bring peace, democracy and social services to the people. A few of these OICs have the gall to act on the basis of what they say are their personal views of the public good. They were not put in office for their views, but for their assumed competence in carrying out the programs of this Government. When and if they receive a direct mandate from the people, then they will be entitled to their opinions. And in speaking of these particular OICs, let me say that they will never have the opportunity. For the government has set its face against them. Minister Pimentel and I will be going over the list of OICs for those soon to be discharged following on my warning delivered in Panay to shape up or be shipped out. For some of them, there will be no second chance to shape up. They are out.

I expect the fullest cooperation from the local governments temporarily in place in our drive to bring Peace to the countryside. The Peace and Order Councils are hereby instructed to move with more vigor and speed in setting up the structures of cooperation between local communities and the Armed Forces to contain the spread of insurgency and put a stop to the abuses of the rebels and their efforts to exploit the democratic space we have created in order to destroy the democracy our people restored.

Our patience has been worn thin. Our people now know who genuinely share the vision of democracy for which they fought. That vision has no place for the practice of graft and the indulgence of incompetence, nor for the imposition of a foreign ideology whose chief merit is the more efficient enslavement of the people.

As we prepare for more vigorous action in those areas that give our people grave concern, I ask the people, the communities throughout our land, to work out the ways by which they can contribute to the coming nationwide effort to bring peace throughout the land and progress to our country. We have worked silently, and therefore with little public recognition, to put in place many of the programs for national recovery. One of the most important is the debt structuring program.

The IMF Board is expected to approve our Standby Program which will provide $508 million dollars in additional financing during the next 18 months. Of this amount approximately $300 million dollars will be available for drawdown by October 31 or November 15. Upon the approval of our program, we will also be able to draw down the last tranche of $350 million dollars of the new money facility previously negotiated with our commercial bank lenders. The same program will pave the way for approval in December of a $300 million Economic Recovery Loan from the World Bank, plus a possible additional co-financing of the same program by the Japan Exim Bank amounting to another $300 million dollars. We will commence negotiations with our commercial bank lenders on October 27 in order to reschedule approximately $3.6 billion dollars in maturing loan amortizations from 1987 to 1992. We also hope to renegotiate the terms of our last, 1983-1986 rescheduling to obtain better terms and lower interest rates on approximately $5.7 billion of previously rescheduled loans.

I believe we have achieved the best arrangement in the circumstances. We might do better if we continue to discuss with our foreign creditors, but I think what the people want more than an incremental advantage is a clear picture of the way ahead. A clear idea of the investment climate in the coming years. A clear idea of the peace and order situation immediately. After democracy, we want certainty so we can play wisely. To this end, I must declare my intention to soon fix a deadline to mark the end of our efforts to achieve peace by talk and the earnest start of efforts to establish it by any means the situation calls for. Any attack on centers of government by the insurgents will merely accelerate the deadline. And here, let me offer this assurance. We have the situation well in hand. Our Armed Forces are ready to take on any challenge to the integrity of the State and the safety of our people. To our people, let me say. Do not be afraid. The government will protect you. But to them also I would like to appeal for cooperation, for the kind of support and courage that brought us freedom.

Again, even as I speak a comprehensive program for the imposition of peace through economic development, social justice, and military action is being fleshed out. We must proceed with the energy, the coordination, the unity of a single hand. Now open in the offer of peace, but soon to be clenched in a declaration of war.

Be steadfast my countrymen, be brave, for we fight for the right. Join with me in my struggle to bring us the country of our dreams. I need your strength and your prayers to bear the burden placed on my shoulders of fulfilling the destiny of God's favored children. Reveal again the power of your faith, your resolve, your numbers. The power that brought us freedom, bring it now to bear on my effort to bring peace to our poor land. I said it right after the Victory, the Revolution has only begun. The greater struggle lies ahead. We have enjoyed to the full the heady brew of sudden freedom. Let us not spurn the cup of our responsibility as citizens of a free country, of our obligation to repay the Lord for the grace of our liberation. Let this day be the first day of another February that will never end until our nation fulfills its cherished dreams.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 7th Annual World Dental Congress

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 7th Annual World Dental Congress

[Delivered at the PICC, November 9, 1986]

NEEDED: VOLUNTEER DENTAL SERVICES

It is undeniable that there is greater dental consciousness now compared to a generation ago and that dentistry is now up there along with other medical sciences. President Aquino, however, stresses that dental services must be brought to as many people as possible.

The government is committed to do its part but dental care is expensive and so, to a great extent, the immediate dental needs of the people must be met by volunteer services.

Thank you for the honor of inviting me to address this distinguished body. I cannot help but be reminded tonight about how my husband Ninoy used to regard dental appointments with mortal dread and how martial law changed all that for him, among other things. For a political prisoner in solitary confinement, a dental appointment in prison meant the rare opportunity to see and talk to people from the outside world. I remember only too well how eagerly my husband looked forward to each visit of our dentist, Dr. Primo Gonzales. One of the ironies of life was that both Ninoy and Marcos had the same dentist. Am I glad that that was one of the very few things they had in common!

But many more things have changed, for all of us. For instance, thinking about government is no longer like thinking about going to the dentist. And even real dental appointments are no longer associated with intense pain. This is not to say that dental bills can no longer cause migraine or something else.

But it is undeniable that there is greater dental consciousness now than say a generation ago. For instance, I never fail on any evening I watch television to see former assemblyman and now National Parks Chairman, Orly Mercado, and TV host Ric Puno brandishing their teeth along with a tube of toothpaste. This just goes to show how important dental health has become as a concern and an issue.

I see children, and even teenagers, with braces, head gear, molar bands, brackets, arch wire, and retainers. The idea is to save teeth, make them better, rather than just pulling them out to put an abrupt end to pain and inconvenience. A sort of dental reconciliation, as opposed to confrontation with bad teeth. And I am told that specializations have increased, along with dental schools. Dentistry is now up there along with all the other medical sciences. And we see, as here, dental associations holding international seminars just as medical associations have been doing to share developments in the science. I hope we can go farther and see the dental profession make a concerted effort to bring the services I have mentioned to as many of the people as possible. Services that, as of now, only the affluent can have.

Government is committed to doing its part. But dental care is expensive and so, to a great extent, the immediate needs of our people must be met by volunteer services. You have all heard the rumored plan of "God Save the Queen." Well, this Queen doesn't want to be saved, but proposes instead a better project, "Dentists Save Our People's Teeth." That's one plan, on a nationwide scale, that will get my endorsement and support. We all have to do our share. There isn't enough money to go around for Government to do it alone. Be reminded that half of every dollar we earn goes to pay for servicing our debts.

I make this appeal for your volunteer help because I know of your readiness to sacrifice for your country. Many of you were in the streets to extract the dictatorship from our country and restore our democracy. And that, as you know, went rather painlessly. But more remains to be done. We have to preserve what we won. That is why we have a new Constitution soon to be ratified. It will implant firmly our rights and liberties. I count on your support to get it ratified. And I mean not just your votes, but your participation in the campaign as well. There are those who say I should not campaign for ratification. They are the same ones who say that if the Constitution is not ratified, then it is a rejection of me and I should step down. Now does that make sense? I will campaign. The first law is survival. We intend to win convincingly.

I wish I could be with you longer. My attention has been called to some of the pressing concerns of your profession. These will be studied, along with so many other equally pressing matters that demand our attention. Unfortunately, not all these matters contribute to national progress. The rumors you have heard is one. They take time away from genuine concerns, not to mention discrediting our country in the eyes of the world. But with all these pressures, your concerns will be attended to.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the members of the Japanese Diet

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the members of the Japanese Diet in a private reception

[Delivered on November 11, 1986]

SEEKING PARTNERSHIP THROUGH AID

On a state visit to Japan, the President informs the members of the Diet (Parliament) that, following the return of democracy, the Philippines is ensuring political stability. Congress will be convened in 1987; in its absence, she is directly consulting the people on solutions to their problems. She appeals to friends of the Filipino people to extend a helping hand, by becoming economic partners.

I am honored by this reception tendered for me by the heads of the two houses of your illustrious parliament.

I hope that after the Philippine Congress is convened next year, there will be occasion to return this warm gesture of hospitality.

The Filipinos look eagerly to the day when the power to make laws returns to a duly elected parliament; a parliament of men and women chosen by the people and accountable to them; a parliament that will make the policies that people want. This is the secret of stability, the strength of democracies. Right or wrong, only the laws that people themselves make through their duly elected representatives will have their acceptance and support. As I said, no one can know better than the people what they want, and what they are prepared to sacrifice for it.

Leadership in a democracy means leading the people only in the direction they have pointed. And that is what I have been doing. Because we still do not have a parliament, I consult directly with the people about their problems and what they think the solutions should be. This makes things a little untidy, but keeps them always on course towards the ends the people desire.

It is in the pursuit of those ends that I am here today.

Our people wanted democracy back. The past eight months have been an effort to restore it as fully as possible. We have completed a draft constitution which will be submitted to a referendum in February. We shall have local and Congressional elections a few months after that. But even while these political efforts must be made, we are working to rebuild the economy that was ruined by the previous government. Because the ruin of the economy was made possible by the state's control of the economy, and because we are committed in principle to free enterprise, the effort to rebuild our economy must mainly be carried out by the private sector, both Filipino and foreign.

I have made the appeal to the friends of the Filipino people and of Philippine democracy to lend a helping hand. I have directed that appeal especially to those, like Japan, who have always stood by the Filipino people, sharing a portion of the fruits of their progress. But the main assistance we hope to get is that extended in partnership, in a cooperative and mutually advantageous effort to bring out the great potential of Filipino skill and enterprise.

We need outright aid, that is true at this point in time, but more importantly we need Japan's expression of faith in the promise of Philippine progress. I ask the Japanese to join us in rebuilding our economy. This will prove as much to their advantage as to ours. It will deepen our understanding of each other. It will strengthen our necessary friendship. My visit reaffirms that old friendship. I hope it will also mark a new chapter of even closer cooperation.

PHILIPPINE PRODUCTS IN THE WORLD MARKET

President Aquino opens an exhibit of Philippine products in a Japanese department store. She takes pride in the workmanship and artistry of Filipinos who create goods that are competitive in the world market.

I know I'm really in government when I enter a department store in Japan, not to go shopping, but to help promote the products of our country.

I would like to thank the management of Seibu for accommodating this special exhibit of Philippine products. You honor us, and I know that in return we will be bringing in more customers and business to your establishment. For you are showcasing here some of the best examples of Philippine materials, artistry and craftsmanship. They are products that will appeal and satisfy buyers anywhere in the world.

And to the Filipinos managing and staffing this exhibition, I would like to remind you that you fulfill an extremely important task. You are helping create a demand for our products in this country which is an ally, and key trading partner of the Philippines.

May I also say that your task should be easy because Filipino products are really outstanding. When we put our hearts and minds to it, we can create goods that are truly innovative, useful, beautiful, and competitive in the world market.

Congratulations for the good work you have put into this exhibition and I wish you good business.

APPRECIATING EACH OTHER'S CULTURE AND PEOPLE

President Aquino notes that the intense effort of the Japanese to rebuild their country from the ashes of war inspired the Filipinos to win back their own sovereign pride and independence. Closer cooperation which both people desire should be based on this feeling of pride. Cooperation will not only be in the areas of technical assistance and investment, but also in deep appreciation of each other's culture and people.

The warm reception extended to us by Your Majesty and the magnificence of this banquet deeply honor us. Now I see that at the heart of the strength of Japan is a beauty unequalled, I think, anywhere else in the world. And perhaps I have begun to understand the intense and unflagging efforts of the Japanese people to make and keep their country strong and progressive. But the inspiring quality of Japan has always been felt by my people. It has long antedated my visit here.

It was the image of Japan in the 19th century, the equal of any power in the world, that inspired the Filipinos to win back their own sovereign pride and independence. You showed what an Asian nation could do given the will and a wise leadership. It is again Japan, rising swiftly from the ashes of war, to recover and improve on her former greatness that inspires us today in our efforts to rise from the economic devastation we have suffered. And now Japan, I am happy to note, stands not only as an inspiration but a helpmate in our effort to recover.

The gap between your progress and our beginning is very wide, but eight months ago we closed it in at least one respect. We are on a parity in pride. Yours a pride in an unbroken chain of authority, tradition, noble ideals of self-sacrifice and courage, and brave innovations that have met with unerring success. Ours a pride, like yours, in native courage, in our newly recovered rights, and in the unique way in which we restored the democracy that was the tradition of our nation from its birth. Now, in this pride, we have the common ground on which to work out the closer cooperation that, I believe, both our peoples desire. The warmth of affection is there, and certainly the concern. The Filipinos, and I especially, will not forget the intense interest and concern shown by the Japanese people in seeing justice done to my late husband and freedom restored to our nation.

The cooperation I hope will not only be in the obvious and necessary areas of technical assistance and investment, but equally in efforts at mutual understanding; in a deep appreciation of each other's culture and people. I know it will be rewarding. For myself, I have found, in the practice of such arts of Japanese civilization that I have humbly tried to learn, a serenity that I can only compare with the consolation offered by my faith. I hope that it is in this area, more than in any other, that a stronger bond of friendship will grow between our two peoples.

Ladies and gentlemen, I ask you to join me in a toast to Their Imperial Majesties, the Emperor and Empress of Japan.

ACHIEVING THROUGH PEACEFUL MEANS

PEACE

President Aquino recalls the events which led to the February Revolution, and eventually, her presidency. She credits her late husband Ninoy for conceptualizing, embracing and promoting the philosophy of reconciliation and nonviolence that became the moving force of the relatively bloodless revolution. The real challenge now is to achieve peace by the ways of peace — for so much can be achieved in peace rather than in war.

I Japan, I understand, it is contrary to custom for women to take the leading role, especially in the realm of politics. For much of my life, in fact until three years ago, I had much in common with the Japanese woman and wife. I had chosen to marry a very dominant man; one who was to become the focus and center of my life, and the vortex of Philippine politics. Ninoy was the kind of man who had to be No. 1 not only in politics but in the home as well. And so my life around his. I was the dutiful wife, silent and supportive; the woman remembered by his friends as the one who served coffee, much as the Japanese woman serves tea. Some of these friends of his are now my ministers. They do not talk about the times when I served them coffee. But all in all I was happy in my role, for I loved him greatly.

Today I am No. 1. Not only at home but over our entire country. Ninoy would have been amazed, but also proud. For he would not fail to say that it is thanks to the many things I learned at his side. And it is true – up to a point.

Ninoy no longer influences the specific directions or decisions I must make as President of the Philippines. But I must say that the reason I am where I am today is because, as was usual between us, Ninoy took the lead and I followed.

It was Ninoy who conceptualized, embraced and promoted the philosophy of reconciliation and nonviolence that became the moving force of our bloodless February revolution. It was also Ninoy who was the first rallying point of People's Power that propelled me to the Presidency, keeps me there, and determines the course our nation is taking today.

Most people believe that People Power was born after Ninoy's death. It was really born in 1978, when he was still in prison.

In 1978, Marcos called for elections in another attempt to legitimize the naked power grab he made when he declared martial law in 1972. He wanted to prove that he and his friends had the mandate of the people. Everyone knew that the elections would be fraudulent, that the results were already prepared. Marcos controlled the Commission on Elections, the media, and the national mint. The opposition, which had none of these things, and whose leaders were either in jail, like Ninoy, or under surveillance or city arrest, clearly did not stand a chance. But Ninoy decided to take up the challenge and ran as the figurehead of the opposition slate from his prison cell. He could not campaign, of course, but our daughter Kris, then seven years old, took her father's place at the platform and appealed to the people during rallies. On the eve of elections, Ninoy was given one concession. He would be questioned on television by a government panel regarding his political views and the accusations that the government had made against him. He was taken straight from solitary confinement and thrust in front of the television cameras. I don't know how he did it, but he bested them all. He answered all the accusations and went on to accuse the government in turn. Right after the broadcast, the city of Manila exploded in a noise barrage of people beating pots and pans, car drivers honking their horns, and people shouting in the streets. It was as if they wanted to tell Ninoy, swiftly thrown back in his cell, that he was not alone. The government was helpless to stop the non-violent, if hardly peaceful, demonstration. This was the germ of People Power that would hibernate through the rest of the winter of our oppression until Ninoy's willing sacrifice of his life brought the spring of our liberation.

Ninoy would remember this night and ponder its meaning in his cell and later on in exile. This demonstration had shown the limits of tyranny, that could reach everywhere except the hearts of brave men and women. He went on to read the works of men who had also experienced the peaceful but irresistible power of ordinary people to say, No more, and demand a change. He read Gandhi and Martin Luther King. From Gandhi, he drew his arrival statement when he had decided to return to his homeland for one last desperate effort to bring peace and reconciliation to his divided land.

"I have returned of my own free will," his statement read, "to join the ranks of those struggling to restore our rights of freedom through nonviolence. According to Gandhi, the willing sacrifice of the innocent is the most powerful answer to insolent tyranny that has yet been conceived by God and Man." But as you saw on Japanese television, he never read that statement. He was dead before his feet touched the land he loved.

It was after his death that People Power blossomed in all its glory. Two million people accompanied his coffin to the grave, under the hot sun and the pouring rain. Again, the government was powerless. It had issued threats against any who joined the funeral march. It grounded public transport so that people would be inconvenienced. It held a grand ball so that the people would see its indifference to their protest. But the funeral march went on, mournful and silent. Thousands of candles lit the way to his gravesite. As his coffin slipped into the ground, Ninoy's spirit entered his race. But Ninoy dead was more to be feared than when he was alive. For now his spirit was free to animate his people with the courage that had allowed him to face death. Courage, he said, is infectious. That night began the epidemic of bravery, from which the government learned there was no immunity.

The burden of Ninoy's mission to liberate his people in peace fell on my shoulders. I was reluctant to take it on. I was not a politician. And now that he was dead, I had once more to take on myself the role of father and mother to our children. And so I stipulated two conditions before I would take on the leadership of the struggle for freedom. Two conditions I believe could not be fulfilled. One was that Marcos would commit the folly of calling for a snap election. And the other was the impossible demand that one million people would sign a petition asking me to run for President. And that is exactly what happened. In an excess of arrogance, Marcos called for elections to prove once and for all that the opposition was nothing. And over a million people signed a petition to prove he was wrong.

Again, in this election as in the previous one, Marcos had the guns, the goons, and the national mint. With these things, he believed he could buy the people's mandate or, at least, thwart their will by fabricating a victory for himself at the polls. He was wrong. I and my running mate, with hardly any funds and barely any organization, nonetheless got the people. Or rather, the people got us in the grip of their determination to be rid once and for all of the tyranny that had abused and degraded them. Neither his tricks nor his thuggery could stem the irresistible tide of People Power that swept us to victory. Against his corruption, the people pitted their integrity by refusing to be bought. Against his threats, the people pitted their courage as they wrapped their arms around the ballot boxes to protect them from his thugs. Even his computer technicians, who were tasked with fabricating a fraudulent vote count walked out in protest. And against his debased parliament that proclaimed him the victor in the face of my overwhelming victory at the polls, they launched their nonviolent revolution. One million Filipinos gathered in Luneta Park to proclaim me and Doy Laurel as the victors of the election, the President and Vice-President of the People.

From that spot I proclaimed the strategy to vindicate the people's will, to implement their decision to make me President. I outlined a program of passive resistance and civil disobedience that called, as a starter, for a boycott of Marcos enterprises. I could not predict when we would succeed, but we were certain that the end of Marcos was near. Marcos could stay in the Palace but he had already lost the rest of the country. This was so clear to everyone that no one was afraid to join the nonviolent campaign and in the end, even the army stood down. A military revolt called by a brave handful of soldiers under Minister Enrile and General Ramos, who declared themselves for my Presidency was immediately surrounded by a protective wall of People Power summoned by the Cardinal. That wall stood up to the tanks of the dictator. Marcos had lost every shred of legitimacy and, on the fourth day of the revolt, slipped away into exile.

As I came to power peacefully, so shall I keep it. This is my contract with my people and my commitment to God. The way of nonviolence had not exhausted itself in the struggle for Filipino freedom. It has the potential to give our nation a lasting and honorable peace as well. In that belief, I have called for negotiations with the communist rebels. Some people say I am naive to have done this. I can only say that I owe it to our people, who have lived in fear of the gun for so long, to exhaust every means within reason to give them the peace they so much deserve.

I do not know if I will succeed. I know I must try if only to show that before I take up the sword of war, I shall have stripped the olive branch of peace of every leaf of offering. I am confident of the power of government to deal forcefully with the insurgency in the last resort. The courage and skills of the new Filipino soldier assure us that we shall never lose our dearly bought freedoms. The real challenge is to achieve peace by the ways of peace. This is the best assurance that it will last and serve as the foundation for the national cooperation that is needed to restore my country's wasted fortunes. You have seen this in your own history. You never achieved so much in war, as you did in peace. It is that experience of your country that inspires me to go on trying. I ask you to share with me the hope and prayers that I will succeed.

DISCOVERING OPPORTUNITIES IN THE PHILIPPINES

BUSINESS

The February election and the subsequent People Power revolution laid the groundwork for the stability of the Philippines. Now the new government has the opportunity to alleviate poverty and realize the potential of the country for growth and prosperity. President Aquino, therefore, challenges the Japanese business community to invest in the country, saying that opportunities outweigh the risks.

To a Japanese businessman the Philippines must represent at this point risk and opportunity. Risk because you remain concerned about political stability; opportunity should outweigh risk. Let me begin by saying risk is a passing phenomenon and, in this case, the perception of risk is far out of proportion with the situation of real stability that has been achieved. The election in February and the subsequent People Power revolution that enforced my victory as President firmly laid the groundwork for stability. Remember that the backbone of that revolution was the business class. Call them unlikely revolutionaries. It was not done to overturn society but to restore the democracy that is the only true and viable political expression of Philippine society. All we did was kick out a small group who had twisted a once strong economy to their own ends, and in doing so destroyed all the components of a liberal capitalist economy – a free market system, a liberal framework for investment, the rule of law, and labor/management relations oriented toward the shared aim of both sectors for progress and equity.

What we have done in the Philippines since February is give business back to the businessmen. Before I turn to the dramatic results that this economic revolution has already achieved, let me say a few words more about stability. Our revolution has earned us a flattering amount of attention from the world's press, including that in Japan. Indeed although we are a much smaller, less powerful country than you, with far less of a global role, our internal political quarrels are much better known and more fully exposed to the rest of the world.

It is a surprise for a modest country like ours to find our cabinet disagreements are front page news across the world. But nevertheless it is true that we have had these growing pains as we return to full democracy. Although I came to power with the massive support of the people, I have been anxious to govern by consensus whenever possible. There has been no violent assault on the old power structure. Rather, wherever we can we have absorbed it into the new democracy. Inevitably some have found it more difficult than others to settle down under the democratic yoke. For it is a yoke to operate in a democracy, where it is not the naked power of the player but the popular vote that decides the outcome. Laws, rules and a heightened sense of civic duty mark democratic politics even more than the freedom and license which attract so much attention. There is no more arbitrary government in the Philippines. There is now the rule of law. There is no more government by the gun, just government by the ballot.

Not only has this created a much easier and more straightforward environment for outsiders to do business in, it has also created a stable future for our country. We now have the draft of a new Constitution which will be presented for ratification in a popular referendum in early February next year. The day before I left for Tokyo I launched the vote Yes campaign. I hope and believe there will be an overwhelming majority in favor. If it is approved, congressional and local elections will follow a few months later. So we are well on the road to a full recovery of our democracy. We do not take too much notice of the anguished complaints of those who do not relish their political chances under a democracy.

As for the economy itself, despite the damaging cloud of political instability that has hung over it, all the vital signs are good. We have a new standby agreement with the IMF that provides $508 million to finance our economic recovery program, which it has fully endorsed. The IMF program is based on assumption of a 5.5% growth in our economy next year. My ministers are currently at work on a long-term rescheduling of our burdensome foreign debt. We have also concluded loans with the World Bank and Asian Development Bank. And, going by the past record of Japanese concern for the welfare of the Filipino people, the Japanese Government will be generous in its bilateral assistance.

The special efforts made by donors in this time of need to help us in repairing the economic devastation we inherited is a measure, I believe, of the confidence our friends around the world have in my government. It has also eased our budgetary crisis and enabled us to begin the task of putting our economy back in order.

The support we enjoy from both the private and public sectors internationally shows up in such indicators as the appreciation of the pesos against the dollar. More important perhaps, given the dollar's weakness this year, is the surge in the level of international reserves. From a record low of $911 million in February, it has increased to $1.64 billion by June. There has also been a dramatic slowing in the average inflation rate from 35.1% in the first seven months of last year to 1.9% over the same period in 1986.

We have been assisted by the lower oil price, a recent rise in coconut prices and other fortunate economic events. More important though is that with a government in Manila that enjoys international and domestic confidence in the honesty and discipline of its management everything becomes possible. Once more the great economic chances that were ours are in sight again. We see again the opportunity of banishing poverty and realizing the great potential of our country for growth and prosperity.

And obviously one of our greatest ambitions must be a fuller partnership with Japan and other countries in the Pacific Basin. As you cast around for lower cost manufacturing centers from which to compete in the markets of the other advanced economies of the world, you will inevitably examine the Philippines. Our special relationship with one of the most important of the Pacific rim countries, the United States, as well as our advantage of a cost-efficient workforce favor us. So does our openness to foreign investment. Our new constitution creates a framework in this area whose details still have to be worked out by Congress once it is elected. Nevertheless I can already say that what is falling into place is a liberal code that welcomes foreign investment.

It has to be this way. Even those Filipinos who do not share the private enterprise enthusiasm of my government admit that the shortage of domestic capital for new investment obliges the Philippines to look outside for new investment funds. As we set about our task of private sector led growth and development there will be many opportunities for cooperation with Japanese business. The opportunity of the Philippines beckons our neighbors. And may I conclude by saying: You are welcome.

PRAY FOR PEACE

President Aquino praises two peoples, the Filipinos and the Japanese, who were once at war, but can now sit together in peace and prayer. She states that wounds of the past can indeed be healed but she questions the premise that war is necessary, after all, to cleanse a nation.

Today, I see before me two peoples together in prayer who were once at war, and are now at peace. It was almost impossible to see Japanese and Filipinos together, as I see you today, sharing a friendship, common prayers and a mutual faith in the goodwill that binds our nations.

Why was it that only two generations ago, the wounds we had inflicted upon each other seemed beyond healing? That our hatred and enmity knew no bounds? That the causes we respectively fought for superseded our birthright as men to live as brothers created in the same fashion, by the same hand? Why, at certain points in history, does it become so simple, inexorable and justified to fight and kill? How could so many fighting faiths for which so many died become so irrelevant to this generation of the children and grandchildren of war?

For despite what seemed the unbridgeable rifts of the past, this is how it is between Japanese and Filipinos today. We do not face each other and see the nemesis of our fathers and grandfathers. We are not compelled to demand restitution for lives lost and unavenged. We do not keep the grudges of the past, for we have long since abandoned its illusions and vain aspirations. As we sit here today, we do not see one race mingling with another, but Christian brethren, sharing and celebrating the same faith in the love of our saviour, Jesus Christ. Thanks to Him, the plunder and destruction of war is buried and behind us. The future is ours to build, together, and with the choice of the best means – the methods of peace. For He did assure us through his disciple James that “those who sow in peace raise a harvest of righteousness.”

There are those who insist that nations are cleansed, their soil and patrimony nurtured and enriched by floodtides of violence. I saw nations suffer the rites of bloodshed only to find that what has been spilled is rarely worth the victory or defeat. The lesson of war is that wars, at best, should never be fought. But it is a difficult and elusive lesson to learn and apply. And the most progressive nations on our aging earth have tried, and with all the best intentions, but have not mastered it.

And yet, despite the fragility of the dream, the prayers of Filipinos, and surely the friends of Filipinos here in Japan, are for peace. We pray for peace in the world, peace in our region, Asia. But we pray most fervently for peace in our troubled islands. We pray again for the same miraculous, precedent-breaking peace that was God’s unexpected gift to Filipinos last February, during and after our Yellow Revolution. For then, as now, we were a people standing tense and apprehensive, at the end of what seemed like the precipice, when God in His mercy, snatched us from the edge and brought us gently back to freedom.

Then, as now, when the options of reasonable dialogue and settlement by peaceful means has been exhausted, we stand ready for the good, the honorable, the moral fight. But as in those days of groping and hope, we continue to pray that God, if it is His will, might spare us a second time from being drawn into battle. But if we must confront and scatter the perpetrators of an ideology that denies the primacy of God and what He teaches and commands, then we pray that the signal to march forward might be clear and unequivocal. For my highest priority, and that of many others in my country, is to be true to our God who granted us our second lease on peace and life. Without His blessing and grace, our best efforts will lead us nowhere.

The Japanese, I know, have a deep understanding of the value and meaning of peace. For it was in the aftermath of war, when they turned from the way of the sword to the path of industry, that they achieved real victory and power.

I am filled with hope, as I see Japanese and Filipinos sitting here side-by-side. You are the clear and living testament that the wounds of the past can indeed be healed, and healed completely. And if you, who are set apart by dint of bloodlines and traditions, can forgive, forget and unite; then so can Filipinos find it in their hearts to reconcile with brother Filipinos.

For we look to Japan as a model in the achievement of progress. And we know that like our Japanese brothers, we too can rebuild most effectively, and enjoy the greatest prosperity, in the working space provided by unity and peace.

Is an unbroken, continuing peace possible in the Philippines? Must it come only after the trauma of war? We pray not. We pray that the current negotiations for dialogue and ceasefire might continue in all sincerity, and prosper and come to a happy end. But if we must fight, if we must defend our life and future as a free nation from those who insist on taking it by force, then we pray that the forces of democracy might have the strength, and might be given the victory.

We are a nation at the crossroads. But what gives me confidence is that God's people are numerous among us. And God has promised to guide and protect His chosen. As David, who often stood at the crossroads of war and peace would sing: "The Lord is the strength of His people, a fortress of salvation for his anointed ones. Save your people and bless your inheritance; be their shepherd and carry them forever."

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Philippine media

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon Aquino President of the Philippines To the Philippine media

[Delivered on November 13, 1986]

RESTORING IN THE PHILIPPINES

CONFIDENCE

President Aquino informs the Philippine media that Japan, “inspired to respect by the drama of our liberation,” received her with warm hospitality and concrete expressions of support for Philippine progress.

The President reports that Japanese assistance, in the form of credit and grants-in-aid, could total at least 100 billion yen, a significant increase from the aid Japan extended in the past.

Mine have been voyages of discovery. And I think it has been the same for you, my countrymen in media, as you followed me in my trips as head of state. We have discovered facets of other nations that were concealed from us in the recent past, during the shameful years of the dictatorship. In our frantic efforts to find allies in the fight against the dictatorship, in our embarrassed attempts to explain the things that were happening back home, we overlooked the wealth of experience to be found in disinterested friendships with other nations, in international efforts of cooperation towards our mutual advantage and in pursuit of goals rising above our purely national concerns. But now, we see the possibilities for all these – now that we can look at the world with eyes of pride, and feel the world look at us with some measure of the respect that is our birthright. It is different when you are free, when you are looked upon as being well on the way to regaining mastery of your fate.

And strangely enough, it is only then that you find genuine friends who are more willing to help. I suppose this has to do with respect as the only firm ground for friendship, and with the need of the friend who gives to be honored by the gift as much as the recipient is helped and honored by it.

Japan, an old friend and longtime supporter of Filipino efforts to achieve progress, has started a new chapter in the history of our friendship. Inspired to respect by the drama of our liberation, and encouraged by the spectacle of Filipino courage, determination and self-reliance in the reconquest of freedom, democracy, and the control of its destiny, Japan has received us with warm hospitality, tangible expressions of support for Philippine progress, and every mark of honor that one could wish.

My talks with Prime Minister Nakasone were frank and enriching. I told him about the problems we continue to face, and the measures we have thus far taken to solve them. I outlined the program of action we intend to take to recover for ourselves a measure of progress and equity commensurate with our political achievements to date. He listened with great attention and deep concern. I feel we have a dependable friend and ally in him and his government. I believe he has found in the new Philippines a dependable friend and ally as well in the common task of assuring the stability of the region and the shared progress of all who live in it.

From my talks with the Prime Minister and other members of his government, as well as from the talks on the ministerial level, I can confidently say that Japan stands ready to help us, even more than she has done in the past. We are confident that assistance, in the form of credits and grants-in-aid, could reach at least a hundred billion yen. This represents a significant increase from the 49.5 billion yen she normally extended in the past. This assistance package includes the Calaca Power Project Financing, the 14th Yen Loan, as well as specific projects in the form of technical assistance and transfer of know-how, especially in agriculture at which Japan has excelled, as well as a much needed infusion of funds to our rural employment program.

One must, with grace, leave the details of this package to be explained in time by the Japanese government itself. The Philippine side must still do its part in drawing up the specific projects to which assistance will be directed.

There are other dimensions to the renewed friendship between Japan and Philippines that one must not fail to mention. There is, as I said, a new feeling of mutual respect. There is also her unequivocal support for the new government and our new democracy, and a strong desire to see that it succeeds.

From my talks with the emperor of Japan, I have come away feeling enriched by acquaintance with a great and good man, who embodies the civility and wisdom of Japan. In him and the imperial family, I see what has inspired Japanese progress, the center that has held together and directed the tremendous energies and far-reaching enterprises of this great nation.

To His Majesty, the Emperor, to Prime Minister Nakasone, to the government and people of Japan, I would like to express, on behalf of the Filipino people, our deepest gratitude for the hospitality and honor they have extended to us on this visit. Our ancient ties of friendship have taken deeper root as a result of it.

Tribute of President Corazon Aquino to the Japanese Press Club

Tribute of Her Excellency Corazon Aquino President of the Philippines To the Japanese Press Club

PAYING TRIBUTE TO JAPANESE MEDIA

Addressing representatives of the Japanese media during her state visit to Japan, President Aquino praises them for the key role they played in revealing the truth behind the assassination of her husband Ninoy. The President says that Japanese media were instrumental in reconstructing the crime, and providing the evidence and analysis which set “the spark that started the flame of our revolution.”

She adds that the Japanese media will continue to play a very important role in the affairs of nations.

I am honored by your invitation and grateful for this opportunity to thank Japanese media, on its home grounds, for its contribution in sparking the Philippine revolution that restored our freedom and democracy.

Three years ago, my husband Ninoy returned to his country, to join, in his words, the ranks of those struggling to be free but with the specific mission to bring about that freedom through nonviolence and reconciliation. For his pains, he was shot in the head. The immediate reaction of much world opinion was to credit the government's version of the assassination. How could a government with such a reputation for cunning have committed the blunder of a brazen assassination? It was completely out of character, many opinionmakers and reporters speculated. The Japanese media did not speculate. Instead, with the flair of innovation and technology that marks the Japanese character, and with the intense desire to know the truth and the passion to see justice done that distinguish the Japanese people, the media here brought the science and native intelligence of the Japanese to bear on the riddle of Ninoy's assassination. The result of its efforts in reconstructing the crime, in analyzing the evidence, much of which was obtained by Japanese media, was the spark that started the flame of our revolution. The tapes and analysis of the assassination put together by you became the chief weapon of the Filipino people in their struggle to recover their freedom and give justice to Ninoy. That weapon was truth, and against it nothing could prevail: not the lies, the media monopoly, nor the threats of the dictatorship. My brother-in-law, Butz Aquino, would tell the crowds of protestors as government troops moved in to break up the demonstrators not to be afraid. The government, he would say, had the armalites but we had the betamax of the assassination. These tapes that you produce and the news reports that you published circulated widely among the Filipinos, clear indictments of the government's responsibility for the murder. One shot from a gun was answered by you by your shots with your cameras. Events proved which was the stronger calibre.

The Japanese media must, however, share the honor of its contribution to Filipino freedom with the Japanese public it serves. For if that public were not so passionately interested in the truth and in justice, I doubt if Japanese media would have dedicated itself so intensely to search for the truth. You, the Japanese media, serve a noble constituency. Whereas other nations focused their concerns on the political implications of the assassination, which were important, of course, the Japanese public from the way I saw it seemed more intensely concerned with the injustice of taking a man's life. For those of us who took his death as a personal tragedy, this concern touched us deeply and moved us to feel the deepest gratitude for the Japanese people, not to mention the highest respect for a people so committed to moral principles over and above political expediency.

As the Japanese nation, by reason of its still increasing economic strength, moves forward to assume a role of greater responsibility in the affairs of nations, may I say that it has clearly shown the moral instincts to deserve such a role. In this development, the Japanese media will play a very important part. It is you who will bring the great issues that will arise as a result of this new role to the Japanese public, and it is you, the Japanese media, that will reflect the thoughts and sentiments of your constituency. You will be the mirror of the shining prince that Japan will soon become again.

This visit has been a truly enhancing one for me. I have seen and experienced aspects of Japan that are seldom talked about these days when the attention is focused on its great economic strength. I have seen the beauty that lies at the heart of the strength of Japan, I told the Emperor who embodies it, in his civility and wisdom, to the utmost. Speaking for my country, let me say that we come away greatly enriched and encouraged, both by the support clearly shown by the government and people of Japan for the efforts of the Filipino people to achieve progress and by the inspiring example it presents.

This visit reaffirms our ancient ties of friendship, and makes us eager for the closer cooperation that is promised. On behalf of the Filipino, may I express our heartfelt gratitude for the hospitality and honor extended to the Philippines.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the special role of the Provincial Press Association

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the special role of the Provincial Press Association

[Released on November 28, 1986]

THE ROLE OF THE PROVINCIAL PRESS

President Aquino cites the special role of the provincial press to influence the hearts and minds of people in the countryside. She advises the press to always give the total picture and to verify their facts.

Once more, the Philippine press is the freest in Asia. But this bit of praise so often heard from foreigners implies a need to temper this new freedom with yet more discipline and responsibility. For to achieve balance in reporting, to deserve an honored place in a democracy, the press must resist control by external forces with special interests. But it must also exercise the greatest self-control to protect its own interest and special mission. That mission is to give the public the fairest, most accurate, and most comprehensive reportage possible on all events that count. This is the public's bottom-line for the press. This is what people in a free society demand and you must supply.

Sensational reporting, like junk food, gives readers the illusion of being filled but gives them no real nourishment. For our people to grow into a true democracy, you must give them more balanced and substantial fare.

Before me today is one of the most potent forces in our society. I refer to you, the provincial press, who wield a weapon no less potent than the sword. The provincial press specially has the capability to influence the hearts and minds, and therefore determine the actions of our people in the countryside. And you are called to exercise that influence at a critical time when our people in the rural areas choose to either drop the plow and pick up a gun or hold on to the plow and work for the second harvest of progress to complement the first of freedom that he enjoys.

You, too, can protect our people in the countryside, protect them against the lies and illusions of the enemies of freedom. You can choose to play up the noise and propaganda of the few, or stand up for the plain truth and the common good. You can work exclusively for the short-term interests of your publications or commit yourselves to the larger and enduring interests of our nation.

I ask you to honor the freedoms allowed in our new democracy by sticking to the highest standards of your noble craft and profession.

When reporting on people or events, check your facts, and then check them again. And always give the total picture. For everytime a personality or institution comes under attack from your typewriters, the effect can be as real as bullets aimed at the heart or a bomb exploding in a public place.

Especially in the provinces, where communications are tenuous, I ask you to use every available space to enlighten our people on the issues. There is much they have yet to know about the new constitution and the upcoming plebiscite, the counter-insurgency campaign, and the peace talks on which so much of our hope of progress depends.

Finally I ask that your publications be open and nonpartisan forums for public views, so that Filipinos even in remote areas can be heard and read, so that they will feel that our new democracy offers many channels for its many voices. I ask that you use media's tremendous power to build up rather than to tear down, to create rather than to destroy.

We in the government have expectations of the provincial press as high as you have of us. May we continue to be fair to each other, and work together towards the progress of our nation and the good of all.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino upon acceptance of the draft Constitution from Constitutional Commission

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Upon acceptance of the draft Constitution from the Constitutional Commission

[Delivered on November 30, 1986]

TOWARD VICTORY OF DEMOCRACY

PERMANENT

President Aquino formally accepts the draft Constitution from the Constitutional Commission. A thorough reading of the draft assures her that it is a Constitution which will give full recognition and protection of a citizen's basic rights and freedoms. She calls on those who wish to protect the freedoms gained in the revolution, to campaign for its ratification.

With the work of this assembly of the representative sectors of our society, the nationwide discussion of the draft Constitution starts in earnest. Let me add my views on it as a citizen and the leader of this proud Republic.

After the draft was submitted to me and I had gone over it, I declared that democracy is safe with this constitution. Safe in regard to its necessary institutions and safe in regard to the inalienable rights of our people. I have studied it more closely and appreciate more deeply the great length of this document for which it has been criticized.

It is long and detailed because the writers of the Constitution were intent, not only to give full and unequivocal recognition and protection of our basic rights and freedoms, but also of our deepest yearning to be progressive and just.

I said when I received this document that it shall serve as the framework of the house of democracy that we must build to protect the great political achievements of the February Election and Revolution. It does more than that. It sets the direction our nation must take to match our great freedoms with equally great progress and justice.

As you know, we have no shortage in this country of wise people. And already they are saying that the ratification of this draft will not finally solve all our problems. Who says it will? This Constitution is not intended to solve our problems. It is intended to present the greatest challenge our nation has faced. That challenge is how to achieve our aspirations of a just and progressive country consistently with the democratic principles that Filipinos cannot live without.

The Constitution lays down in great detail the basic rights that define the civilized society that Filipinos insist on:

Rights against violations of integrity of the person;

Rights against interference with the sovereign prerogatives of the people to dictate the democratic government they want and to let their voices be heard.

And along with these rights against abusive authority, are provisions that bind the state to the fulfillment of the just aspirations of the nation: progress, peace, security and equity.

This is the challenge of the Constitution that I urge our people to vote “Yes” for. How can we be free without anarchy? How can we be secure without oppression and abuse from our protectors? How can we have the peace and security in which to work for the well-being of our families, the future of our children, the protection of our faith, and the progress of our nation without violating the basic values that proudly define the Filipino today before the world? How can we have a Philippines that is strong and proud and forever democratic?

In going out to campaign for the ratification of this Constitution you are not solving your problems but proudly and bravely proclaiming and committing yourselves to the great tasks that I have just mentioned.

The enemies of Philippine freedom will campaign energetically for the rejection of this Constitution. It is their fervent hope to recreate the conditions of uncertainty and instability in which their evil designs can prosper. It is their burning desire, with the rejection of this Constitution, to create a power vacuum so that the forces of evil can rush again into our lives, destroy our hopes, and again degrade our nation. By recreating conditions of instability and anarchy they wish to convince our people again that democracy is too much for them to handle, that the rule of law is too complicated to work, that they are better off submitting themselves again to the iron authority of force rather than enjoying the difficult but dignifying blessings of democracy.

We shall not let them.

We begin today not only a campaign for the ratification of this Constitution, but the greater campaign for the permanent victory of democracy which is the only foundation of Filipino progress. This is a campaign to hold and preserve what we gained by our Glorious Revolution, and to extend them to every aspect of our lives and every corner of our country. It is a crusade for Filipino pride and freedom and a progressive future under God.

We are soldiers of freedom, fighting still another campaign to consolidate our victory. And we are battle-tested soldiers I might add and proudly bearing the honors of recent victories. But even if we succeed, as I know we will, it will not be the last. There will be others after it. There will be the campaign for recovery from the havoc and ruin wreaked by the enemies of freedom in the past, the same they are trying to impose on us in the future. And the campaign to translate the tremendous potential of the Filipino into progress and prosperity.

The Filipino people gave me the commission to lead them on a six-year campaign to full and permanent democracy and progress. And so I shall until the final victory of all our aims. To our people, I say, March on to the future. God and the strength of our resolve and the tenacity of our courage will clear the way.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Convention of Surgeons

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Convention of Surgeons

CONTRIBUTE YOUR SKILLS

President Aquino calls on surgeons to contribute their specialized skills to promote the health of the people. She encourages them to spend a month in the countryside to train the surgeons in the field, evaluate the facilities and treat patients themselves.

This is an audience blessed with privilege, economic resources, education, the power to influence, and the power to contribute significantly to national progress. Therefore, in answer to the question, What can government do for your organization and your profession? I say we can get you involved in nation-building. And there are a great many ways you can contribute to that effort.

The job of government, the task of the nation's leadership, is clear. The creation of just social structures and the nurturing of an environment where the barriers of ignorance and alienation are dissolved and the full potential of the Filipino to contribute to his own well-being and the progress of the nation can be realized.

Let me describe to you a specific way you can contribute to national reconstruction.

My Minister of Health, Dr. Alran Bengzon, has more than once told me that in the course of his travels throughout our country he has discovered many good people in government.

He tells the story of a health officer he met in Region 10. That health officer was serving six towns in heavily infested NPA country.

He had apparently only the most minimal training in the art, but he was performing operations that only a highly trained surgeon should be allowed to do. Dr. Bengzon asked him for an explanation. The man answered that there was no one else around to do the work. This doctor was born with a good head and good hands; it was clear at any rate that he had a good heart. He had just never received the training that would have brought out his full potential.

There are many such people in the Ministry of Health.

I look at this audience and I am reminded of this doctor from Northern Mindanao.

This is the challenge I throw to you: Spend a month in the periphery of our country, out in the countryside where the need is greatest for medical care. Let me get specific. We need 12 good men and women among you who are willing to spend a month in a district hospital.

There you can train the hospital's surgeon, evaluate the facilities, and yourselves treat the members of the community.

The discovery of people outside our private worlds leads to self-discovery. We know more about ourselves, and how best we can use ourselves, by discovering others and how they live and work. Action begins with awareness. Know your people in their actual living conditions. To know is to be committed to their improvement.

There is pressing need to offer specialized services to a broader and different public than you are accustomed to treating. This will entail a great deal of sacrifice. It will involve a lot of hardship; life out there is not easy. But your efforts to spread the benefits of your specialized skills and long training can contribute to a climate of caring; an environment conducive to the peace and prosperity for which we long.

I hope that you, young surgeons, will remain here in our country, in the service of our people. There is no question that you will be better paid if you practice abroad, but there is something to be said about a sense of fulfillment and pride in helping your country.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the ADB Women's Club

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the ADB Women's Club

[Delivered on November 30, 1986]

THE WORTH OF WOMEN

President Aquino acknowledges her country's gratitude to the Asian Development Bank (ADB) which was the first to cast a clear vote of confidence for the country and to the ADB Women's Club which perhaps influenced that decision.

She says that she is bent on proving male chauvinists wrong by showing that a woman can rule the Philippines effectively.

If it is true that behind every successful man, and every major decision a successful man makes, there is a woman, then our country owes much to the ADB Women's Club. We will always remember that the Asian Development Bank was the first international lending institution to cast a clear vote of confidence for our fledgling government. The loan extended by the ADB to our country earlier this year, as well as the continued construction of the ADB Headquarters, was not only a signal to others to invest in the Philippines, it was an encouragement to all Filipinos as well.

I am pleased and rather flattered that the decision-makers in the ADB, who are predominantly men, chose to place their trust in a country led for the first time by a woman, and one that was a housewife at that. Perhaps I had a little help from their wives. For we women know what we are capable of. It has often been said that Marcos was the first male chauvinist to underestimate me. He was not the last to pay for that mistake.

One distinct quality I have observed in the men who would discount my abilities, diminish my role, or who cannot bring themselves to imagine that I shall rule this country for the entire term of a presidency, is their ability to out-talk me at every opportunity.

Take the old dictator. He out-talked me on all television channels, on all radio stations, in every crony newspaper and magazine in every city and province throughout our country. And his speeches, unlike mine, were always longer and more verbose.

And then lately, and I know you must have been aware of this, for they have said mouthfuls on TV talk shows, conventions, radio, print, and bullhorns in public places, there have arisen a crop of garrulous men with better and brighter ideas on how to run my government or what I should do with myself. And again their addresses have been longer, wordier, and delivered with more dramatic inflections, better-placed pauses, more body English than I could ever manage on a rostrum. For those who love to hear themselves talk do work hard at it.

But after all is said and done, or should I say, said and undone, I would like to think that I have managed to have the last word, and the last task of having to put things back in order after these men were finished.

All the bright people in this country, as well as those abroad who followed events here, had lists of those who might succeed Marcos. I was never on any of the lists. And I might add, it is not I who has been consigned to the bedroom of history.

As we women know, we have our own timing, our own ways, and our own worth. And that is why I say that our country owes much to you, and will continue to rely on your support. I speak not only of the civic projects that your association so generously and zealously finances and organizes, but also the help you extend to the country through your men in the ADB. And so I say, more power to you. And may we women continue to stick together in making this country a better place to live in for ourselves, our men, and our children.

REORGANIZING THE CABINET

Aquilino Pimentel is appointed Adviser on National Affairs. Jaime Ferrer is named Minister for Local Governments.

As I announced last week, the process of renewal of our Government shall be a continuing one in keeping with our desire to forge a government sensitive to national concerns and truly responsive to the needs of the people.

I have always valued the counsel of Minister Aquilino Pimentel, which was invaluable throughout the period of our struggle for justice and freedom. He was one of the chief architects of the People's Victory in the last election. And he has proved himself a devoted servant of the people, ever vigilant for their rights and liberties. I have therefore appointed him to be my Adviser on National Affairs, with the rank of Cabinet Minister, to help me discharge my responsibilities to the vast constituency of our nation. Mr. Jaime Ferrer will replace him as Minister for Local Governments. Jimmy Ferrer is known to all of us for his great rectitude, his fearless stand against dictatorship, his staunch protection for the integrity of the democratic process. He brings his probity, patriotism, acumen, and long experience in government to the Ministry of Local Governments.

Other changes will be announced by me shortly, as I conclude my consultations with the affected sectors.

Let me say at this point that even as we make these changes in government, the burden of making our new democracy work still rests on all of us, on government and the people, for the task of reconstruction and progress requires no less a truly national effort.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Mother's Day, December 5, 1986

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Mother's Day

[Released on December 5, 1986]

A MOTHER'S DEED

President Aquino cites her complementary roles as mother and President. She advises mothers on ways to bring up their children to become responsible, industrious and moral citizens.

Thank you for this honor. I have received many awards and citations this past year, but this is special. For before I became President, I was a wife first and a mother. When I lost my husband, motherhood was the role left me that gave my life most meaning and direction.

I am your President now, but I have not stopped being a mother, and I never will, for I am responsible to God for my children. It is my duty to ensure that in their thoughts, actions and Faith, they remain His children first.

What has changed, now that I have taken over the highest office in the land, is that I feel my brood has increased. For I now feel responsible for the entire family of Filipinos. I have been placed in a position of authority and leadership, and I know I am looked up to for guidance and encouragement, for discipline and direction, for hope and strength. My attitudes and actions, whether on a spiritual, moral, political or personal level are no longer exclusively my own.

If I had been an ordinary person, I would have confronted immediately the repeated challenges hurled at me, for my patience is not as long as people credit me for. But I no longer belong to myself. I cannot indulge my temper without considering its effect on the lives of my people. I belong to all Filipinos who gave greatly of themselves to put me in office, so as to give life to their aspirations and dreams.

In the midst of such pressure, I find comfort still. For God is always there, giving me the strength to bear it.

But still I need your help and support. I speak specially to all Filipinos who, like myself, have children to raise, protect and guide. We must always remember the great importance, the sacredness even, of our God-given roles. We are responsible for the new generations of Filipinos that we have brought into this world. It is left to us to mold the values and beliefs and actions of those who will assume, or determine, the leadership of this nation after we are gone.

It is the amount of love and attention, teaching and discipline that we give our young ones, that will decide if this country will enter a new age of enlightenment and peace or plunge again into darkness and violence. As the wisdom of Solomon tells us: "Train a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not turn from it."

Let us complete what we have started in this present age of renewal and transformation, through our children.

Let us teach them the value of respect: respect for themselves, for their parents, for all legitimate authority and the laws of the land, for the laws and teachings given to all countries and generations by a just and loving God.

Let us teach them the value of industry and perseverance, the connection between their ambitions and desires and the work of their minds and hands. Let us not allow them to stand on the sidelines, but urge them to involve themselves in situations where they might improve their lives and those of others.

Let us teach them the necessity for discipline and restraint, that the actions and excesses of the few will produce a harmful consequence on the many; that time, resources and opportunities are precious and should never be squandered.

Let us give them a sense of morality and decency; a concern and regard for those who have less in life and a desire to correct the inequity of this condition. Let us imbue them with a sense of the dignity of all Filipinos regardless of social status, profession or appearance.

Let us teach them to believe that the ways of peace are best, but the surrender of principles is always ignoble and to be avoided at all cost. That the way of democracy, though not without its flaws, is the best, most humane, and most enlightened system of government yet devised by men. And that we should accept no other form of government whatever the price to be paid.

Let us teach our children to recognize what is of real value: that a stable and tranquil land, a society where all people work, achieve, learn and share; that a home where love prevails, are the things that are priceless and lasting. And that for these things and their preservation, we must not shirk from making the last sacrifice; remembering the words of the woman of Sparta as her son went off to the wars: Return with your shield, my son, or on it.

Let us all, as mothers, be worthy of our children by giving them a sense of their worth. And as citizens, let us deserve our God-given mandate to start anew and restore our land, by breeding citizens worthy of the dream.

Huwag sana nating pababayaan ang ating mga anak. Sila'y hindi lamang kayamanan natin, ngunit kayamanan din ng ating Bayan.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Voter's Registration, December 8, 1986 Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Voter's Registration

[Released on December 8, 1986]

GO OUT AND REGISTER!

1987 will be a crucial year. The draft Constitution will be submitted to the Filipino people for ratification, followed by national and local elections. The President urges the people to go out and register, because the old voters' list cannot serve the purpose of democratic elections. At this time, registration is the highest act of patriotism.

The whole point of the recent heroic and triumphant struggle of the Filipino people was to restore democracy. And the whole point of a democracy is to give effective expression to the voice of the People, the Sovereign Will. That voice finds its most important means of expression in the ballot. The people have a host of other rights and liberties to make their influence felt in the government of their country. There is the freedom of expression, the right to assemble and petition the government for redress of grievances. But all these rights and liberties come to a head in the right to vote for the officials of their choice. The ballot is the most powerful instrument of the Sovereign Will to dictate the future of the nation. This is why I have taken great pains to restore to the highest effectiveness to these instruments for the expression of the popular will. We have revamped the Commission on Elections and appointed to its positions men of the highest rectitude and patriotism. Now we are calling for a new registration of voters. The old voters lists are hopelessly tainted. You have read about ghost registrations, ghost precincts, double-triple registrations. The old voters' list cannot serve the purpose of democratic elections. Least of all can they serve the august purpose of ratifying the new Constitution of the Filipino people, the document that provides the framework for the exercise of our democratic rights. I have therefore ordered a new registration of voters to be held on four dates:

December 6, December 7, December 13 and December 14.

It is crucial to your role as a citizen of a free republic to register yourselves on any of these dates. If you fail, you will be disenfranchised, you will not be able to vote, on issues or for public officials in the referendum for the ratification of the Constitution or in the coming local and national elections. In fact, until another registration is called, you will not be able to vote perhaps for the next six years.

I urge you therefore to go out and register, so that your citizenship in this Republic whose freedom you helped restore can be truly meaningful. I urge you also to go out and urge your friends and neighbors to do likewise. This coming registration is more important to you than any election. It is higher than partisan politics, for it determines how much of the nation will have the right to take part in partisan politics. All Filipinos should desire and work for as complete and accurate a registration of voters as possible, regardless of their political beliefs and preferences. The only ones who will not be interested in it will be those who do not believe that the fate of our nation should be decided by the people but rather by force. I know we are united against such people and their designs.

More than the coming elections, and in a sense more than the coming referendum, it is important that you go out and register, and urge and help others to register also. As in the past election, monitor the process. The best guarantee of the integrity of the voters' list in your area is your vigilance during the registration to make sure that those who do not belong to that list are excluded. Everyone should share in this vigilance, even, and especially, the youth. To the youth, I say, tell your parents to register. And we parents must show that we care enough for our children to want to have a hand in shaping it. And we can do this by registering ourselves as voters.

People Power restored democracy in our land. People Power remains our surest guarantee of enduring freedom and the primacy of the popular will. I have heard people say that there must be a way to make this power of the people a permanent part of our political life. Here is the means to do it. The accurate and complete registration of all Filipinos entitled under the Constitution to vote is the institutionalization of People Power. The voters' list is the sacred text of the people's will, from which, from time to time, in referenda and elections, we shall be able to read the direction that the Sovereign People wish their governments to take.

At this time, registration is the highest act and most signal proof of patriotism. Go out and register. Go out among your friends and neighbors and urge them to join you in registering and in assuring the integrity of the registration.

Once more, my people, the fate of the nation is in your hands.

Welcome Address of President Corazon Aquino on privatizing public corporations, December 9, 1986

Welcome Address
of
Her Excellency Corazon Aquino
President of the Philippines
On privatizing public corporations

[Delivered to the Philippine Opportunities for Entrepreneurs and Investors, December 9, 1986]

PRIVATIZING PUBLIC CORPORATIONS

The President reiterates her commitment to strengthen free enterprise. She promises not to commit the previous administration's mistake of practically running the economy. Her government is determined to dispose of non-performing assets and to hand the engine of the economy back to the private sector. She is convinced that that will lead to greater efficiency, productivity and private-sector cooperation.

I warmly welcome all of you to Phoenix, the acronym for "Philippine Opportunities for Entrepreneurs and Investors, '86."

The purpose of this conference is to open before you the path we have prepared for the privatization of government-owned and controlled corporations.

It has been said that the Philippines is merely paying lip service to privatization, with no real intention of implementing it. This conference is the first in a series aimed at providing the necessary vehicles for both buyers and sellers of government business assets and investments.

I am aware that business has wanted stability, coherence and predictability from Day One of my administration. So have we. Many forces however have been at work to prevent us from achieving this.

There are still those who up to now continue to play politics to the detriment of the vast majority of our countrymen who simply want to work and live in peace.

From the start these people had predicted we would not last beyond a few weeks. My predecessor, for instance, dogmatically asserted last April that in a month's time the government would have fallen. The timetable has kept changing since but the mischief remains. Here I am, on my tenth month in office, determined as ever to serve out to the full the term of my contract with my people.

There is a sense of self-fulfilling prophecy which we must resist vigorously,

I am continuing to carry out my part of the bargain. Many of those who supported me came from your ranks, especially, as I had opened my campaign with a pledge to restore to private business the role of being the engine of the economy. Will you now carry out your part?

As of today, four of my original Ministers have been replaced in a manner consistent with my policy of forbearance. They had all helped considerably to bring down the dictatorship. It is possible that there will be more announcements in the coming days as we subject everything to continuing review. We are naturally concerned that if more changes are made, they will be for the better. Therefore we cannot be too careful in studying and selecting replacements.

We are committed to free enterprise, tempered by the need to see to it that policies do not reflect only the interests of the rich and powerful in our society, but rather that of the nation as a whole.

I created yesterday a body which will take care of disposing of the so-called non-performing assets.

The sale of government corporations is both a necessary measure to alleviate the very heavy strain on the national budget and an imperative of national economic growth and development based on the private sector.

We learned during the Marcos years the bitter lessons of government monopolies, profligate spending, and state intervention and control of business operations and market forces better left in the hands of business. We have learned, and are paying the price of the lesson, that possession of unchallenged economic power deadens initiative, discourages thrift, and depresses energy; that immunity from competition is a narcotic, and rivalry is a stimulant, to individual progress. That the spur of constant stress is necessary to counteract the natural tendency to let well enough alone.

This conference presents the various investment possibilities we are offering to investors. They present a wide range of industries: from shipbuilding to processed foods; from oil refining to hotels and tourist operations. And as we commit to sell, we likewise pledge not to compete with the private sector in these businesses which properly belong to them.

We welcome foreign investments in areas where local investments have proved inadequate for meaningful development. We offer a climate of free enterprise, with a minimum of state regulation and protection. I said it before, we offer an environment where there are no fears and no favors; where some direct correlation is maintained between the growth and prosperity of a business and the amount of energy, pluck, intelligence, and personal investment that are put into it.

But we enthusiastically encourage and prefer investment partnerships with our local capital, because this is where the best prospect lies for long-term and healthy relationships between foreign enterprises and the domestic economy.

The true value of the assets that we offer are not in the balance sheets and the appraisal reports of the corporations on sale, for these reflect the tragic past of profligacy and incompetence on which we have resolutely turned our backs. Rather their true value is found in the hearts and minds of a people who have recovered the will to achieve and the spirit of sacrifice that are essential to the success of any enterprise.

Do not wait until conditions are ideal. To the fainthearted they will never be, and you will always come across them. For a true businessman, a risk is an opportunity.

Come and join us then in this new miracle of economic recovery and progress. Like the miracle of freedom you witnessed, this too will come through our united efforts.

Jobs and justice, food and freedom, to use the words of Senator Diokno, are our agenda. They are the components of that progress we hope to achieve and from which we can all benefit.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at a prayer breakfast at the Philippine Plaza, December 11, 1986

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At a Prayer Breakfast

[Held at the Philippine Plaza, December 11, 1986]

THANKS BE TO GOD

The President proclaims her faith in the Almighty, thanking Him for the help and guidance He has bestowed upon her and the Filipino nation.

In the past months, in times of danger and crisis, we have prayed for our Lord's mercy, intervention, blessing and grace. Despite our failings, He has always answered. As the Prophets would marvel: The Lord's loving kindnesses indeed never cease; His compassions never fail; they are new every morning. . .

I would like to take this opportunity therefore, to thank our Lord Jesus Christ, who is our saviour and our strength, our guide and the true leader of our nation. His compassions, throughout our bondage, our struggle, our attainment of freedom, and our battle to keep and give it meaning, have been new every morning. As we suffered, He called to us: Come to me, all of you who are heavily laden, and I will give you rest. And we found inner peace through our new resolve, and marched away from slavery with the enemy on every side; He assured us that if He was with us, no one could prevail against us. And now, as we work and aspire, as we grope for answers and reach for our goals, as we battle the enemy without – and within ourselves – the promise is there unwavering: Seek ye first His kingdom and righteousness, and all things will be added unto you.

And even in our uncertain seeking, He assures us that those who are earnest in their search shall find, and doors shall be opened; for where we are weak, He is strong.

And so, again and again, may we thank Christ our Lord.

We thank him for being there when we called in our distress.

We thank Him for holding us up when we were tired or faltered.

We thank Him for reaching out and snatching us from the edge of the precipice and setting us down in triumph and freedom.

We thank Him for His mercy on Filipinos.

And we thank Him for the opportunity to gather together in prayer this morning; and for the pleasure of His company. For Christ has promised that wherever two or three are gathered in His name, there will He be also.

Let us take this opportunity to count our blessings, even as we dare to ask for more. But let us never forget to Whom the credit should go. And in Whom we should trust.

As Paul the Apostle wrote to the proud Corinthians: But God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise, as He chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong . . . so that no one may boast before Him. For it is from God alone that we have life through Christ Jesus who made us acceptable to God . . . Therefore, as it is written: Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord.

May we therefore take pride this morning in the greatness of our God, the God of our Victory and our Freedom. I know we each carry our burdens and face our individual trials as we work for the renewal of our land and our people. But we might take heart in these lines from a contemporary song of praise written to describe Christ, our Lord and Honored Guest of this morning's gathering: If He carried the weight of the world upon His shoulders, I know, dear brothers and sisters, that He will carry you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Armed Forces, December 14, 1986

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Armed Forces

[Delivered at Camp Aquino, Tarlac, December 14, 1986]

THE PATH OF PEACE

As commander-in-chief, President Aquino commends the Armed Forces for their steadfastness in pursuing the cause of peace in the midst of provocation.

I am pleased to be here in this camp whose name honors an illustrious forebear and Filipino patriot. General Servillano Aquino foreshadowed the brave and tenacious Filipino soldier who stood fast by the flag and the republic – loyal to duty to the end. His career exemplified the martial virtues that will protect our new democracy in the challenging times ahead.

Courage, loyalty, a democratic faith, an unflagging vigilance for the rights, liberties, and safety of our people, an earnest desire for peace and a keen preparedness for war – these virtues will stand us in good stead in the weeks and months ahead. They are virtues already apparent in the New Armed Forces, which has shared my patience under provocation and my abiding faith that the path of peace we have taken only yield us good.

In this period of ceasefire, we have reposed great faith in your discretion and expressed the highest confidence that the New Armed Forces will know how to act. We have not been disappointed.

Equally, we are pleased that the work of reforming the Armed Forces, of honing the sword of the nation, has achieved much progress. Our confidence that the peace initiative will yield us good and no harm rests on the insurance of military reform. Our resolve to see the peace initiative through was strengthened by the promise of Minister Ileta. He said, on the eve of the ceasefire, that the military leadership would see to it that the sword unsheath would stay sharp and shining in its scabbard. Sharp with the willingness to sacrifice, and shining with commitment to protect democracy against its natural enemies.

With unquestioned strength and the lightness of our cause, the cause of freedom and peace, success can only crown our efforts. And no small measure of the credit and honor will go to the Armed Forces when an honorable and enduring peace finally reigns in our land.

As the day of the birth of the Prince of Peace draws near, it is fitting that I should make my first statement, in this week of Christmas, here among soldiers. For no one loves peace more than the soldier, who is always the first to suffer its loss. In this season of peace therefore, let us savor and thank the Lord for its blessings. Let me wish you and your families at least the humble but inestimable joys of this season: the joy of reunion, the joy of sharing a happy and holy event with your loved ones, and the joy of faith renewed in God's providential care that right shall win in the end and that our prayers for lasting peace will be answered. Merry Christmas to you all.

Message of President Corazon Aquino on Christmas Day, December 25, 1986

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Christmas Day

[Delivered at the Malacañang Palace, December 25, 1986]

A CHRISTMAS MESSAGE

President Aquino enjoins the Filipino nation to unite as one family committed to brotherhood, freedom and peace.

For the first time in 14 years, we celebrate Christmas, in freedom. We celebrate it also with greater pride than we have known. For, in the triumph of democracy and the vindication of non-violence, we have prepared the fittest offering to the Prince of Peace whose birth we celebrate.

This season of Advent is also marked by a better prospect of an enduring peace than we have known in many years.

Christmas is a time to forget ourselves in the joys of the family. And this Christmas, thanks to the Revolution that brought us freedom, and the freedom that now promises us peace, all Filipinos can indeed become one family.

Our men in uniform, our brothers and sisters from the hills, have laid aside their guns for as long as it is possible. Those of us who have more, in material things, in skills and education, are learning to give from their hearts to those who have less. Those who were indifferent to the welfare of the nation are joining hands, as we did at EDSA, to protect our freedom and to move the nation forward. The beginning has been difficult, but we are on our way.

Those who have not yet joined: those who harbor anger and hate; those who refuse to have hope in the future we offer; those who remain indifferent or cynical of all our efforts — I ask you, in the spirit of this first Christmas in pride and freedom, to forgive and forget, to give democracy a chance to work, and peace the help to endure.

Years ago, Jesus Christ, our King and Saviour, came to join the family of men and give them peace, forgiveness and life. How can we, who are so much less, choose to give less of ourselves? Let us take to heart his earnest message: Let us love one another as He loved us. Maligayang Pasko sa inyong lahat. Tayo ay magmahalan, magkaisang-puso, at mamuhay ng mapayapa.

OUR SOURCE OF STRENGTH

FAMILY:

President Aquino shares her thoughts as head of two families: her own and the nation. If every family can be strong, she says, so too will the country be. She, therefore encourages Filipino families to internalize the case values of Faith, Truth and Justice, to lead simple lives, to commit themselves to peace, and to get involved in political life.

May I congratulate the seven family organizations for having formed this cause-oriented alliance, Families for Justice and Peace. May I also commend you for the successful effort to include family rights in the draft of our fundamental law.

Next to our faith in Christ, our family-oriented culture may be our greatest strength as a nation. But it is a strength that can also be a weakness. Family-centeredness can also mean clannishness, or an almost exclusive preoccupation with one's own family, selected relatives and friends. This is why the aim of your alliance offers a challenging breakthrough. For you see through to the deeper and broader meaning of family – and that is our country which shelters the family. As the unity and strength of the family strengthens the nation, so does the progress of the nation strengthen the family. And beyond the nation there is the family of nations, and the vision of the brotherhood of man which is the family's greatest fulfillment.

The family holds the secret of national power. Its unity prefigures the national strength that will meet any threat, overcome any obstacle, and achieve the worthiest goals. As Ecclesiastes wisely put it: Two are better than one . . . For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow . . . And if a man prevail against him that is alone, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken.

I will always cherish those moments of family togetherness that my late husband, our children and I enjoyed in Boston, our last home away from home. But somehow, I knew even then that it could not last. Ninoy, and then later I, had to come home to fulfill our obligations to a bigger family, the family of all Filipinos seeking freedom. And now I know and have come to accept what it means to be a "couple-for-others" in loving and serving our people.

Though Ninoy is no longer by my side, the urgency and necessity of the mission we embarked on together has given me the courage to embrace the responsibilities of the Presidency. And here, I believe, the Aquinos are not alone. This is God's mission too, for every Filipino couple and family.

I must confess that there are times when I long to just stay at home and be with my children and grandson. But I have to remind myself that I must divide my attention among a much larger brood. And, as it should be in any household, the head of the home must have the help and cooperation of the other members.

I therefore call upon all Filipino families to join in the formidable, but greatly rewarding task of nation-building.

The first phase of this task is the reformation of our values as a people. And where else must this begin but in the heart of the nation, the families that are its constitutive elements.

Our children are the future of our country. We must patiently and persistently instill and nurture the right core values in their hearts and minds, for, as I have said, the nation can only be as strong as the families that make it up.

What are these core values that are so crucial to the nation and that must first be found in our homes?

First and foremost is Faith. The family that does not center its life on God becomes a self-centered and self-serving family. But the family that turns inwards to God will find itself in the wider solidarity of God's family. It is this faith that gave us the courage to work the miracle of our liberation. This faith that enabled us to overcome the greatest crisis in our nation's history will help us overcome the other obstacles that are set in our path.

What we now need to do is ensure that this faith is real, that it translates into action, so that we can close the gap between the profession and the practice of our faith.

The second core value that should flow from our Faith is an uncompromising commitment to Truth. Personal honesty and integrity are essential elements of reconstruction. Without these values, we build our fortunes, as did the previous regime, on sand. Most specifically, let us not make the security and future of the members of our families the motive and justification for corruption and greed. For our legacy to our children should not be measured by the size of our bank accounts and the height of the position we have attained in society, but the size of the space we make for them in our hearts, and the loftiness of the values and ideals we espouse.

A third core value that we must instill in our children is a deep yearning for and a keen sense of justice. And we can do this best by taking it upon ourselves to right the wrongs before us. I speak of the social injustice in the world, the gross and shameful inequalities between the minority who are rich and powerful, and the majority who are poor and powerless. This condition cannot continue. We are merely stewards, however talented or enterprising we or our parents were. We are answerable to the Creator for the resources that have fallen into our hands, that all may share in their bounty.

Related to this issue is the need for simplicity in our family lifestyles. Self-indulgence and extravagance are the hallmarks of tyranny, not of the republican state we are. Luxury distracts us from the civic virtues we must cultivate to assure the survival of democracy.

A fourth core value upon which we must build our homes is a commitment to the ways of peace as the first, and if possible, last means of resolving conflict. Only as a last resort, and only to defend the ways and values of peace and democracy, should we resort to force to protect them. God showed the way at EDSA. Even the most irreconcilable differences one could imagine between tyranny and freedom could be bridged by compassion and fraternity.

The last, but not the least core value that I urge all Filipino families to commit themselves to is an active involvement in our political life. Again the way was showed in the Election and Revolution of February. It was families that guarded the polls, that took to the streets to protest the theft of the elections, that formed a human barricade to protect a military revolt and our new-born democracy.

It was the Holy Family, whose Feast we celebrate today, who lived up most beautifully to the core values whereof we speak. Their whole lives were centered on loving and obeying the commands of God, their Father. They lived justly and simply, preferring to accumulate a spiritual wealth in heaven to laying up treasures on earth. It was the only Child of that family that laid down his life, for the family of man and the cause of peace.

Let us therefore strive to be worthy members of this larger family for which the Lord laid down His Life. As He tells us in Matthew: "Whoever does the will of my heavenly Father is brother and sister and mother to me."

May Christ bless your Family Alliance so that it may succeed in all its endeavors.

Binabati ko kayong lahat ng isang makabayang bagong taon!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Rizal Day, December 30, 1986

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Rizal Day

RIZAL'S DREAM REALIZED

Dr. Jose Rizal, the first man to implant in our national tradition the ideals of reconciliation, believed that freedom is won not through the sword but through the people making themselves worthy of it. He died without seeing this vision come to pass. Today, the Filipinos are at last ready to prove Rizal right as we begin to implement his dream of a self-willed society propelled only by a vision of the good and not by the prodding of the lash.

Let me begin by quoting these lines, spoken by Father Florentino in Rizal's novel, El Filibusterismo:

"I do not mean to say that our liberty will be secured at the sword's point, for the sword plays but little part in modern affairs, but that we must secure it by making ourselves worthy of it, by exalting the intelligence and dignity of the individual, by loving justice, right and greatness, even to the extent of dying for them . . . and when a people reaches that height, God will provide the weapon, the idols will be shattered, tyranny will crumble like a house of cards and liberty will shine out like the first dawn."

Father Florentino was wrong to discount the role of the sword in the affairs of the world, speaking as he did on the threshold of this tragic age. Even when Rizal wrote these words, the sword had already been drawn. And in a few years it would be raised to catch on its gleaming edge the first light of the dawn that look his life. But he was right that our age would be marked by a greater commitment to justice and reason, dignity and freedom than any previous age had ever known.

Still, with a premonition of the violence inherent in the order of the world, Rizal persisted in believing that freedom must be won through peace and reason. He held fast to this belief through persecution, exile, and finally imprisonment and death.

Rizal died, but not his dream. To quote another friend of Filipino freedom: The work goes on, the cause endures, hope still lives, and the dream shall never die.

The dream of freedom through peace and reason did not die with Rizal, nor with the many Filipinos who shared his convictions and his fate, all the way up to the last one three years ago whose death presaged and hastened the dawn of true dignity and freedom.

As in Rizal's time, prolonged tyranny and repression had polarized the forces of society. Again, as the men of peace among us watched with dread, a bloodbath seemed the imminent and only solution. Again, a series of martyrdoms, culminating in the execution of a crusader for peace brought the drama to its end. But at last it was the finale Rizal had wanted. As Filipinos stood as one to proclaim their love of freedom and justice, God himself provided the weapon. The idols, garbed in luxury and power, were shattered, and tyranny fell as harmlessly as a house of cards.

And so today, we pause to remember and to honor the first major sacrifice on the national altar of peace. Doctor Jose Rizal, by the ideals of reconciliation he implanted in our national tradition, also deserves credit for the success of our last Revolution. His founding philosophy, as with all foundations, is buried beneath where it cannot be seen. But it is because it is a foundation that we are able to stand securely upon it as we rebuild our nation from the ground upwards. And even if we should sometime in the future stand poised and tense, ready to draw the sword, Rizal leaves us with a reminder of the broader perspective. Perhaps what he really meant by the words of Father Florentino was that in the last analysis “the sword plays but little part in modern affairs.” True liberty is best and permanently secured “by making ourselves worthy of it.” We cannot hold our society together by the force of laws if these laws are an imposition and not an extension of our spirit. Nor can any President in a democracy rule effectively simply by command, unless the authority behind it is that of a self-determining and believing people.

When Rizal wrote his last farewell to the country he loved, that country was not fully ready to implement his dream of a self-willed society propelled only by a vision of the good and not by the prodding of the lash. Today, perhaps, we are ready. By looking back to Rizal, a hero ahead of his time, we find a comforting continuity to our national purpose, and the impetus to work forward to a nation worthy of his dream.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Philippine-Japan Friendship Society, January 16, 1987

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Philippine-Japan Friendship Society

[Held at Manila Hotel, January 16, 1987]

NURTURING A FRIENDSHIP

Japan serves both as an inspiration and example to the Filipino people not only because of its economic progress and military might but also because it has demonstrated what a nation can achieve through hard work, courage, and pride in ones culture and heritage.

President Aquino describes Filipino-Japanese friendship as one that is geopolitical, socio-economic, and personal. It can be as intimate as the one between her husband Ninoy and his Japanese friends; it can be the supportive relationship between neighboring countries with a common goal of preserving democracy in their region; it can also be a learning relationship between a more developed country and a struggling one. She gives credit to the Philippine-Japan Friendship Society for keeping that friendship alive.

Through the years, despite profound differences in culture, climate, and our historical relationship, including our tragic encounter in the last war, Filipinos have sought to reach out in friendship to the Japanese, and the Japanese to Filipinos.

Ambassador Jose Laurel III, the President of the Philippines-Japan Society observes that in 1898, our national hero Jose Rizal visited Japan and predicted that close contact and fruitful cooperation might be forged between the land of the setting and that of the rising sun. Laurel notes that initial overtures of friendship were made to the Japanese by General Emilio Aguinaldo in the same year. For Japan, besting the West at its own game of economic progress and military might, had become an inspiration to Asian peoples seeking dignity and independence.

I personally can attest to the depth of friendship and understanding that is possible between Japanese and Filipinos. My husband, Ninoy, in the last years of his life, was cut off from his country and alienated from his countrymen by the terror inspired by a tyrannical government. Yet he found hospitable reception and a warm and unguarded welcome in the homes of the Japanese. Though he stood outside the mainstream of Philippine-Japan diplomacy and politics, he was not treated as an outcast, but rather as one who embodied an aspect of the Filipino spirit and stood for its aspiration for freedom. My husband, in turn, saw in Japanese traditions of honor and courage the prophecy of his fate. And when he gave his life in willing sacrifice, the Japanese took his memory into their hearts with some of the fierce devotion they have shown their own heroes.

The sincerity of this friendship of the Japanese and Ninoy was best demonstrated to me right after Ninoy's death. I, and for that matter, the Filipino people, got our first comprehensive account of the assassination from Japanese media. The painstakingly thorough investigation by Japanese television was not merely excellent reportage. It was a caring and sympathetic gesture by friends outraged by Ninoy's murder.

Of course, the warmest display of friendship I have yet experienced from the Japanese was during my state visit last November. I felt as affectionately and enthusiastically received in Tokyo as I was in our key cities during the campaign. And at Waseda University I got a delightful and unexpected re-experience of people power. I, of course, do not just share such a personal statement as a haiku with just anyone. Yet I found a strong desire to share my poetry with the Japanese people, in the person of their Emperor. And, of course, when I met him, I found not a symbol of a country, but a caring and sensitive person I would wish to keep always as a friend.

After my visit to Japan, I was convinced that the friendship between Japanese and Filipinos thrives on several levels. It is geopolitical; it is socio-economic; and it is also personal. It can be as intimate and relaxed as it was between Ninoy and his Japanese contacts, who later became my very supportive friends. It can be regionally significant: a supportive relationship between two democratic societies working to preserve freedom in Asia. The strategic locations of our two countries makes us each other's defenders, protectors and economic allies. The friendship can also be an earnest and nurturing one: between an elder and developed civilization and a young and growing country.

In fact, we recognize that Japan is to us a "Sensei" — a teacher and inspiration to a struggling country such as ours. The Japanese have demonstrated to us what we can become by working hard, taking pride in our culture and identity, and believing we can be the equal of any nation. From the Japanese code of courage, we applied to ourselves the dictum that success or, at any rate, nobility, crowns the gesture of throwing caution to the winds and advancing fearlessly towards our goal. In our case, the goal of freedom.

In turn, I would like to think that the Japanese, witnessing this living out on a national scale of the code that animated their heroes, will be inspired to a renewed commitment to the virtues that bind us now: courage, a sense of community in the face of danger, a sense of fraternity in the pursuit of a common and noble goal.

Friendships, I find, either grow stale and cold through the years, or acquire depth and nuance with the passage of time. I believe the bond between Filipinos and Japanese shows signs of being the latter. We have transcended and forgotten the transgressions of war. We have kept our ties despite the political and economic strains of recent years. We are becoming less two races apart, and more two nations sharing a commitment to peace and freedom in Asia.

The Philippines-Japan Society deserves a good part of the credit for sustaining this bond through thick and thin, all these years. State visits, such as what we Presidents make, are too complicated a device to use too often. The friendship between our countries is best maintained by organizations such as yours, and by the individuals you honor today. You have helped to bring two peoples, already closely intertwined by history and geography, even closer together. This you have done by forging the day-to-day contacts, pursuing civic, educational and cultural projects that make ours the down-to-earth relationship that is the essence of a mutually enriching friendship.

Keep up the good work.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on working towards full democracy, January 16, 1987

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On working towards full democracy

[Delivered on January 16, 1987]

WORKING FULL DEMOCRACY

TOWARDS

After 300 days, the Aquino administration gets a new mandate to continue its task of restoring democracy with the ratification of the 1986 Constitution, which not only provides the bases for democracy but also the measures to preserve it. The charter strives for peace and unity with the cultural minorities in Mindanao and the Cordilleras; for the Communist insurgents, it has prepared programs for their assimilation into democratic society.

Labor and private enterprise are given a boost through the Community and Employment Development Program, while lower prices for input and infrastructure support provides for agricultural development.

Education and social services, long neglected but which now enjoy high priority, have been given the means to contribute to the task of national reconstruction through increased budgets.

In the First 100 days, I reported to you the gains of the Revolution. Now more than 300 days have passed since the victory of the people and my assumption to power. Another report is in order.

I have been going around the country campaigning for the new Constitution that I promised would be ready within last year so that we should have a full blown democracy in the new year.

I said that democracy is safe with the proposed Constitution. I was being modest. It is more than safe; it is ensured, strengthened, and amplified in the new charter.

The 1935 Constitution gave us the basics of democracy. The 1973 Constitution and the political order it attempted to legitimize showed us that the basics are not enough. The 1986 Constitution, born of the fight against the tyranny installed by the 1973 Constitution, gives us the basics of democracy and a careful enumeration of the rights, liberties, and even the policies that must be pursued to prevent another tyranny. The new charter is long; it had better be. Despite the best intentions, the finest minds, the bravest politicians, the most vigilant editors, fascism stole a march on us, destroyed our liberties, despoiled our nation, and enslaved us to debt and poverty. This charter therefore enumerates all the abuses of the regime we destroyed and strictly provides against their repetition.

But as we came to power, so have we kept it: peacefully and with the highest regard for the rights and liberties of each and every Filipino, even of those who, unregenerate, to this day plot to bring us back under the yoke of the tyranny and corruption.

The ratification of the new charter sets the stage for two things we must get really started on: the operation of a genuine democracy and the start of the economic recovery of our country.

The new charter will give us Congressional elections in May. While my desire to have truly representative government throughout the land has fixed the date for local elections at August 24, 1987.

I would have preferred to hold them sooner. But the Commission on Elections, to whose opinion the Chief Executive must defer, has argued strongly against it. And I agree. The coming electoral exercises will be the first we shall hold in freedom. They will also be the last for some time to come. Let them therefore be the best in living memory. In this concurring opinion with the Comelec I also reflect the general opinion of the country that simply wants, with equal intensity, a date fixed and the surety of good elections.

But even as we prepared the ground for a vigorous and enduring democracy, we have worked hard to bring about the peace in which to enjoy its blessings.

We have forged an agreement for continued cessation of hostilities in Mindanao with the MNLF, while we work out the basis for a longer-lasting peace among the communities of Mindanao. We are also trying to get the other Muslim factions to join in this effort. The going has been rough, but then the problem is not an easy one.

We have met with greater success in the Cordilleras, and are working with the people of that region to combine the special virtues of their distinctive way of life with the imperatives of economic development and social justice.

We have forged a truce with the national leadership of the Communist insurgency and have opened the way for the insurgents to come down from the hills and rejoin their countrymen in building a new country in the context of a true democracy. We have proceeded not just with talk, but with well funded programs to facilitate their return to democratic community.

To make that community one worth defending, we have instituted sweeping reforms in its system of justice. We have appointed men of unquestioned integrity and competence to the highest courts of the land and enshrined their independence in the Freedom Constitution and institutionalized it in the new charter.

We have made earnest efforts to recover what was stolen from our people by the previous regime. The methods have not always been pleasant, but the injustice we seek to correct, as you know, is enormous.

We are in the process of restoring to labor the rights and dignity commensurate with its contribution to national progress, even as we have cleared away the obstacles which prevent private enterprise from making the contributions it alone can make. And to both sectors we shall give the boost they sorely need through the Community and Employment Development Program, for which we have allocated P8 billion for 1987. In this program, by the way, we seek the help of our citizens to monitor its progress and honest implementation. This participation of private citizens in community projects will create truly responsive local governments.

The basis of our economy is agriculture. Past neglect left in it ruins and the rural sector, to which most Filipinos belong, in the direst poverty. The CEDP program seeks to ameliorate this condition, while our agricultural policies will try to revive our agriculture through lower prices for inputs and more infrastructure support.

In tandem with this, is the effort to equitably redistribute through agrarian reform measures the means and the fruits of agricultural development. If we have not proceeded with the speed that some would like, it is because I will not frustrate our farmers by giving them a mere hope on paper, but a truly effective program of agrarian reform that will give them both land and the means to be make it productive.

We believe in the virtues of self-reliance but believe equally that the people must be given the strength to maintain it. And so we have, along with the programs outlined above, focused this year's budget on education so that the tremendous potential of the Filipino for productive work can be trained and disciplined. The education budget reflects this in its greater size and in the higher compensation we have given our teachers. Again, to strengthen our people for future self-reliance, we have increased social services to make up for the neglect of the past in this area, to heal the wounds that this neglect inflicted on our people, especially the children. We have added P9 billion to the social services budget.

These and other measures too long to relate, and which Budget Minister Romulo and Social Services Minister Mita Pardo de Tavera will amplify, have produced unmistakable signs that the bleeding from the wounds of the past have stopped and that our economy is recovering some measure of vigor. I believe we are ready to make a success of the Medium-Term Development Plan that we have adopted after wide consultations with our people.

We have endeavored to move with as much speed as prudence will allow, so that we do not build in haste and regret at leisure. This is the work of foundation and therefore critical. Everything that follows will take its character from it. And I take pride in saying we accomplished all these in the first minutes of the morning, and against those who sought to return us to the night. The spirit of my message this evening is summed up in the words of Saint Paul, which I address to those who still pine for the past and to those who hesitate to give their share to the future:

“The hour has come for you to wake up from your slumbers because our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed. The night is nearly over; the day is almost here. So let us put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light.”

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Freedom

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On Freedom

[Delivered at the Kalayaan Hall, January 20, 1987]

SAYING YES TO FREEDOM

President Aquino says that the new Constitution not only embodies the ideals of democracy but also the dreams that the Filipino people aspire for as a nation.

The Constitution remembers the tyranny of the past and provides safeguards for the rights that were most abused, those of freedom of expression, and the right to a fair and speedy trial. Furthermore, to ensure that the injustices against civil liberties are not committed again, a Committee on Human Rights is established. A stricter system of public accountability is also provided so that the people are protected from an oppressive and corrupt government.

The people too must be provided the means to enjoy their new freedom, thus there are provisions for free elementary and secondary education as well as a national health care system.

The new Constitution also recognizes the cultural uniqueness of some regions of the country and provides for their autonomy.

I said democracy is safe with this Constitution. In fact, it is more than safe; it is strengthened as well, and made meaningful to the vast majority of our countrymen whose poverty denies them the full benefit of freedom.

The critics of the proposed Constitution say it is too long. It is not. It is only as long as the abuses it is meant to prevent, and the injustices it is intended to correct. I refer to such abuses and injustices as midnight arrests and executions, press censorship, detention without trial, torture, corrupt government, illiteracy, poverty and economic underdevelopment.

Our democratic rights and freedoms are, of course, the first priority and therefore enshrined in the Bill of Rights. These are our inalienable rights that make life worth living. I refer to such rights as freedom of expression, so we can speak our minds without hurt to the reputation and safety of others. There is the right to a fair and speedy trial. There is a right not to be detained without cause.

These rights no one, not even the majority of the nation, can take away from any person, citizen or not. They are inalienable because not even the victim himself can forsake them.

But to be free is not enough. A person must have the means to make a decent living, to improve his life and realize his full potential as a human being. Hence the new Constitution provides for free elementary and secondary education. The new Congress must provide for this.

There is provision for a healthy citizenry, making national health a primary goal of government. Congress again cannot escape the responsibility to provide for an adequate health care system.

The people must not only be protected from oppressive government; they must, as well, be assured of clean government. And so a strict system is created that makes public officials accountable for their acts and mandates punishment for their misdeeds.

We suffered 14 years of terrible oppression. These were years when people were picked up in the dead of night, tortured, and killed. The proposed Constitution brands this experience in our memories and provides for a Committee that will assure respect for human rights, expose their infractions, and remind us ever of our duty to respect each other as brothers and sisters in God.

We are a nation with a long and rich history, in the course of which some of our people developed unique cultural patterns. Just as the Bill of Rights respects our rights and liberties as individuals, the proposed Constitution provides for an equal respect for the uniqueness of certain communities and their right to preserve their special ways of life. And so there is a provision that protects the right of communities to live as their traditions prescribe, and to govern themselves, consistently with democratic principles, in the way they wish.

The proposed Constitution is indeed long. And I suppose Congress could have legislated many of the things that it provides. But is it not better now, while the spirit of the Revolution is vibrantly alive, to have them all written down in a constitution, and binding on our leaders and our people to respect and work for them?

Yes, the new Constitution is long; as long as our experience of oppression, as long as the list of the things we wish to achieve as a nation. We are leaving little to chance. We want to keep the democracy we won; and we want to build upon it the progressive economy and the just society we deserve to have.

For these reasons, I urge our countrymen to come out, and urge your friends and neighbors to join you, in voting “Yes” to the proposed Constitution; “Yes” to the democracy it enshrines; and “Yes” to the future that can be ours.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Mendiola Bridge Incident

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Mendiola Bridge Incident

[Released on January 22, 1987]

DEMOCRACY TESTED

While commiserating with the families of those who died in a bloody confrontation between farmers and the military at Mendiola Bridge, President Aquino orders a thorough and impartial investigation of the incident. She warns the people against those who might seek to exploit the situation and urges them to remain as the government continues its task of restoring democracy.

I am shocked over the bloody incident at Mendiola and deeply saddened at the lives that were lost. I commiserate with the families of the dead. I grieve equally over what this does to the ideals we stood for in the struggle to bring freedom and peace to our land, ideals we continue to cherish.

The persons responsible for this tragedy, whichever side they belong to, will be held to the fullest account. I have ordered a thorough investigation of this bloody incident and for that purpose I am creating an independent, non-governmental body with plenary powers of investigation, to be chaired by Justice Jose Feria. Brig. General Ramon Montano of the Capital Command and Director of the Metropolitan Police Force has made the offer to go on leave during the investigation. I have accepted it.

In the meantime, I urge our people to maintain calm and sobriety. There will be those who will seek to exploit this tragic incident for their own objectives, among which undoubtedly will be to derail our efforts to bring about full democracy in the coming plebiscite.

In the period before the plebiscite, attempts to destabilize the government and defeat our democratic aim will intensify. We are prepared for this contingency. We shall have law and order throughout our land, even as we pursue justice in this case and our larger aim to complete our democratic mission.

Again may I express my deepest condolence to the families of those who died and my grief over this tragedy that has struck our nation.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Tulungan sa Tubigan Program

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Tulungan sa Tubigan Program

[Delivered in Cabanatuan, Nueva Ecija, January 22, 1987]

WATER FOR LIFE AND PROGRESS

The Tulungan Program, which will benefit 31,000 families in 15 provinces, underlines the Aquino Administration's commitment to make democracy a living reality for the people. The importance of water, whether for agriculture or health, cannot be overemphasized and the Tulungan sa Tubigan Program is one instance when the private sector and the government joined hands to work for progress and survival.

It is a great honor and pleasure on my part to formally accept the completion of these water projects under the Tulungan sa Tubigan Program.

Many of the needs of our people could be met by adequate water supply, whether we are talking about agricultural productivity or individual health, especially the health of our children. The awareness of the critical part that water plays in the survival and progress of our country and countrymen motivated us to launch this Program. I am happy to note that the Program is progressing according to plan.

The completion of these projects, with the indispensable help of the Philippine Business for Social Progress, expresses the concern of both government and private sector for the general welfare of our people.

31,000 families will benefit from these projects, which number 425 in 15 provinces. This shows a program that is definitely on the right track.

I'd like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Philippine Business for Social Progress and its staff for a job well done. I am proud to have you with me in these projects that make democratic government truly meaningful for our people.

Isang malaking karangalan at kasiyahan para sa akin ang tanggapin ngayon ang mga natapos nang proyekto sa patubig sa ilalim ng Programang Tulungan sa Tubigan.

Maraming mga pangangailangan ang ating mga mamamayan ang matutugunan sa pamamagitan ng sapat at maayos na patubig, maging sa ating pagsasaka o sa kalusugan ng bawa't isa, lalung-lalo na ang kalusugan ng mga bata. Dahil sa malaking kahalagahan ng tubig sa ating buhay at maging sa pag-unlad ng ating bayan, ang ating pamahalaan ay nagsikap upang ilunsad ang programang ito. Natutuwa akong malaman na ang programa sa patubig ay pinatutupad ayon sa ating plano at layunin.

Ang pagkakatatapos ng mga proyektong ito sa tulong at pangunguna ng Philippine Business for Social Progress ay nagpapahayag at nagpapatunay ng pagmamalasakit ng aking pamahalaan at nang pribadong sektor sa kapakanan at kaligtasan ng ating mamamayan.

Mahigit sa tatlumpu't isang libong (31,000) pamilya ang makikinabang sa proyektong ito na binubuo ng apat na daan at dalawampu't lima (425) at sasakop sa labing-limang (15) lalawigan. Ito ay nagpapakita lamang na tayo ay nasa tamang landas sa pagpapatupad ng programa sa patubig.

Nais ko ring samantalahin ang pagkakataong ito upang batiin ang Philippine Business for Social Progress at ang bumubuo nito sa kanilang magandang simulain. Ikinararangal ko kayong makasama sa proyektong ito na nagsisikap upang ang ating demokratikong pamahalaan ay maging makahulugan sa ating mamamayan.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Democracy, January 24, 1987

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Democracy

PEOPLE GUARDING DEMOCRACY

After an attempted coup d'état and just before a plebiscite to ratify the new Constitution, President Aquino appeals to the people once more to protect their hard-earned freedom from those who seek to destabilize the government. As she invites them to amiting de avance for the new Constitution's ratification, she asks them to exercise strength and resolve in preserving democracy. If need be, she enjoins them to reactivate People's Power which proved crucial in determining the results of the February election.

The events of the past week prove two things:

The enemies of democracy agree with the friends of democracy that the ratification of the proposed Constitution is essential to the preservation of democracy in the Philippines. This explains the desperate efforts of the opponents of the Constitution to prevent the plebiscite on February 2.

The attempted coup is only their latest effort. I warned last week that efforts to destabilize the government and prevent a plebiscite will intensify as we near voting day. Equally, our responses to these threats to the life of our democracy demonstrate our unshakeable resolve to complete our democratic mission.

The events of the past week also prove that, in the end, democracy is safe only in the hands of the people, united, acting in consent, and sending a clear signal to all its enemies that they will defend it with their numbers and their lives.

And so I call on the people, on all the friends of democracy, to come out and join the January 31 Miting de Avance at Luneta.

I ask our people also to protect the integrity of the ballot during the February 2 plebiscite. The government and the Commission on Elections are exerting their best efforts to assure clean and orderly balloting, but the enemies of democracy can still corrupt the electoral process, given what they stole in the past and their present determination to destroy our freedoms.

I ask you therefore to reactivate the people's organizations that produced the People's Victory in the last election. If necessary, let us guard the ballot boxes again with our lives.

Let us begin by joining the Miting de Avance this Saturday, at 1:30 in the afternoon, at the Luneta.

Let us show the enemies of our freedom the strength and resolve which they must overcome before they can restore tyranny and abuse in our land.

Let us demonstrate once more the power of the people as the only dependable shield of our democracy. I ask you, my people, to join me on January 31 in demonstrating our unity and strength in defense of democracy.

TIME

JUSTICE

The situation is well in hand. People should keep calm.

Their attempt has failed. While these elements were able to take Channel 7, the station is now surrounded by our troops. The rebels are strongly urged to surrender. Their situation is hopeless. Every moment of delay merely compounds the gravity of their crime.

This attempt reflects the inability of some elements, both in the military and in the civilian sector, to face the fact that civilian government is here to stay and that nothing will derail our effort to establish full constitutional democracy in the coming plebiscite.

There is a time for reconciliation and time for justice and retribution. That time has come.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Amnesty Proclamation, January 28, 1987

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Amnesty Proclamation

[Released on January 28, 1987]

HEALING THE WOUNDS OF THE NATION

In the spirit of reconciliation, President Aquino grants full amnesty to persons who have committed political crimes but who willingly return to the fold of the law. To help these returning rebels become productive members of society, a National Reconciliation and Development Program is established.

We are called by Christ to be free. He has committed us to the message of reconciliation. We believe that all men desire to live in peace with their neighbors, and that joy is promised to those who promote peace.

Therefore, I, Corazon C. Aquino, President of the Philippines, hereby declare and proclaim full and complete amnesty in favor of all persons who have or may have committed any act penalized under existing laws in furtherance of their political beliefs and who, as of this date, the 28th of February, 1987, and for six months thereafter, return of their own free will to the fold of the law.

We have set up the National Reconciliation and Development Program, with centers throughout the country, to provide amnestied rebels, who wish to avail of them, the means and training to resume productive roles in society.

We hope by these measures to reunite families, bind up the brokenhearted, and heal the wounds of our nation. These things are done so that, in the words of Paul, the peace of Christ may rule in our hearts and reign throughout our land, since as members of one body we were called to peace.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on education's role in National Development, January 29, 1987

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On education's role in National Development

[Delivered at the Far Eastern University, January 29, 1987]

EDUCATION: A FREE FUTURE

ENSURING

President Aquino acknowledges the educator's contribution to national development. Freedom and learning go hand in hand, she says as she stresses that the strength of a democracy lies in the intelligence and maturity of a people. In recognition of education's role in national development, special provisions on education have been incorporated in the New Constitution.

I accept the honor you have conferred on me today with deep gratitude, and with a satisfaction only less than that which I feel over the investiture of Dr. Josephine Reyes as the 7th President of this distinguished university. FEU is her life, the almost singular object of her concern and the focus of nearly all her time, energies and talent. I do not say these things as one sister of another. But as one privileged to see close-up how a life is lived dedicated to imparting reason and learning to the youth of our country, which is like saying: preparing the groundwork for the future.

I say them also as one who experienced briefly, as a law student, the rigor and effectiveness of the instruction, and the wisdom of the faculty of this university.

What I have observed her doing, is a small version of what private institutions of higher learning, in general, do as their contribution to national progress.

Seventy-eight percent of college students are enrolled in private educational institutions, two-thirds of which are non-sectarian like the FEU. But such institutions, at their best, do more than just take up the slack created by the insufficient number of public institutions of higher education. You cultivate the diversity that makes up the wealth of our culture, and encourage the individualism and pluralism that mark a true democracy.

These important contributions that you have long been making have finally found their due recognition and support in the proposed Constitution's provisions on education. This is one more reason why I can ask you confidently to help in the ratification of this charter. For the strength of a democracy grows with the maturity and intelligence of its citizens. Freedom and learning go hand in hand. They illuminate our lives and light the way to a happy future, just as the cultivation of ignorance was the instrument of the tyranny that darkened our land.

And so to you, the Far Eastern University, and to other private institutions of higher learning, may I express the gratitude of our nation and my faith in your continuing success.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on justice and respect for law, January 29, 1987

of

President of the Philippines
On justice and respect for law

[Released on January 29, 1987]

JUSTICE FOR LAW

AND

RESPECT

After the resolution of a military takeover of a commercial TV station, President Aquino reaffirms the principle of civilian authority over the military, and orders the arrest and prosecution of those involved in the incident. She says that if the law has to be respected, then Justice has to be applied, even as her government seeks to be compassionate.

I am pleased with the peaceful, non-violent resolution of the GMA-TV incident. I commend the officers and men assigned to it for their handling of the problem.

As we govern by the principle of law, I have ordered the Minister of Justice to prepare rebellion charges against the civilians who took part in the act of rebellion. The Minister of Defense, pursuant to my order, shall proceed against the rebel military officers in accordance with the manual of courts martial.

The gravity of the offense is not lightened, and the damage inflicted on persons and property is not diminished by the perpetrators' change of heart. There were casualties and damage to property. Here was a determined attempt to disrupt the affairs of government and that of the nation at large. Here was a clear attempt to overthrow the first principle of democracy, which is civilian supremacy, by those specially charged with its preservation.

It is for the courts and the military tribunal to consider the motives of the perpetrators in mitigating or aggravating the punishment for the clear infractions of the laws that were here committed.

As I announced when this incident took place, everyone implicated in this crime, civilian and military, will be held to the fullest account. While we continue to cherish the virtue of compassion, we shall have justice in this case for we must have respect for the law.

Congratulatory Message of President Corazon Aquino to the Bureau of Customs, February 6, 1987

Congratulatory Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Bureau of Customs

[Delivered at the Manila South Harbor, February 6, 1987]

LIVING UP TO EXPECTATIONS

President Aquino congratulates the Bureau of Customs for setting an example of increased efficiency and honesty. It is due to performances such as that of the Customs personnel that her administration accomplished one of its major achievements: reviving the people's confidence in their government.

The President reminds her audience, however, that there is now increased criticism of government because people expect a lot from the bureaucracy. They expect it to serve their best interest and to be accountable to them for any failures.

I congratulate the Bureau on its 85th anniversary.

The Ministry of Finance and its component Bureau of Customs rode the period of transition smoothly. I am pleased to note that revenues have stayed the same despite the drop in the value of some imports and the repeal of certain customs duties. I can only attribute this to increased efficiency and honesty in collection, and the unbending resolve of the Commissioner to punish violations of the customs code.

I have often said that one of our advantages today is the restored confidence of the people in government. This was recently shown in the massive turnout of the February 2 Plebiscite, and in the tremendous vote of confidence that our government received at the polls along with the ratification of the Constitution. It is shown as well in the increased criticism of government.

Under the past regime, there were few complaints about public service. There were even less that made it to print. This was a result of the iron grip that censorship had on media. It was also the result of the general despair into which our countrymen had fallen. Few complained because none expected public service to be good or even forthcoming. Most were glad that a government with a tendency to do bad did nothing at all.

But it is different today. People believe in government. And they believe in democracy. They think that government is there to serve their best interests. They believe, in accordance with the principles of democracy, that it is accountable to them for any failure in that regard. And because they believe, they expect much of us.

The high expectations that the people have of government and democracy puts a double burden on the public official. The burden of doing his or her work with honesty and efficiency, and the burden of convincing the public that this is the case. I noted once that in politics the perception of honesty is as important as its reality.

I said this because the present government, given its limited resources and the problems it inherited, cannot immediately address all the problems that have rightfully been brought to its attention. We cannot move on all fronts simultaneously, be it land reform, agricultural productivity, industrial growth, unemployment, infrastructure or national defense. Nor can we move with the speed and effectiveness that our people desire.

What then can tide them over until we can reach everyone's concern and problem?

One word: Hope. But hope is possible only with trust. Trust in the sincerity and honesty of the government. For as long as our people believe that we are doing our best and that we are sharing their hardships, they will wait and they will help. But we must earn that trust by an extra effort to be of real service to our people and to avoid the smallest occasion that may give rise to a suspicion of corruption in office.

Your performance in the past year, the probity, competence and patriotism of your chiefs, particularly the Minister of Finance and the Commissioner of Customs, inspired me to start this drive for honesty and efficiency in government here at the Customs Bureau.

We must repay the tremendous vote of confidence that our government has received with a commensurate service to the people. I depend on you, men and women of the Customs Bureau, to set the first example. Again, I congratulate you on your 85th anniversary and your first successful year under the new democracy. I wish you continued success.

Message of President Corazon Aquino upon Conferment of Honor, February 6, 1987

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Upon Conferment of Honor

[Delivered at a Malaysian Studio via Satellite, February 6, 1987]

A FAMILY OF MAN

President Aquino expresses the Filipino people's desire to become a united family, governed by just and humane laws, and guided by God's teachings and commandments. The nation took the first step towards this goal with the ratification of a new Constitution, which is the embodiment of their ideals for a democratic society. In the quest for universal peace and understanding, the Filipino makes a stand.

I accept with deep gratitude, on behalf of the Filipino people, the honor you have conferred on me today. I regret I cannot be with you personally tonight, but I certainly am with you in spirit as you work and pray for unity, peace and understanding among the peoples of the world.

In the Philippines, as you know, we have peacefully and successfully concluded a national plebiscite that ratifies a new and truly democratic constitution for all Filipinos. We too have long sought to be one, united family founded on, and guided by just and humane laws, and inspired by the commandments and teachings of a just and loving God.

That is why I say that I and my people are with you in spirit as you celebrate the universal brotherhood of men. For as Saint Paul reminded the Romans: All other commandments are summed up in this one rule: "love your neighbor as yourself." Once again, we are a country that seeks to adhere not only to the just laws of men, but to that sweeping and redeeming commandment of God. By the exhortation to love one another, we are bound to join you in the quest to bring all men together as one, loving family. May I ask for your prayers for long-lasting peace and the economic revival of our country, even as we pray that your council and foundation might be blessed with success in all its endeavors.

Thank you for the honor you have bestowed on me. I will truly cherish it and share it proudly with my countrymen.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 86th Founding Anniversary of the Western Police District, February 9, 1987

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 86th Founding Anniversary of the Western Police District

[Delivered at Philamlife, February 9, 1987]

CHANGING THE IMAGE OF MEN IN UNIFORM

There are two battles waged by men in uniform, the one fought by the soldier against communism and the one fought by the policeman against crime and violence. Both battles will ultimately be won not by mere force but by the integrity, dedication and moral courage of the men who fight it.

Thus, on the 86th Foundation Anniversary of the Western Police District, President Aquino asks the members of the police force to review the principles of their profession, principles which are founded on the very ideals of society. She also exhorts them to live up to the people's expectations of them, the expectations of keeping peace and order in the community, and of protecting the lives and properties of citizens.

Among the battles to preserve and protect our newly won democracy are two waged by men in uniform. These battles will ultimately be won not by mere force but by the integrity, dedication and moral courage of the men and women in public service who lead and fight them. Of the battles fought by our men in uniform, one is in the field against those who wage ideological, war against democracy. A truce now governs that war while the effort is made to negotiate a peaceful resolution of the issues that divide the State and the insurgency. The other battle is the ceaseless wax of order against anarchy, of law against crime, of harmony and productive community against the destructive violence of criminals. This other battle is fought by you, men and women of our police forces.

We call you, in particular, the men and women of the Western Police District, "Manila's Finest." Perhaps because in championing the cause of order and protecting the peace of our communities, you are expected to exemplify the ideals of our society.

We seek a society where peace and order reign. And we look to you to provide it. We want an environment free from corruption and abuse, and we need you to ensure it. We ask that our individual rights and liberties are constantly upheld, particularly our right to be secure in our persons and properties and free from the dangers that threaten them, and we depend on you to give us that guarantee. Your work is not less difficult than that of our soldiers in the field. The city can be a jungle as well. Other factors make your work equally arduous and dangerous.

Our modern police force evolved from what were once civilian patrol groups. And so, coming as you do from the civilian populace, and working among civilians, you are subject to the same problems and pressures that plague the communities where you live and work. You too must cope with low wages, high prices, steep rentals, and the most modest of living conditions. You too must struggle to make ends meet. The very same conditions that have driven weaker citizens to crime are the conditions in which you must work to fight crime. Indeed, for the average policeman, not much is given by our society in wages and incentives and yet much is asked in the way of sacrifice. That is still another reason why you are called upon to maintain. Given the exemplary roles you must play, the spartan conditions in which you must work, the dangers you daily face, I would say that policework can be no ordinary job. It must be regarded and adhered to as a calling.

And so, on this 86th Foundation Anniversary of the Western Police District, I ask each and every one of you to review the founding principles of your profession and the noble chapters and examples in your history. I ask you to face the year before us with new and firm resolve. I ask you to bear constantly in mind that your daily work, however routinary and humble and materially unrewarding, is not just your duty but the calling to which God has called you.

As I had promised during the last campaign, I as your Commander-in-Chief, am ready to make the necessary sacrifices and pursue reform no matter how difficult or elusive. We are now working to rebuild credibility and faith in the democratic system that once worked so well for us. We are laboring to kill the notion that public service is the easiest road to private gain, and to resurrect by practice the ideal of public service as a public trust. For in the past golden years of our democracy, that was how the government worker was perceived: hardworking, self-denying, steadfast and ready to serve. In this total overhauling of our bureaucratic system, I also look forward to an even more improved, responsive and responsible police force. One that boasts of men and women whose uniforms inspire respect, confidence and moral emulation in the public; who are seen as fitting symbols of the kind of society we seek to establish.

What I ask is not an ideal never reached but one that, time and again, you, Manila's Finest, have achieved. I am reminded at this point of the true story of the young Col. Alfredo Lim recovering the stolen money of a Chinese woman and turning over the entire amount, to the last centavo, to her. I understand that he was sweating cold while the money was counted in front of her. If the robbers had spent any of it, he would be suspected of having pocketed it. This must explain his white hair. When the last centavo was counted, the woman fainted dead away: shocked that Manila's Finest had lived up to its name.

While this story is a tribute to now General Lim, I hope we come to a time when no one will faint from surprise at the honesty of public servants, when people will cease to clamor that we police our own police.

Remember that a new, more helpful generation of Filipinos looks to you to set the example for integrity, courage, honesty and adherence to the law. The living of these ideals is a greater and more durable treasure than any we can leave our children. Let it be said that the men and women of the Western Police District may not be the best paid of working Filipinos, but they are certainly among the most honorable. In the meantime, I have instructed the National Housing Authority and other relevant agencies to prepare for me a housing plan for our police forces to correct, in some small measure, the disparity between your sacrifice and the public gratitude.

And so, on this 86th anniversary, may I thank you for your efforts to live up to your reputation as Manila's Finest. May God walk with you as you patrol our streets; enforce laws; and bring peace to our families, harmony to our communities; and strength and progress to our nation.

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Command Conference

[Held in Camp Aguinaldo, February 11, 1987]

AFTER THE TRUCE

The ceasefire has ended but at least, peace was given a chance. The government vows to continue to explore all possibilities of a peaceful resolution of the conflict with insurgents. In the meantime, President Aquino orders the Armed Forces of the Philippines to resume operations against the insurgents and to ensure law and order in the land. She instructs them, however, to exercise utmost tolerance and respect for human rights and lives. While the soldier must fight to protect those whose lives he is charged with, he must do so without losing sight of the values of honor, humanity, and the ideals of democracy.

The truce is over. History will decide who is to blame for its end. I know that, for our part, you and I, did our best to explore the path of negotiation to the utmost.

The truce, is over, but all hope of peace is not lost. We shall continue to explore the possibilities of regional and provincial negotiations with the insurgents. We shall soon be implementing a rebel rehabilitation program to attract non-ideologues back to the law.

Our economic recovery program should, over the longer term, significantly reduce the root causes of the insurgency. In the meantime, we are pledged to secure the persons and properties of our citizens.

To that end, the New Armed Forces will resume operations against the insurgents. We shall have law and order throughout our country, so that the people can work in peace and security in the reconstruction of our country.

The New Armed Forces now fight for a new order; an order marked by the highest respect for human rights. In its operations against the rebellion, our soldiers are expected to conduct themselves with honor and humanity against the enemy, and the utmost solicitude for the safety of the people. We are assured by the General Staff that we can conduct a successful counter-insurgency without violating our principles. I expect our soldiers to reflect in their conduct the values for which they fight: honor, humanity, and the rights and freedoms of a democracy. The noble nature of the soldier's calling requires it. The laws themselves demand it.

The truce is over. Send this message out to all our troops so that none may be misled to relax their vigilance — to their peril and that of the people they are charged to protect. They must take care of the people, who will be their best security and friend.

Even as we prepare for the struggle to come, let us continue to pray that God may yet snatch us from the brink of war and set us gently down in peace.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 1986 Constitution, February 11, 1987

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 1986 Constitution

[Released on February 11, 1987]

A DOCUMENT OF UNITY

The 1986 Constitution was overwhelmingly approved by the people who turned out in unprecedented numbers. With the new Constitution, the people now have one document to unite them in their goal of preserving democracy and making it a living reality.

President Aquino once again expresses the message of reconciliation and urges the people to unite in peace and work for the greater good of countrymen and nation.

Majority rule is the first principle of a democracy. Everyone who believes in democracy is bound to that rule and will abide by its result. The result is clear and unmistakable: My fellow countrymen, we have a Constitution. And we can claim it as never before in our history — with a massive turnout and the overwhelming approval of our people.

One law now channels the unswerving loyalty of all Filipinos to democracy and its ways.

One political order will now govern the ways we work together: to strive for common goals as a people, and to resolve our remaining differences in a peaceful and democratic fashion.

One duty, imposed by the unquestionable command of the Filipino nation, binds us all in the effort to preserve and protect our democracy in this Constitution, and make it meaningful for all our people.

Let me close with a fulfillment of the words of Paul: The night is over; the day is here. Let us finally put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light. Christ has committed us to the message of reconciliation. Let all Filipinos of goodwill offer each other the hand of peace and friendship. Let every Filipino pledge to work, as God gives him the light, for the greater good of all his countrymen and the freedom and progress of our nation.

Peace Message of President Corazon Aquino on the Commemoration of the EDSA Revolution, February 21, 1987

Peace Message
of

President of the Philippines
On the Commemoration of the EDSA Revolution

[Released on February 21, 1987]

EDSA REVISITED

Memories of the February Revolution are fraught with wonder, wonder at how people from opposite walks of life — the soldier and the nun — joined hands in denouncing a violent solution to the nation's problems. Despite the threat of death, the Revolution was achieved without, bloodshed but with offerings of peace and friendship.

The real hero of the Revolution is the Filipino, who put his faith in God. The gains of the revolution, however, must be maintained and made to prosper through the people's unity.

As I look around me today, my heart is filled with many memories from a year ago. There is sorrow at the thought of those who gave up their lives for our freedom. One of them was my husband.

But I also remember, with a sense of wonder, other moments. Moments when our people looked danger in the face, yet turned away from the path of violence. Moments when people who thought they were enemies, extended the hand of friendship. Looking at these images of our revolution, we are struck again by its uniqueness. It was a revolution, where the nun and the soldier had an equal place, united by a will to peace. It was a revolution whose color was not the red of bloodshed or the black of night, but the yellow of hope and freedom, the rising sun on our national flag.

Ang tunay na mga bayani ng pagdiriwang na ito ay ang mga Pilipino. Mga Pilipino na nagnasang makaalpas. At ang ating paniniwala na "BAHALA NA ANG DIYOS." Tulad din nang kasabihan sa ating pananampalataya "NASA DIYOS ANG AWA, NASA TAO ANG GAWA." Pinalaya ninyo ang bansang Pilipinas sa tulong ng ating Panginoong Diyos. Sama-sama tayo sapangakong makita ang ating bansang sakdal laya.

But freedom must be rooted in peace, unity, and trust. We cannot rebuild our country when others are trying to tear it down. We say to those who want to see our country strong: Let us make it strong together. We say to those who seek social justice: Together we will find it. Put aside the arrogance of arms. We say to the nations of the world: Respect our quest for peace, and join us in it.

Our revolution taught us all that people linking hands — kapit-bisig — are stronger than the tanks, that true democracy is stronger than tyranny. That we are called by God to be free and that peace, in the words of Isaiah, can only be the fruit of righteousness. Let us remember these lessons, and live them every day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the EDSA Flag Raising, February 25, 1987

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the EDSA Flag Raising

[Delivered at Camp Aguinaldo, February 25, 1987]

THANK YOU, SOLDIER

The February Revolution has a special meaning for the military who, in the past regime, lost whatever honor they stood for as they were ordered to turn against the people they were supposed to protect. When the final test came, however, the soldiers disobeyed a dictator to stand true to their duty of defending a nation. It was largely because of this, because of the soldiers' refusal to fire on their own countrymen, that the February Revolution was bloodless.

President Aquino assures the military of the nation's gratitude and support as it tries to reform itself. As the people turned out to defend the soldiers' lives, she now enjoins the military to defend the people's freedom.

As we raise the flag of our country, I take special pride in saluting you, the defenders of our nation. The February Revolution has meant many things to many people. But it holds special promise for you, the military.

Some called the past regime a military dictatorship, yet it abused and shamed the military.

You, who were sons of the people, were asked to turn against the people.

You, the defenders of our national patrimony, had to stand by as it was plundered and wasted.

Many of you resisted, and for that we thank you.

And, in the moment of truth, when you were ordered to fire on the marchers for peace, for once in your life, you disobeyed. You disobeyed the dictator, in obedience to the higher call of freedom. And for that you will be rewarded.

You have already been rewarded with the gratitude of your people and your government. But deeper rewards are in store. You can now be assured that so long as you are responsible to the will of the people, the people will rally to support you – as they rallied around your brothers in Camp Aguinaldo.

You were, and remain, an essential part of the February Revolution. Let us all remember that its standards bore not the red of bloodshed, nor the black of hatred, but the yellow of hope and courage, the rising sun of the flag you are specially called to defend.

You, my countrymen, hold a special place in my heart. We mourn and honor every one of you who falls in the line of duty. Our people are watching with pride as you cleanse and fortify the institution of the military, and make it both a pillar to hold up our democracy and a sword to defeat its enemies. Our people turned out to defend your lives. It is your part now to defend their freedom.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the First Anniversary of the EDSA Revolution

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the First Anniversary of the EDSA Revolution

[Released on February 25, 1987]

A DAY OF THANKS

The first anniversary of the EDSA revolution is a day of thanks not only for the peacefulness with which it was achieved, but also for the fact that it was achieved by no other nation except the Philippines. The revolution restored democracy. The plebiscite provided the bases for that democracy, and it is now in the people's hands to make that democracy work. For this purpose, President Aquino exhorts the people to unite once more and to dedicate themselves to three economic goals: alleviation of mass poverty, generation of employment and equitable sharing of the fruits of development.

Binabati ko kayong lahat sa ating unang pagdiriwang ng People Power sa EDSA.

Ito ay araw ng pasasalamat. Magpasalamat tayo sa ating kalayaan. Tayo ay ginantimpalaan ng kalayaan, sa isang mapayapang paraan.

Pambihirang pangyayari itong mapayapang rebolusyon at dahil dito ay hinangaan ng buong mundo ang mga mamayang Pilipino. Bakit ba tayong Pilipino ang natutong gumamit ng People Power na mapayapa at bakit ba sa ibang bansa ay hindi pa nila magaya ang ating People Power?

Sa aking paniwala, ang unang People Power ay nangyari noong pinatay si Ninoy noong Agosto 21, 1983. Bakit ba nagpuntahan ang libulibong mamamayan sa aming tahanan sa Times Street? Karamihan sa kanila ay hindi man lamang kilala si Ninoy. Ngunit pumila sila ng maraming oras, kung minsan nababasa sila sa ulan at kung minsan naman ay pawis na pawis sila sa init ng araw. Kadalasan ay nagugutom pa sila. Ngunit wala akong narinig na dumaing. Bagkos marami ang bumalik ng dalawa o tatlong beses upang makita muli ang duguang bangkay ni Ninoy. At alam nating lahat na milyun-milyong Pilipino ang nakipaglibing kay Ninoy. Noong araw na yoon, ang nakasulat sa mga posters ay "Ninoy, hindi ka nag-iisa." Dahil sa sakripisyo ni Ninoy, nagsimula na ang pagkakaisa ng mamamayang Pilipino. Noong ilibing si Ninoy nakita nating nabuhay muli ang katangi-tanging magagandang ugaling Pilipino. Nawala ang takot ng Pilipino. Natutong makiramay muli ang mga Pilipino. Natutong magmahalang muli ang mga Pilipino. Natutong magtulungan muli ang mga Pilipino. At natutong manalangin at manawagan muli sa Panginoong Diyos ang mga maraming Pilipino.

Hindi natin nakamit kaagad ang kalayaan pagkatapos ng pagkapatay kay Ninoy. Kinailangan pa ng sapat na panahon upang mapuntahan natin ang ating mga kapatid sa buong bansa at upang pakiusapan sila na sumali sa ating pagsisikap na maibalik ang ating kalayaan. Kinailangan din na marami sa atin ang magkusang loob na magpakapagod at magtaya ng sariling buhay upang lumaban sa diktador sa mga rally at demonstrasyon sa halalan.

Walang sinuman sa atin ang nakaisip o nagplano ng EDSA Revolution. Kaming dalawa ni Doy Laurel ay nasa Cebu at nagkakampanya sa boycott movement noong Pebrero 22.

Nalaman ko lamang nung gabing yoon na si dating Minister Juan Ponce Enrile at si Gen. Fidel Ramos ay humiwalay na kay Marcos. Natatandaan ko pang sinabi kay Johnny Ponce Enrile sa telepono: Johnny, all I can offer you for the moment are my prayers. And he answered: that is what I need. Nakabalik ako sa Metro Manila mula sa Cebu nung Linggo ng hapon, Pebrero 23.

Ang aking bayaw na si Butz Aquino ay isa sa nangunang magpunta sa Crame at Aguinaldo. Si Cardinal Sin naman ang nanawagan sa mga mamamayan na magpunta sa EDSA. Si June Keithley at iba pa ang namahala sa radyo upang magbigay ng mga balita sa atin. Libu-libo ang nagdagsaan sa EDSA upang bigyan ng suporta ang militar.

Ako'y nagpunta sa EDSA at Ortigas noong Lunes ng hapon upang makiusap sa ating mga kababayan na ipagpatuloy ang pagbabantay sa EDSA. At noong Martes ng umaga sa Club Filipino, kaming dalawa ni Doy Laurel ay nanumpa ng katapatan sa ating bansa bilang Pangulo at Pangalawang Pangulo. Nakiusap din kami sa mamamayan na huwag ng magpunta sa Club Filipino at huwag nilang lisanin ang Camps Crame at Aguinaldo.

Ang People Power sa EDSA ay isang pangyayaring mananatiling buhay at sariwa sa ating alaala,

Today let us recall why People Power at EDSA was successful. I think it was successful mainly for the following reasons:

1. Because the people at EDSA were there for a great cause — the cause of freedom.
2. Because the Filipinos who went there were dedicated and selfless Filipinos. They went to EDSA not for any personal consideration but only for the greater interest of the country.
3. Because the Filipinos at EDSA believed in God and in one another.

We have restored freedom in this country. Now we have to continue with the same People Power spirit of selflessness and dedication in order to achieve our other goals, our economic goals. Let us dedicate ourselves to these three economic goals: alleviation of mass poverty, generation of employment and equitable sharing of the fruits of development.

Sa loob ng isang taon, tayo ay naharap sa maraming pagsubok sa ating pagnanasang maisakatuparan ang ating mga layunin. At ito ay atingginawa sa ilalim ng prinsipyong demokrasya. At sa tulong at gabay ng ating Panginoong Diyos ay nakaya nating talunin ang mga taong nagtangkang sirain ang ating simulain.

Ang matahimik na Rebolusyon noong Pebrero 1986 ay nagbigay sa atin ng demokrasya. Ang Plebisito ng Pebrero 1987, na sinang-ayunan ng 76% ng buong bansa ay naglagay sa ating demokrasya sa isang matatag at ligtas na katayuan.

Tayo ay ginantimpalaan ng kalayaan. Ngayon nasa ating mga kamay kung paano ito gagamitin para sa katarungan at kaunlaran.

Ang ating kinabukasan ay nakasalalay sa ating mga kamay. Ang ating tagumpay ay nasa ating pagkakaisa. Tulad ng nakaraang matahimik na rebolusyon, sama-sama nating labanan ang mga nagnanais na ibalik ang pagsasamantala sa ating bayan. Sama-sama nating itinayo ang kalayaan at demokrasya ng bansang Pilipinas. Sama-sama rin nating pangalagaan ito para sa ating katahimikan at kaunlaran.

BUREAUCRACY AS PUBLIC SERVICE

Without the members of democracy, the people behind the scene who translate into action the plans and programs of government, Cabinet decisions and policies remain but a design for the fulfillment of the people's aspirations. It is largely due to these people's dedication and professionalism — the staff of the Department of Budget and Management in this case — that a successful and peaceful transition from dictatorship to democratic government was achieved.

President Aquino reminds the Department of Budget and Management staff that bureaucracy is meant to help, to provide public service. She advises them to take pride in every task, no matter how humble, and to bring a high sense of purpose to every endeavor because behind each one is a human being and his dream.

It is a pleasure to meet the people who make things work in government. The Cabinet and I have been making important policies and decisions, but it is the men and women of the Department of Budget and Management, as you should now be called, who translate them into action. Your work decides what part of policy remains aspiration, and what part becomes programs that make a difference in the lives of our people. And while we get most of the praise, and if I may add, most of the blame, you have remained behind the scenes, attending to the crucial and difficult details of implementation and justification.

This dependability must be your greatest asset and contribution. It is to the credit of the Department of Budget and Management that the transition from dictatorship to democratic government took place effortlessly, at least on the administrative level. It is largely to your credit, that the new government team, which of course came from out of government, managed to make a go of the bureaucracy. We have learned much from you, even as you have graciously accommodated and adjusted to our new leadership and management style.

I hope that, as our government continues to evolve in the pattern set forth in the new Constitution, you will continue to show the same dedication and professionalism. Budget and Management remains largely intact today because you chose to work for the general good throughout the transition. That is why you are able to look back today over 50 years of service and feel a sense of pride. I and my team of officials and advisers will one day leave Malacañang, but you will remain to serve. And it will be your decency, dependability, and efficiency in this administration that will determine the success of the next.

Meanwhile, let us be reminded that the bureaucracy is meant to help and not to hinder the work of cutting down red tape, of eliminating outmoded systems that waste our precious time and energy. You must bring a sense of high purpose, even to the most mundane tasks of your office. "Keep interested in your own career, however humble. It is a real possession in the changing fortunes of time." Remember that behind every seemingly minor case or insignificant document that demands our attention, there are real people, with real cares and hopes, whose peace of mind and effort we give to their requests. The bundy clock does not tick too slowly for the public servant who is deeply aware of the people he serves.

Remember also that much of the credibility and acceptance by the public of our new government depends on you. A poster circulated by the Philippine Information Agency puts it this way: "The people are not an interruption of our work. They ARE our work." Another poster, tacked on the walls of the Administrative Building in Malacañang, shows Christ washing the feet of his apostles. The message is that those who serve honestly and humbly and willingly will be judged first and greatest of all. In this light, I hope that all of you here will strive to be the first and greatest in government in this your 51st year, and every year thereafter.

Finally, let me say that I will sorely miss the services of your boss, Secretary, and soon-to-be Senator Bert Romulo. My daughter Kris unwittingly gave Bert his first campaign endorsement when she called him her favorite cabinet member. Although we will all miss Bert, especially his wise and temperate counsel in many fields in addition to his own, he leaves us with a sense of confidence that his Department will continue to serve us well. He has, with the consideration and prudence of a good servant of the people, prepared well for his departure. I thank him for his great and good service, on behalf of our people.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the PSG Anniversary

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines During the PSG Anniversary

PROTECTORS OF THE CHIEF

The Presidential Security Group (PSG), one branch of the Armed Forces, is charged with protecting the seat of Government and its leader, the President. Under the new Constitution, the PSG is charged with protecting only one branch of the government but since the February 1986 Revolution, it has had the burden of protecting practically the whole government because the President has been both the executive and the legislature.

During its first anniversary, President Aquino commends the PSG for the exemplary performance of its members.

To our people goes the credit for the restoration of democracy in our country, but to the Armed Forces go the credit for its immediate defense against its armed foes. Within the Armed Forces, however, a special force is charged with the difficult task of protecting the seat of Government and the person of its leader. That force is the palace guard, which in our country today is called the Presidential Security Group.

In the normal constitutional set up that we shall soon have, presidential security would have the important duty of protecting one branch of the three branches that compose the government. But in the set up we have had since the restoration of democracy last February, 1986, the Presidential Security Group had the even more onerous duty of protecting the entire government itself in the Office and person of the President that combined all its powers. Since the Revolution, I have been both the legislature and the executive of the government. Any threat to me was literally a threat against the State, and the democracy it upheld. That made me an inviting target of all the enemies of democracy. During all this time, however, I always felt safe. Safe because I trust in God to dispose of me according to His will, and safe because I trusted in the Presidential Security to make sure that I did not go before the time He has appointed. Oliver Cromwell told his soldiers to put their faith in God but to keep their powder dry. The Presidential Security has been my gunpowder, kept dry and ready in every season.

Today is the first anniversary of this special guard. One year seems too short a period to honor it. But the past year witnessed an unprecedented number of threats to the Presidency. The work of the Presidential Security Group for the past year compressed the work of protecting a President for the whole of his term in office.

May I therefore express my appreciation and gratitude to the Presidential Security Group for its outstanding performance in this first and critical year of democracy in our country and for the protection it gave not only to my person but to the unity and stability that the Presidency has represented in this period of transition.

The Armed Forces as a whole are the shield and sword of the Republic, but the Presidential Security Group has been the breastplate protecting the Heart of the Republic.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on New Perspectives in Land Reform

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On New Perspectives in Land Reform

[Delivered at the Kalayaan Hall, March 3, 1987]

NEW PERSPECTIVES IN LAND REFORM

An effective land reform is the key to the country's progress and stability. For this reason, land reform, which could become the Aquino Administration's most important project, is being studied carefully before implementation. What is targetted is not just an equal distribution of land but also a distribution which is founded on justice for both the tenant and the landowner. Land reform seeks two things: more jobs to solve unemployment in the countryside and greater productivity to increase the standard of living and purchasing power of the rural sector.

An effective land reform program is critical to the future progress and stability for our country. I put the stress on the word effective. It must be effective given the state of the economy, the condition of public infrastructure which supports agricultural activities, the availability of adequate extension services to help productivity, and adequate post harvest facilities to enable farm produce to generate a decent income for the rural Philippine population.

My aim has not been just the equal division of land. In our present circumstances, this means the equal distribution of misery. This is why, although I regard Land Reform as a very important program, if not the most important of my government, I have proceeded with great caution. I will not discredit the idea of land reform by simply proclaiming it when we do not have the means to make it work. The ultimate aim of the land reform I envision is a country whose people are at peace with themselves, which means a land reform program with justice for all: farmer and landowner. No one must feel cheated of his rights or neglected in his legitimate aspirations. Land reform as I see it must also produce two things: more jobs to sop up the unemployment in the countryside and greater productivity to increase the standard of living and the purchasing power of the rural sector. It must accomplish these things because land reform, so far as I am concerned, is only a means to justice. And justice demands that our great people, who fought for freedom and stood up in its defense, must live lives commensurate in well-being and dignity to the nobility of their achievements. In addition to being a means of justice through improved living standards for the rural sector, the revival of agriculture is our surest hope of industrial growth. Until we create a wide and stable domestic market, we can never industrialize. The industrial sector of every country in the world depends for its survival on the domestic market. In our case, that market can only be the rural sector. We must therefore tap what I believe is its tremendous potential, so it can support the industrialization and therefore the economic sovereignty of our nation.

As with every program of government, the key is money. Talent counts as well, and especially integrity. Programs must be well conceived and there must be honesty in running them. But without money, they will always remain paper proposals or empty political slogans. There is nothing I detest more than to use so important a program as land reform as a political slogan. That is why I have been reluctant to speak of it, until I was sure of our program and the means to implement it. That program is being prepared. I will not, however, wait for its final refinement before announcing the funds we have found to finance it in part.

As you know, the past regime's economic policy boiled down in real terms to plain stealing. This was done, primarily, through the practice of ordering government financial institutions to lend large sums of money for the industrial projects. Only a fraction of the loan went into the project itself. The bulk of it was deposited abroad. It is the problem of the PCGG to recover that part. The projects on the other hand are here, and we have foreclosed on most of them. All of them have failed and are inoperative. No company can sustain the burden of servicing debts for in excess of their value. These companies are called non-performing assets or NPAs. They have been transferred from the government financial institutions, like the PNB, the DBP, and Philippine Guarantee, to the Assets Privatization Fund for subsequent sale. The transfer value of the non-performing assets in the hands of the PNB and the DBP is P108 billion. The APT can hope to sell them for no more than around P24 billion.

We are tempted to throw up our hands in despair, but that will serve no purpose. We must make the best of the situation. Here we have bad money. We must put it to some good use. And I can think of none better than land reform.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Necrological Service for Jose W. Diokno

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Necrological Service for Jose W. Diokno

[Delivered at Mt. Carmel Church, March 3, 1987]

MEMORIES OF A NOBLE MAN

Jose W. Diokno stood for many things: Constitutional democracy, justice and reason, hope for the oppressed, the majesty of the law, a brand of politics which mixes power with virtue, and the commitment to the highest ideals and the willingness to pay a high price for it.

He also taught the Filipinos precious lessons: being right is enough justification and reward; only with personal integrity can one do justice to others; cultural uniqueness is enough reason for nationalism.

Ninoy, in his Senate days, called him the brightest of the Senators. But after years of experience, after his world had widened to include the grief and oppression he shared with him, Ninoy revised his estimate and called Pepe Diokno the most brilliant Filipino. Ninoy would tell his friends that Pepe was “the one man he would unquestionably follow to the ends of the earth.”

Brilliant he was certainly. His power rested in his tremendous intellect and his unshakeable integrity. I remember how disheartened we all felt when Ninoy and Pepe and others who were detained with them were brought to the Supreme Court in the first days of Martial Law. The Government had all the power and had exercised it without limit. Congress had been padlocked. Senators and publishers had been arrested, along with thousands of others throughout the country. The law was our only refuge, but the lawyers had taken cover in that abject dictum of surrender: When the guns speak, the laws fall silent. So even there, in the seat of justice, in the last rampart of right, we felt the limitless power of a Government to hurt. Until Pepe Diokno stood up, a black toga draped over his shoulders. Immediately, one felt the cause of law and justice pass from the Court to the accused standing before them.

I do not remember what his arguments were, but I cannot forget the power he exuded. It was the power of right and integrity. Constitutional democracy had found its proper champion. Here was a man equal to the nobility of its cause.

Pepe Diokno would always be equal to the nobility of any cause he espoused.

Whether it was the cause of human rights, constitutional democracy or nationalism, the argument ad hominem would always fail if Pepe was there to defend it. The name of Diokno was a warrant that the cause he defended deserved respect, and, for many Filipinos, unqualified support. If Pepe believed in it, there was sure to be justice and reason in the cause. Time and the truth never belied this first impression.

For those with longer memories, Diokno, in the days of the Old Republic, prefigured the kind of politics that would be possible in this country only after the painful experience of dictatorship. Diokno represented the possibility that you can mix power and virtue, intelligence and popularity, professed devotion to the highest ideals with the willingness to pay the highest price for such commitment.

For those who enjoyed the hospitality of the dictatorship in safehouses, whose anguished cries were heard by no one except the laughing torturer, Diokno was the name of hope. Hope that his or her case would reach him before they were totally broken in spirit and body.

To the men of the law, who stood by the Law, at a time when it had fallen into the deepest disrepute, he was the living example of its majesty. They tell of his prodigious memory that allowed no precedent or statute to escape enlistment in his cause; of his relentless logic and of majestic eloquence from which the corrupters of the law could find no defense except naked power.

Marcos jailed him after Martial Law. To the uninformed, Shakespeare's saying: 'The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers,' is an indictment. It is in fact a tribute to the profession as a shield against oppression. Those who conspire against freedom can do no better than to silence its best protectors. Marcos knew that jailing this lawyer was the first priority in his scheme of dictatorship.

We have learned a lot from Pepe Diokno.

Why should we fight against impossible odds? Because being in the right is its own justification and reward.

Why should we be nationalistic? Because no other people will really ever see things from the standpoint of the Filipino.

Why should we put such a premium on our personal integrity, when it is so ill rewarded in this world? Because we cannot avoid seeing our own faces and living with ourselves. Because if we cannot do right by ourselves, by our souls, we cannot do justice to others.

We will miss him. As has been said, "When a great tree falls, we are surprised to see how meagre the landscape seems without it. So when a great man falls." And yet the enemies of his ideals cannot rejoice. For Diokno, like the true lawyer, provided well for the contingency of his death. He has left a growing movement to fight on for the ideals of our nation and the principles of our democracy. He has left us his family, whom he has carefully prepared to carry on his struggle. No one can carry the entire burden of his mission, but his wife and each of his children, and each of us who loved him, are here to carry the portion we can bear.

On the personal side, I owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to Nena Diokno. She was the pillar of strength and courage on which I leaned in the dark days of our husbands imprisonment. Her brave insistence on our right to dignity and access to our husbands showed me that the end of fear was the beginning of freedom. My gratitude to her and her children must be shared by all who were inspired by the brave work and example of Pepe Diokno, for no man could have borne his sufferings and endured the sacrifices he imposed on himself without his family to support him.

This humble tribute we pay to this noble man and great Filipino must be shared by his wife and children.

To you Nena, and you, Mench, Popoy, Pat, Maris, Maitet, Cookie, Mike, Chel, Maya, and Martin — Pepe's private army for civil liberties, justice and nationalism, my deepest thanks for all the support and inspiration you gave me. For as long as we remain true to his ideals, for as long as we are Filipinos, he will never die.

Address of President Corazon Aquino on using Asian Virtues to Reach Economic Goals

Address
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On using Asian Virtues to Reach Economic Goals

[Delivered at the Fil-Chinese Chamber Federation Bldg., Muelle de Binondo, March 6, 1987]

USING ASIAN VIRTUES TO REACH ECONOMIC GOALS

Addressing the largest grouping of trade and industrial associations in the country, President Aquino enumerates her administration's efforts to effect economic recovery. She says that the success of economic recovery lies in the willingness of the people to work for its attainment. In this, she asks the Filipino-Chinese community to help with their characteristic virtues of strength and resiliency, and values of thrift and hard work. She promises to ease government restrictions on business and in return, asks businessmen to abandon their wait-and-see attitude.

An invitation to join this gathering is like an invitation to a homecoming. As many of you may know, the Cojuangcos of Tarlac came originally from Fukien. But less known is the fact that the first Cojuangco who emigrated to this country 125 years ago made his first home in this same district of Binondo. Today I, a fourth generation Cojuangco, come to you in the hope that I will be received in the same spirit of hospitality that welcomed my ancestor to this country.

A year ago, in another forum, I spoke of the urgency of the need to rebuild our country from the ruins into which it had fallen under the Marcos dictatorship. Then, as now, I had no illusions as to the difficulty of the task. Among the things we inherited from that unlamented regime were an economy that had contracted more than 10 percent in the previous two years; a foreign debt in excess of $26 billion, a huge budget deficit; and an unemployment problem of near crisis proportions.

Ranged against these problems was a government that did not even have a concrete economic blueprint when it assumed power by a revolution. Once in power, we had to move quickly to arrest the deadly deteriorating of the economy.

We therefore made an inventory of past economic policies, reviewed economic performance, and came up with a policy agenda for recovery and growth. This document became the basis for the Six-Year Development Plan that we began to implement this year.

But even as we set the economic growth targets and started the policy reforms and initiatives to support these targets, we never lost sight of the fact that, in the last analysis, it is willingness of the people – in government, in the private sector, and throughout the country – to work with firm determination towards these goals that would determine our success.

I have said a number of times that we are launched on the road to recovery, and we should be on the growth track starting this year. Last year marked the first time we were able to post a positive economic growth after two straight years of contraction. While this economic performance gives us reason for confidence, it also points up the great deal that remains to be done.

Last year, our economy grew by 0.13 percent in terms of Gross National Product. 0.13 percent is not much to crow about, but consider the context in which it was achieved: a sudden change of government, counter-revolutionary attempts to throw us back into dictatorship, the debt burden, and sluggish investment, among other things. Consider also that economic recovery did not get off the ground until the second half of last year. But, while there's reason to congratulate ourselves, there's more reason to look harder at the areas where we can and have to do better.

In particular, a source of disappointment has been our investment picture. We did not actually expect investments to grow last year, but we had hoped to hold down the decline to something around three and a half percent. We now know that investment actually fell 15 percent in 1986. This was apparently caused by the business community's wait and see attitude.

I don't have the figures with me, but my economic ministers tell me that this attitude of sitting on their hands did not characterize the Chinese business community during this period, and even the worse period preceding it. For a group that has, not only survived but even prospered under far more adverse conditions, it wouldn't have been in character for this community to have waited until things got better. The history of the Chinese community in the Philippines bears this out.

Chinese were trading in the Philippines long before the Spaniards came. They had come here to escape the turmoil of changing dynasties and the ravages of natural calamities.

Today, the Chinese community here is still the smallest in the ASEAN region. But the numerical size of a Chinese community has never been an accurate measure of its economic importance. Why this has always been so is a tribute to the strength and resiliency, and the values of thrift and hard work of the Chinese immigrant — attributes that we hope will be brought to bear on the common effort towards recovery and growth. Especially when you consider the discriminatory attitude of Philippine governments to this ethnic group, beginning with the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1902 which the United States extended to its new Philippine territory.

Similar measures followed which kept the Chinese community to 1 percent of the country's population, and yet, increasingly, Chinese took over a greater share of the Philippine retail and wholesale trade.

To every measure to restrict Chinese participation in one sector of the economy, the Chinese responded creatively by diversifying into other sectors, such as manufacturing, commerce, finance and interisland shipping.

The past is past, and I hope it will be forgotten in the larger sense of renewed pride that all Filipinos, regardless of racial ancestry, now share. All Filipinos have suffered, at the hands of outsiders and at each other's hands. And yet it is from a Filipino Chinese and his wife, Doming and Evelyn Lee, that Ninoy and I received the most heartening encouragement and support during Ninoy's incarceration. It is time now to think of what we can all do, together, to make this free country good for all of us. Our diversity is the wealth of our culture and the potential great strength of our nation.

I am aware that the Federation is the largest grouping of trade and industrial associations in the country today, just as I am aware of the collective influence it represents.

I now call on the Federation to exert its moral influence on the Filipino-Chinese community and urge it to give all-out support to our economic growth objectives.

I pledged to get the Government off the backs of businessmen, and I meant it to apply to all Filipino businessmen, whatever name he or she sports, be it Malay, Chinese, Spanish or whatever. Citizenship is in the heart, not in the name.

We aim for recovery and growth, and we are pledged that it shall be led by the private sector.

We have set in place the necessary policy reforms and initiatives to help this recovery and growth. We are a democracy again, where rights are respected, and the State acts as protector and not persecutor, guarantor and not thief of the entrepreneur's and worker's rightful share of the fruits of their labors. We have removed the stumbling blocks to vigorous enterprise, and we hope we have eliminated some of the excuses why business apparently continues to hesitate. I use the word “apparently” advisedly because I understand that business has not been that bad, but it is best to keep quiet about this in a year where we will have two elections.

I urge the business community to abandon this wait-and-see attitude, because it is an attitude that can only perpetuate itself. Recovery will come when you make the effort to recover. It won’t happen by itself. And I would like to express the wish that this community will once more take the lead. Where angels fear to tread, there the true businessman will make this profits.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the Artillery Association

Message of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the Artillery Association

[Held at Camp Aguinaldo, March 8, 1987]

KEEPING IN STEP WITH THE PEOPLE

The EDSA Revolution united the different factions in the military. It also united the Armed Forces with the people. Since then, however, there have been differences, differences between the people and the military, the people and the media, the people and the various establishments they uphold. Yet, on the first anniversary of the February Revolution, thousands returned to EDSA to relive the memory, proving once more that People Power is very much alive.

I am glad that, over a year ago, this camp was miraculously spared an artillery attack that might have wiped out not only thousands of innocent civilians and rebel soldiers, but our last hope of recovery and peace.

No one has bothered to record who were the officers and men who defied orders and held their fire. At any rate, history by now would have blurred such details and left us only the broad outlines of what we achieved and how it relates to our present time.

The Armed Forces, regardless of the factions that existed before the Revolution, are now seen as one armed force. And the military, regardless of how its several members stood with regard to the People's Revolution, is now seen as being one with the people.

That, at any rate, is how the people want to see it: Army and People as one under this Government.

Since those days of reconciliation and recovery at EDSA, the people's armed forces, the people's government, the people's media and all the other establishments upheld by the people have had their differences, disagreements and even bitter confrontations. There were numerous disruptions of the peace and mortal challenges to the existence of the government.

But, after all that, we were reminded 12 days ago that our foundations and directions have not changed. Last February 25, tens of thousands of EDSA revolutionaries returned to the scene of their triumph, bringing with them hundreds of thousands of converts to the cause.

One thing, clearly, has not changed: the people still have the power and that power is growing with their numbers and the self-awareness of their critical part in the politics of our country.

You and I who are in the government, whether we be civilian or military, are merely agents of this power. And, in the final analysis, national survival is determined not by whether we agree all the time with each other, but whether we remain in step with the people. Those who misread the national will and overestimate their popular support will fall by the wayside.

That was the bitter lesson history has taught the past regime and the mavericks of the recent past. And that, too, is the reality that confronts a stubborn communist insurgency that has yet to know that it has already lost its heart and soul, that is, the hopes and trust of the people.

The battle for hearts and minds was won here a year ago. It is now up to our men in uniform to protect that victory and extend its gains, hand in hand with the rest of the government, so as to bring peace and progress throughout our land.

Let us not allow those who would subvert our freedoms and return us to slavery convince us that our differences constitute fatal divisions within our ranks. We follow one authority: the People, and have one mission: to be one force for the common good. The celebration at EDSA cannot be denied. People Power is here to stay; democracy will endure; and we can only move forward. What is needed only is to move in step.

Congratulations on your golden anniversary. Thanks to the idealism and restraint of your men who chose wisely to side with the people, we are able to celebrate 50 years of honorable service by the Artillery Association of the Philippines.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Rededication of the Diocese of Malolos Catholic Church

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the Rededication of the Diocese of Malolos Catholic Church

REVOLUTIONARIES OF LOVE AND CHARITY

President Aquino lauds projects of love and charity. Among these projects are those of the Diocese of Malolos, which help the orphans and the homeless aged. As surely as a revolution, these peaceful endeavors will change the face and destiny of the nation.

Bulacan is known as the home province of many heroes, fighters for Filipino freedom. There is one hero from Bulacan whom I hold specially dear. His name does not appear in history books, nor was he associated with any historic movement or cause. But he was, to my young mind, a real leader, a great teacher, and a source of inspiration and strength. My father, a true son of Bulacan, was my hero.

Like many other Bulakenos raised in more peaceful times, his love for God, country and countrymen did not find unusual dramatic expression. But he was firm in his faith, true to its values, and determined to put its teachings into practice whether in his place of work or at home with us. His patience, gentleness and steadfastness were to me a form of heroism that had a profound effect on my thinking and behavior, just as the deeds of Bulacan's well-known heroes deeply affected the attitudes and destinies of many Filipinos.

Bulacan today enjoys a greater measure of peace and prosperity than do most other provinces. The sons and daughters of Bulacan are indeed blessed, and for that we must give thanks. But, as my father demonstrated to me, your traditions and reputation for revolutionary fervor have not dimmed or died, they have simply been rechanneled into everyday expressions of charity, self-sacrifice, industriousness, fairness, and care for the poor.

Jesus Christ, who preached and practiced these values, was a gentle, patient, living and forgiving man; a man of love and peace. Yet He was God and author of the revolution that changed the meaning of life itself and set all men free who cared to follow him. His Mother, though set apart by God as blessed among women, led no great battles for her race but lived a simple, quiet, humble life, calling herself "bondservant" of her Lord.

The Diocese of Malolos reaches out and supports orphans and the homeless aged, and involves itself in other civic community activities.

These are acts that will not make our history books, yet are great acts of Faith and Love, and will change the face and destiny of our nation as surely, and even more profoundly, than some of the great battles for freedom in our past. Let us continue with such endeavors, and trust that in time, we will reap the harvest. My father after all did not raise me for the Presidency, but only to be his good daughter and a Christian. And for my present work, I find that serves me well enough.

Let us pray for the continuing progress of this diocese and province that he called home.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Safety for the Workingman

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the Safety for the Workingman

[Delivered at the Philippine Occupational Safety and Health Center, Diliman, Quezon City, March 12, 1987]

SAFETY FOR THE WORKINGMAN

The Philippine Occupational Safety and Health Center is a manifestation of the Aquino Administration's commitment to provide for the safety and well-being of the people. The worker's health and safety must not be sacrificed for progress and the government is determined to reduce the incidence of industrial accidents.

Today we break ground for the Philippine Occupational Safety and Health Center. This ceremony expresses our double intent: to achieve progress for our nation and provide for the safety and well-being of our people, especially the workingman, on whom that progress so much depends.

We shall not buy progress at the price of the safety of our workers. That determination is what this Center symbolizes: our care and concern for the workingman.

It is a determination that is obviously shared by our Japanese brothers, who have contributed so handsomely to this project. Even as we encourage and hope for increased Japanese investments in our country, we are deeply touched by this Japanese investment in the safety of our people.

Progress has its costs. Every year, millions of men and women throughout the world are killed or maimed because of occupational hazards. The ILO estimates that 50 million accidents occur at work sites year after year. That is 160,000 a day. It is obviously worse in developing countries.

In our country, one out of 29 workers are victims of industrial accidents. And these are only the reported cases. Progress indeed has its costs. But we are determined to cut them.

To the Japanese who share that determination with us, may I express the gratitude of the Filipino worker and his government. May I express equal appreciation for the men and women of the Department of Labor and Employment who worked so hard to make this project happen. This is patriotism: not to talk love of country but to work quietly for the safety and well-being of one's people.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Assembly of Evangelical Churches

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Assembly of Evangelical Churches

[Delivered at the Quezon City Sports Club, March 12, 1987]

OF FAITH AND GOD'S WILL

President Aquino draws an analogy between her husband Ninoy and the biblical Jonah, whose name means "dove," which came to symbolize the peaceful means through which Ninoy sought to liberate his people.

Just as Jonah spent three days in the belly of a whale, Ninoy spent three years in American exile. However, while Jonah was set down gently on shore to successfully convert the people of Nineveh, Ninoy came home to be murdered. It was this death, however, which freed the Filipino people.

The ways of the Lord are strange but the people must trust Him because He never forsakes those who do His will.

I know that all of you in this assembly seek guidance, inspiration and strength from the Scriptures. In the words of Paul: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction and instruction in righteousness."

I too have sought counsel and inspiration from God's Word, specially during the most trying and painful moments of my life. Ninoy and I would read the Bible often in his prison cell, finding comfort and assurance in its verses.

On August 21, 1983, when Ninoy went off on his fatal journey, I prayed and searched for some passages from Scripture that might strengthen and guide him. I came upon the book of Jonah, but I saw no relevant message for Ninoy there. I went on to read Paul's letter to the Colossians, 4, verse 10: "My fellow prisoner Aristarchus sends you his greetings, as does Mark . . . You have received instructions about him; if he comes to you, welcome him."

It was this passage that I shared with Ninoy when he called me long distance from Taipei. It was the last time we spoke to each other.

We thought that Mark meant Marcos and the passage augured well. As you know, there was no occasion for welcome on Ninoy's return. Murder met him at the door.

But now, in retrospect, I see that the Book of Jonah had something to say about the future.

"Jonah" means "dove", which became the symbol of the revolution and the representation of Ninoy's non-violent approach to the resolution of the Philippine crisis.

Ninoy, like Jonah, felt called upon to warn a wayward ruler and his people that it was time to change their ways if they would avoid total ruin.

Ninoy, like Jonah, did not embark on this mission immediately. Jonah spent three days in the belly of a whale. Ninoy spent three years, more pleasantly, in American exile.

But here the analogy ends. For the whale deposited Jonah safely on shore, while Ninoy walked from the belly of the China Airlines Flight straight into his grave. At this point the analogy resumes.

Jonah's words converted the king and people of Nineveh. But to a nation grown callous with lies and false promises, words were not enough. No less than Ninoy's willing self-sacrifice would convert his people to renewal and revolution. But in both cases, a redeeming change took place.

We had missed the message of the Scriptures. Indeed, as Paul put it: "Now we see through a glass darkly . . ."

We cannot easily or immediately perceive God's grand design or his individual plans for us. For we are assured that "No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who love Him."

We do not have to know. It is enough to trust.

The Philippines looks to a brighter future today than Ninoy thought was possible when he stepped out of the plane and into his role in the final liberation of our country. But he took that step nonetheless because he had faith.

And it is by faith that we proceed on the longer journey we have yet to take to bring progress, prosperity and justice to our land. But a journey of a thousand miles begins with the first step. And only faith, given the daunting distance to be travelled, can make us take it. As with your missionaries, so it is with us. In the end, it is by faith that we persevere.

As Paul, who was the first to heed his own advice, assured the Christians suffering persecution in Rome: "God causes all things to work together for good to those who love God, to those who are called according to his purpose."

May that verse strengthen us to persevere in our individual missions. But most of all, may we never falter or fail in our love for the Savior who delivered us from the dominion of darkness at the price of his life.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the National Research Council

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippine To the National Research Council

[Delivered at the Philippine International Convention Center, March 14, 1987]

HARNESSING SCIENCE FOR DEMOCRACY

President Aquino says science and technology should address two concerns: alleviation of mass poverty and securing the future. The Philippines is rich in natural resources, which the scientist must tap to provide food and jobs. The scientist must address the needs of health, agriculture and industry in his work to ensure national progress.

The government in return will support the scientist through an increased budget for education.

It is a pleasure to be among you today, you who represent the best of our country in science and learning. I am told that the NRCP is the oldest and largest collegial body of scientists in our country, counting among its members the best minds in mathematics and the natural sciences, in medicine, agriculture and engineering, and in the social sciences and the humanities. Newspaper write-ups have made much of my concentration in mathematics and French during my college days. While these qualifications may have to be stretched somewhat to qualify me for membership in the divisions of mathematics or humanities, they do add to the pleasure and warmth I feel in being with you today.

In my first address to the scientific community during science week last July, I addressed myself to two concerns:

The first was for science and technology to respond to the urgent call of the present. I asked you to become involved in our first priority of alleviating mass poverty.

The second concern was for the future. While we are gripped by the present's urgent demands, I said then, the government's chief responsibility is to the future.

The events since July confirm the importance of both concerns. The urgency of the present, so painfully underlined for us by the ceasefire negotiations and the breakdown of the truce, is succinctly expressed in the formula of our beloved friend, Pepe Diokno: food and freedom, jobs and justice.

At the same time, the importance of building a strong foundation for future growth is enshrined in our new Constitution, which enjoins us to give priority to science and technology and their adaptation to our country's needs and capabilities.

In our first year of government, we feel most satisfied with accomplishments in the areas of freedom and justice — values now enshrined in an overwhelmingly ratified Constitution and protected by the democratic institutions we have rebuilt. But we know that freedom without food remains fragile, and justice without jobs seems hollow.

You are men and women specially gifted in science and technology, the two powers that can transform the earth, make land and sea more productive, and give us the means to liberate our countrymen from their age-old bondage to poverty and fruitless toil. Many of you have left the security of ivory-tower research here or abroad to search for ways to bring the fruits of development to our people. But I must ask still more of you.

We have land and sea, abundant sun and rain, a hard-working population. Yet the formula that will transform these factors into progress remains locked in the science and technology to which you hold the key. You can unlock the future.

Our country's struggle to produce more food and create more jobs deserve the best efforts from the best minds. Our people have suffered and waited so long. They deserve no less than the best that you and I can give.

At the same time I realize that your capability to contribute to these efforts depends on stronger structural support for science and technology. Much of the capability for science and technology depends on the strength of academic institutions' of higher learning. Thus the government's efforts to increase the budget for education, and provide tax incentives for new science high schools. These are modest starts, but they are what we can afford for the moment. I ask for your generous effort to make them succeed.

The NSTA, too, with its different sectoral councils and the research institutes under its umbrella, needs more support. My Science Secretary tells me that our support for R&D in science and technology is far below the UNESCO recommended 2% of GNP. Again the government needs your help to assure the relevance of such R&D support to the urgent concerns of food and freedom, jobs and justice. You must descend from your ivory towers and talk to the people, talk to the media, talk to the hardnosed planners in natural resources, industry and agriculture, and help us to see the crucial role of research and development in the future progress of our nation.

This brings me to my second concern: building a strong foundation for the future. Public Works Secretary Ting Jayme gave a talk on the financing of innovation and entrepreneurship. In that talk he outlined the role of NSTA in supporting and funding research and development activities. He pointed out the inadequacies of the present NSTA framework. He discussed other more daring ventures such as the Korean Technology Development Corporation. Such exchanges are useful. It is good to meet in this yearly assembly and assess how the NRCP can contribute to better science and technology. It is important to discuss the strengthening of academic institutions and the NSTA. But the future needs a firmer foundation than these things afford, and more daring than they involve.

A stronger Philippine industry may need more vigorous research and development, and a different organizational and financing scheme than we have hitherto employed. Can you help the government respond to this need?

Our efforts to give better health care to our people are greatly hampered by the lack of locally produced and therefore affordable medicines. Can you help the Department of Health build an affordable health care system for our people?

Higher agricultural productivity has not lifted the farmer out of poverty because of the high cost of fertilizers, pesticides, machines. Can your expertise link with the efforts of Agriculture and Agrarian Reform to break the cycle of productivity without improvement in the lives of our people?

The possibility of building a stronger foundation for the future demands a breaking of present patterns and paradigms. Perhaps the NRCP of the future will be divided not into disciplines but into concerns: health, industry, agriculture. Scientists from various disciplines bringing to bear their various expertise on each of these pressing areas of concern. These are but first steps into a more radical restructuring of the future role of scientists in the development of our country. As with the first steps of democracy, there will be mistakes and a great deal of uncertainty and hesitation, but, we are at least assured that in the eminently rational pursuit of science there will be nothing rash like a coup. It is both the burden and mission of our generation to take these bold steps into the future. That future is already pressing hard upon the present, and will soon add its burden to that which we already bear. The future cannot wait and cannot be disappointed. With your support behind our commitment, and God's help, we shall succeed.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Logistics Command Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Logistics Command

[Delivered at the Armed Forces of the Philippines' Parade Grounds, March 16, 1987]

LOGISTICS: SAVING LIVES

The Logistics Command was organized for the efficient delivery of personnel, supply and services to all branches of the Armed Forces in all parts of the country. The readiness of the Armed Forces is essential in the anti-insurgency operations, and this readiness depends largely on the military's capability to augment forces and equipment in the shortest time possible. Speed saves a soldier's life and, with its capable performance, the Logistics Command has saved many a soldier.

The formation of the Command some 25 years ago today was premised upon the need for a systems approach to supply management. Thus, it was charged with the development of systems and structures for the supply of personnel, material and services to all branches of the Armed Forces, as well as to other government agencies when needed.

Today, I would like to review the mission of the Command within the context of an ongoing counter-insurgency campaign.

To put the complexity of the task of this Command in proper perspective, it would be worthwhile to note that:

First, it is managing a supply system for stock that is intended for all levels of service in any area of the country.

Second, it is tasked with continuing research in requirement, procurement, distribution and maintenance management.

And, lastly, it is mandated to pursue a program of self-reliance to the fullest extent practicable.

The Command has, aside from the main depot we see here a network of 13 military supply points and a number of forward supply points across the 12 regions of the country. The systemwide inventory has been estimated at P20 billion, and the military and civilian personnel that make up the Command number in excess of 2,500.

These details are important, but I leave them confidently in the hands of those who directly hold the Command. My particular interest as Commander-in-Chief lies in the readiness of the Armed Forces in areas of operation and in the systematic capability to augment and complement their forces.

From the standpoint of field operations, the tactical necessities of equipment, transport and communication — in laymen's terms: bullets, wheels and orders — depend entirely on the performance of this Command.

The Command responds, as it should, by integrating requirement, distribution and repair. The idea is to speed up logistics by shortening the pipeline and therefore the cost of sending anything through it. A shorter pipeline not only reduces cost, it reduces the uncertainty of support by cutting down the time our men must wait for their much needed supplies.

The ability to endure privation, a great student of war* wrote over 150 years ago, is one of the soldier's finest qualities: without it any army cannot be filled with genuine military spirit But privation must be temporary: it must be imposed by circumstances and not by an inefficient system or a niggardly calculation of the smallest ration a soldier needs to stay alive – both factors that sap the soldiers' physical and moral strength to fight.

True, hungry soldiers have, through history, performed astounding feats of arms. But how much greater would their victories have been if they had been well provisioned?

That is why I have argued, almost nagged, for greater air mobility. I know that combat helicopters are not the ultimate solution to the insurgency, nor even the last word in tactical advantage in a counter-insurgency. But I do know that speed saves lives and multiplies firepower. And I will not gamble with the safety of our soldiers.

The counter-insurgency campaign, as most of you are aware, involves a pincer movement of sorts: military operations to roll up one flank, development initiatives to roll up the other. And, in the center, an offer of amnesty to those who see the futility of their struggle and the sincerity of our efforts to bring justice and progress to all our people. While the Command's major purpose is to enable the Armed Forces to be ready for combat, its capabilities can be just as easily harnessed to support development initiatives.

I understand that combat clothing and individual equipment stocks are now consistently finding their way to the field. Transport capability is being upgraded by way of an innovative combination of direct exchange and rolling out repair facilities to the field. The Command's performance as logistic managers for the Bigay Puso project receives my highest commendation, and those of the civilians who worked with you.

Marcos who bragged about his anti-communist program stole, as you know, nearly all the means to fight the Communists. He left our treasury empty. The problems this has created are being met, however, by the creativity of the Command in favoring locally fabricated parts for repair, privatizing service, and in an over-all commitment to greater efficiency.

We gratefully acknowledge the assistance of JUSMAG, specifically General Teeter's staff, in the on-going appraisal and improvement of our logistics capabilities.

But, lest we forget, it is our budget, those are our troops in the field, and it is our fight!

This Command has given a force multiplier effect to the Republic's military campaigns over the past 25 years. I trust it will continue to do so, and with greater effect. Carry on.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Agri-Aqua Fair

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Agri-Aqua Fair

[Delivered at the Philippine International Convention Center, March 21, 1987]

AGRICULTURE: THE NATION'S LIFEblood

Agriculture takes priority in the efforts towards national economic recovery. This priority follows the Aquino Administration's main objective of alleviating poverty. Among the administration's achievements in agriculture are the following: the liberalization of the market, the stabilization of the prices of grains, the rationalization of taxes and tariffs, and the provision of agricultural credit.

May I first congratulate the Fair's organizers.

I welcome the holding of this Fair for it emphasizes our determination that agriculture shall be the lead sector in national economic recovery.

The highest priority given to agriculture follows from our first objective in government: the alleviation of mass poverty in the countryside where the vast majority of Filipinos live. Our aim in a short phrase is: To make farming pay for the farmer.

We are counting on the Department of Agriculture to provide the services and prepare the necessary policies to achieve this goal.

Some of the Department's policy recommendations have already been adopted, such as; the liberalization of the market, the stabilization of the prices of grains, the rationalization of taxes and tariffs, and the adequate provision of agricultural credit.

We destroyed the agricultural monopolies that strangled the spirit of initiative and enterprise in the agricultural sector. We have returned the importation of wheat, wheat flour, and soybean meal to private business. We have curtailed corn imports until local corn becomes competitive in the world market. We have decontrolled the fertilizer trade. And, as a result, the competition has grown in that sector. With competition, prices have dropped. Bad for the fertilizer importer and dealer, but good for the farmer.

On grain prices, the Department has developed a stabilization scheme to support farmgate prices in surplus regions and stabilize them in the cities. Part of this scheme is the direct linkage of farmers and consumers. I congratulate both the Big Integrators and Farmers Organizations who are involved in this effort.

The Department's policy proposals to lower the prices of farm inputs and increase the prices of farm products are being reviewed. As recommended, we have abolished export taxes, lifted the copra export ban, reduced sales taxes on fertilizers and pesticides, and eliminated the ten peso surcharge on fertilizer which was being collected to save one fertilizer company. We also liberalized the importation of fertilizer grades.

As for agricultural credit, we are about to complete a rehabilitation package for a select number of rural banks. Other proposals of the Department are the consolidation of loan funds for specific commodities under the Comprehensive Agricultural Loan Fund or CALF, which I hope does not grow into a milking cow.

These are only some of the policy proposals of the Department that government has adopted. Let me say that the Department of Agriculture enjoys my greatest confidence in the integrity and competence of its leadership, in the wisdom of its policies.

I have a pragmatic turn of mind. I have little patience or respect for endless theories. I shall involve myself deeply in agriculture because here the payoff can be immediate. We can see our investment in the sector reflected quickly in improved living standards for our people.

Agriculture is our first priority and our last fallback. Whatever happens, a successful agriculture means that our people will never go hungry, will always be well-fed and therefore able to keep working for a better tomorrow. Agriculture is our nation's lifeblood, whose vigor it is your special duty and privilege to protect. Keep up the good work. You are Cory's special battalion in the fight for national recovery.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Philippine Military Academy's Class of '86

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Philippine Military Academy's Class of '86

[Delivered at the Philippine Military Academy, Baguio City, March 22, 1987]

WAGING A DEMOCRATIC WAR

President Aquino called the Philippine Military Academy's Class of '86 as the proudest in history because, during the February Revolution, they were one with the nation in fighting for freedom. They passed the most difficult test of a soldier: the test of loyalty.

The Class of '87 also has something to remember. During preparations for their graduation, the PMA was bombed, showing to them, even before they go to the field, the extent to which the enemies of the state will go to topple the government.

As she came to power peacefully, President Aquino vows to keep it, although her peace offerings have repeatedly been rejected by the Left and the Right. Still, she vows to lead a democratic war, a war fought with honor and humanity rather than violence.

She appeals to the rebels to lay down their arms and join the government's work of reconstruction. To the soldiers, she asks for patience and courage.

One year ago, I stood here and called the graduating Class of '86 the proudest in PMA history. That class had gone through a graduating exercise of far greater importance than any held in this field. For the Class of '86 had passed the most difficult test of a soldier: the test of his loyalty, the discovery of his highest duty. In the final days of the Revolution, the Class of '86, torn between literal duty and patriotism, had defected to the people and become the first graduating class of the people's army.

In that class, a young man stood and heard my call to protect the government and the state from any threat, be it internal or external. He heard me explain the difficulty of waging war for a democracy, of fighting for its honor and integrity without violating its principles. Lt. Edgardo Dizon answered that difficult call with the unquestioning valor and directness of a soldier. He answered it with his life.

I went to the place where he was killed. I talked to his comrades-in-arms. I learned from them what a true officer he was. His troops had been pinned down by enemy fire. Against the warnings of his troops, he refused to take adequate cover so he could keep a commanding view of his soldiers. He was killed in a hail of enemy bullets. His act defined the first duty of an officer; the duty to care for the safety of his troops.

You, who will leave here to command troops of your own, take his stern example to heart. We, the Filipino people, for whose freedom and honor he gave his life, take his sacrifice equally to heart and mourn the loss of a brave Filipino.

I had hoped that peace would be the life of our new democracy, as it had been the moving spirit of its restoration.

As I came to power peacefully; so had I hoped to keep it. God knows, I have tried.

But my offers of peace and reconciliation have been met with the most bloody and insolent rejections by the left and the right. It is clear that the forces of the extremes will not leave us in peace — to achieve the recovery and progress we so badly need.

The latest rejection was made in this field last week. It came in the form of a terrorist bomb inflicting death and terrible suffering on innocent people in the midst of a most peaceful pursuit — while preparing for an occasion meant for joy and celebration. You, the graduating Class of '87, now have your own distinction. During the preparations for your graduation, the PMA was struck by the greatest tragedy in its history. March 18, 1987 will live in our memory as the most treacherous act committed against it by the enemies of democracy.

It was a dastardly act of cowardice.

We will find the perpetrators.

And some of you of the Class of '87 will have the privilege of bringing them to justice. And you are the men for it. I have heard how well you responded to the crisis, rushing quickly to aid the wounded. It is fitting also at this point to acknowledge and commend the care and concern that civilians showed in this tragic incident. Doctors and nurses, from Baguio General Hospital, St. Louis Hospital and from as far as Manila, responded with equal concern and timely assistance. Soldier and civilian worked together in the face of a common tragedy.

You have learned the most important lesson of your entire training. Here, even before your graduation, you had your first encounter with the enemy. Now you know his methods and the evil he can do. You have seen the fate he intends for us, for your President and your people, if he prevails.

Such evil passes understanding. I ask those who are responsible for this heinous deed:

Why is it necessary to go to such extremes? Why is it necessary to kill the innocent? Is nothing sacred anymore — not the lives of the innocent nor the sanctity of a school? The enemies of democracy, it is obvious, will not play by any rules. And yet we, who stand for the truth, can only fight with honor and humanity. That is the difficult challenge of fighting a democratic war. But I know that we are equal to it.

The irony of this tragic incident is that it took place here in the very shield of the Republic, meant to protect its government and people. I have gone to many parts of our country, and walked freely among our people, protected by little more than their affection. And yet it is here, in a military camp, that the greatest threat to my life has been made and the greatest casualties inflicted. Take this lesson also to heart. It is the lesson of EDSA. We are safe only in the affection and loyalty of our people.

This field, where tradition graduates the frontline defenders of Philippine democracy, was intended by its enemies to be the graveyard of democracy.

Let us pledge today to make it the graveyard of their dark ambitions instead. Let us pledge to defeat the ambitions of the left and the right to enslave this nation again and bring down our new found pride.

To the enemy, let me say, give up your futile struggle if you have a drop of humanity and patriotism left in your veins. Democracy is here to stay. It is our people you are killing. We shall spare no effort to protect them.

Do not think you can use the rights and liberties, the promises of the Constitution, to destroy the lives and freedom of our people. No provision in the Constitution, let me say this now, will be allowed to prejudice their safety. For the first law of the Constitution is the protection of the people.

To our enemies, let me say that nothing will intimidate this President. Death holds no fear for us, neither for the Commander-in-Chief nor for the soldier in the line. One nation, one Armed Forces, acting with the energy and direction of a single hand will smite the foe, on the left and the right, and permanently end all threats to freedom before my term as President is over. This is my solemn oath.

Last year, I said, with the hope of peace in my heart, Welcome home, my soldiers.

Today I must say, with sadness in my heart: Patience and courage, noble soldiers of the Republic.

The harvest has not yet come. Our enemies have delayed the peace and progress for which we have worked so hard.

The battle has only begun. But the victory will certainly be ours. 90 years of AFP history is our guarantee of this. Congratulations to the AFP: Carry on.

Address of President Corazon Aquino at the Philippine Military Academy Testimonial

Address
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Philippine Military Academy Testimonial

[Delivered in Baguio City, March 22, 1987]

TAKING UP THE SWORD

President Aquino addresses the Philippine Military Academy (PMA) after it was bombed, after soldiers were ambushed by insurgents in Quezon, and after another policeman was shot dead. She vows immediate police and military actions against these acts of terrorism, measures which, however, must be exercised with care to ensure minimum damage to civilians. She is confident that the Armed Forces can do this even without help from outside.

Enough words have been said. It is time for results. So let me be brief. In the space of 3 days I read about the terrorist bomb attack on the PMA, with 4 dead so far and 40 plus wounded. Terrible wounds were inflicted, not the least on the physical integrity of a military camp, the Armed Forces premier school at that, and on the Armed Forces' reputation as an effective shield and protection for the Republic. As if to underscore this, I read in the papers that 19 of our men were killed in an ambush in Quezon. Always the same province.

And, just in case we have missed the point, another policeman is shot in the head. What is the death count now? 10?

These are terrorist acts. The insurgency of the Communists and the treachery of the Right, loyalists and others, may have deep rooted causes that may take a long time to remove. Economic development will probably cure both sicknesses. Government efficiency in the delivery of basic services, particularly speedy justice, should speed the cure. But the answer to the terrorism of the Left and the Right need not wait on total solutions. To a terrorist act the immediate answer is not social and economic reforms but police and military action. I told you when we were discussing the peace initiatives that when they fail, as we feared they would, and when it becomes necessary to take up the sword of war, that I want a string of honorable military victories to follow my proclamation of war. Victories of which we can all be proud. Clean victories, aimed straight at the core of the enemy, be it Left or Right, with a minimum of collateral damage to the civilians we are supposed to protect and avenge.

I want these victories. I want justice for the PMA, justice for GMA, an end to these ambushes, and victories in the field as proof positive to our people that you and I, Commander-in-Chief and Armed Forces, can protect them.

I have asked our military ally for the hardware to achieve these objectives. They have given us advice instead. So let us not hold our breaths. Help will come when it will come. In the meantime I know that we can more than hold our own. I am convinced, and you have told me that I am right in this conviction, that we can beat these threats to national security with what we have. And also with what we are: the army of the people, in whom they have, rightly, the greatest trust and confidence.

Gentlemen, let us enjoy the rest of this occasion. But tomorrow it is down to business. Carry on.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the University of the Philippines Law Alumni

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the University of the Philippines Law Alumni

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, March 26, 1987]

THE LAW IS SUPREME

Despite the dictatorship's attempts to subvert democracy, the Filipinos' love for freedom and respect for law remain alive and undiminished. The Filipinos have restored the rule of law. President Aquino calls on the lawyers and the country as a whole to make it work.

This accomplished association is accustomed to hearing words of wisdom from Presidents who are also lawyers. And who occasionally happen to be alumni of the U.P. College of Law.

I would not be breaking that tradition today if events had not interrupted the study of law that I had embarked on after college. I was attracted to the law for its discipline rather than as a profession. But not far into the course at Far Eastern University, I stumbled. I fell in love with another law student, a sharp one but haphazard at his studies. Ninoy wanted to be a lawyer, but wanted also to make his mark in history as quickly as he could. He went to Korea to cover that war as the youngest Filipino correspondent. Not satisfied with that, he served as emissary for the Government in the settlement of the Huk rebellion. In the first semester of his last year at law, we married: I to him and he to me, but I knew even then, that he had also married his destiny to serve his nation.

In Fort Bonifacio, while this country's legal institutions were disintegrating and crashing down outside the prison's walls, Ninoy resumed his law studies. This time, he went at it with life-and-death urgency. For what was at stake was both his life and that of the democracy he loved. When the military commission poised to deliver its death sentence on him, Ninoy was well-prepared and well assisted by his counsel, most of whom were U.P. Law alumni.

As fate would have it, the law degree that had eluded both of us, fell into my lap happily last year. I thank the U.P. and its College of Law for the honorary degree conferred this former student of law who, without regret, chose love above its long discipline some 33 years ago. I like to think that the honor was implicitly bestowed on Ninoy, who, but for his restlessness and energy, might have belonged to your roster of alumni. And so I now face you as President and as honorary colleague.

I cannot claim to be steeped in the discipline of law which has taken you years to master. But I think our recent experience has taught us that mastery of law does not necessarily result in respect for its aim of justice. The last President knew the law well – or thought he did. For he came to the contradictory conclusion that the law, whose aim is a responsible freedom, did not give him the freedom he felt he needed to achieve his aims. And so, with Martial Law, he set himself above the law and made his private judgments the laws that would govern this nation. The law is the first defense of our freedom and security. He made it an instrument of oppression, on the one hand, and of selective favor on the other; violating the spirit of equality that animates it.

He called this state of affairs, on the occasion of the 65th anniversary of the U.P. College of Law, “a revolution by law.” It was certainly that, for he had turned the law around on its head.

Martial Law, he said, “utilized the law to bring about what people demand, which is radical change.” The change was certainly radical: in the structure of government, in the ways of the economy, in the purposes of public service, and in the values of our society.

For a government of laws, he substituted that of one man and his friends. For a government of divided powers in which liberty would be secure, he provided the unified state in which thievery was facilitated. For a nation, proud by nature and heritage, he substituted one brought to shame by a government that was scorned by the world and impoverished by plunder.

I recall his words, not as an exercise in masochism, but to review how and why our country came to its present state. How indeed could a nation, welded supposedly by the blood of its republican heroes, by religion, by a common heritage, and by a system of laws upheld by one democratic regime after another, fall so easily into the hands of a few ruthless men?

Were the apologists of dictatorship right after all? The ease with which dictatorship was consolidated would seem to bear them out. Democracy would seem to have been imposed on our culture rather than spun painstakingly by a self-willed and self-determining people. Those arguments were heard even last year, after the Revolution. It was too soon for democracy, some people said; absolute power should be shared by the liberators and held until the people were ready.

I did not believe that. Even while I held all the powers of government in my hand, I began to parcel them out and provide for their independent exercise. I believed that I was called to the Presidency to reestablish democracy and secure our freedoms by the separation of the powers that had come into my hands.

To that end, I bent all my efforts, convinced that that was what our people wanted first and foremost: a true democracy. The results of the plebiscite proved me right, and proved wrong all the apologists of dictatorship. Our people are instinct with the love of freedom and will not have themselves governed any other way than by a democracy of laws. Laws that express the Popular Will and are reflective of the higher law of God.

Do such things as a Popular Will and the higher law of God exist? While some may have doubted, others, including myself, hold them as truths eternal. One swept aside an entrenched dictatorship and put its elected choice in power. One will reestablish and ratify those democratic principles – that respect for the rule of law – which the dictatorship had erased from our books, but which God had kept alive in our hearts.

Our people, with God's help, have restored the rule of law. It is now our solemn duty to make it work.

Justice, it is said, is the first virtue of political institution. It is clearly the first demand of our people:

Justice for the poor who were born and are imprisoned in desperate poverty.

Justice for the man of enterprise and hard work whom God has promised a just share of the fruits of his labors.

Justice for a country that deserves a measure of prosperity commensurate with the nobility and courage of its people.

But it must always be justice through law. The law, as made by the people themselves through their elected representatives. The law, always informed by the values of compassion and justice that mark our race and our faiths.

It is the privilege of the profession assembled here today that its first and highest duty is to uphold the supremacy of the law that marks our society today. In the sincere and dedicated pursuit of the law, lies the answer to many of our people's demands.

The sum of your duty and perhaps the mission of all government as well is found in the words of Isaiah:

“Seek encourage the oppressed.

justice,

Defend the cause of the fatherless, plead the case of the widow.”

Give the Filipino what is his due: freedom, justice, a helping hand to break the shackles of age-old poverty and under-development, a voice in his destiny and the rest will follow. The Filipino does not ask for much. The Filipino showed himself willing to offer everything, including his life, to give us, you and me, this chance to serve our nation. Each of us, in his own way and appointed role, will prove him right in his trust and confidence.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on education

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On education

[Delivered at the Philippine Normal College, March 31, 1987]

EDUCATION: SHAPING A NATION'S CHARACTER

Elementary education should go back to the basics: reading, writing and mathematics. A leaner but harder curriculum, which has fewer subjects that are taught well, should be provided. The inequality in education, inequality in access to books, classrooms and subsidies, should be corrected.

All these, however, would come to naught without the total commitment of the teachers, who, on the other hand, have to be better supported by the government.

When I ran for the Presidency, I pledged to give education the first priority it deserves in a free nation. For it is by learning that we become free: Free from the poverty and oppression imposed by ignorance, free to be all we can be as a gifted and daring people.

The dictatorship ignored education, except to pervert its content: to make our youth believe that tyranny is the Filipino way of politics and thievery the way to success. But, our youth were not duped. Although they had no experience or memory of freedom, they joined the fight for its return.

If the dictatorship's efforts to distort our values had no effect, not so the general neglect of our education. Scholars abroad reported that, unlike other educational systems, ours does not contribute to Philippine development. Our educators, I understand, could not deny it.

This is not the first time I address the education sector. But it is the first time that I shall try to tackle, in a more comprehensive way, some of its issues. Today, in particular, I want to address the problems of basic education. This is appropriate, I think, in the circumstances. For I address today the 1987 graduates of the Philippine Normal College, the unchallenged leader in teacher training for our elementary and secondary schools.

Your concentration on these levels is what makes your work so important. When a child is brought to you for education, it is at its most malleable stage. When the child leaves your care, it is permanently fixed in the ways you have taught it. All it can do thereafter is build on the skills it has learned. Your work is foundational and therefore critical to the future of the child – and that of our nation.

I want that foundation solidly built, well grounded in the basics of education: reading, writing and mathematics -in the two languages of our country, English and Pilipino. These are the basic skills that liberate the tremendous potential of the average Filipino child – to contribute as an adult to the liberation of the country from underdevelopment; and to his own liberation from poverty.

That is why I believe in a leaner but harder curriculum. This is the strength of the Japanese. They are taught few subjects but well. All the rest are learned through experience. Civic virtue and nationalism, for example, are not taught as subjects. They grow spontaneously out of the genuine achievements of the Japanese nation.

Back to basics will be the thrust of Philippine educational policy. But in the meantime there are problems that we must address immediately. These are essentially problems of inequality.

Some children have schoolbooks; many do not.

Only 66 out of every 100 who enter Grade One finish Grade Six. And of 55 who enter high school, only 42 finish. The statistics of our cultural and poorer communities are shamefully lower. Some classes have over a hundred pupils. In many schools, pupils still sit on the floor or bring their own stools. Students in some state colleges receive twenty thousand peso subsidies, others only a thousand. Students in private schools receive no government assistance whatsoever, and yet the public school system cannot begin to meet the educational requirements of our people.

These inequalities in our school system are clearly inconsistent with our obligation to make ours a society of equal opportunities and conducive to the full development of man.

Our system of elementary education is the only experience the State has designed which reaches every Filipino home. It is therefore the first and most important link of the Filipino child to that community which has primacy over all others – the nation.

The present effort to improve elementary education in the World Bank-supported “Program for Decentralized Educational Development” or PRODED must therefore be continued. Its objective to improve neglected schools, and therefore equalize conditions, must be supported. We have extended the life span of this Program by two years. And until its objective is met, we shall continue to support it beyond that period.

We must also extend its benefits to secondary education.

To cope with the modern world, we need more than six years of elementary education. A solid high school education is equally important. The Constitution recognizes this need and has made it mandatory on the new Congress to provide it — and for free. We have asked our countrymen, in the spirit of the Revolution, to give more of themselves. It stands to reason that we must enable them to improve their capacity to do so.

But all our objectives and programs will come to nothing without the total commitment of our teachers. They are the key element.

The present sorry state of education is the responsibility of the teachers. But the sad state of the teaching profession is the responsibility of the government. And yet we expect our teachers to be first in recognizing the tremendous liabilities that came with this government.

Nonetheless, we have made valiant efforts to improve their condition. Last year, we implemented a 20% wage increase, exclusive of P2,000 in health allowance and a one-month, year-end bonus. This year we have ordered a second 20% increase, which, compounded, makes a 44% increase in little over a year.

We have increased the budget for education from P8.7 billion last year to P12.3 billion this year, to reflect the priority I give to education as mandated by the Constitution. But, as you know, 97% of this budget goes to salaries. The other necessities for a relevant and effective school system, such as books, laboratories, school buildings and other instructional aids, remain unprovided for. Next year, these I needs must be addressed. How we shall do so simultaneously with meeting the need for better teacher compensation is the challenge that our team for the Senate has set itself.

The Senate team has prepared proposals to continue increasing teachers’ compensation together with non-cash benefits, that could equally well meet teachers’ needs, such as health care and free college education for their children.

In the meantime, we are studying the role of the GSIS in the improvement of education. There was a time when 55% of GSIS contributions came from teachers. Today, that percentage has dropped to 35%. Still, teachers compose the largest single block of employees paying GSIS premiums. I therefore expect to see the interests of the education sector reflected in the management and investment programs of the GSIS, and of the government at large. For instance, I expect policies that affect education, such as those touching on the importation of paper, book publishing and sales, school supplies manufacturing, investments in schools, to reflect both the high priority we place on education and the problems we have committed ourselves to solve: a better life for the teachers, a better education for all.

What we have talked about here will probably not excite the public interest. But you and I know that what passed between us here today will decide the future of our nation and individual happiness and fulfillment of our people.

Congratulations to the graduates. I hope I have impressed upon you the great importance of your mission and the need for patience and sacrifice.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the Rotary International Conference

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the Rotary International Conference

[Delivered at the Philippine International Convention Center, April 23, 1987]

ALL SET FOR RECOVERY AND GROWTH

The President calls on the Rotary to participate in the economic recovery of the country, particularly the alleviation of poverty, the generation of productive employment, the promotion of equity and social justice, and the attainment of sustainable growth. With its vast reach and community service orientation, the Rotary is in an ideal position to keep the Government accountable to the people.

I am pleased to extend, on behalf of the Government, our sincerest appreciation to Rotary International for holding this three-day conference for development in the Philippines.

One of the pleasures that we in this Government enjoy is the enthusiastic – not to say overwhelming – response we have been getting to our call for deeper and wider involvement in the development process. Still, I find it specially gratifying that Rotary has likewise answered that call.

We have successfully hurdled many of the difficulties that beset us when we took power; yet our successes merely point up the great deal more that remains to be done.

When we set out last year, there was no question in our minds that our first task was the full restoration of democracy and an earnest start of our economic recovery. Today, just over a year later, we can collectively look back with pride at what we have accomplished. Because we are a democracy, the enemies of democracy can still criticize but there is no question they have been roundly beaten. All but one of the necessary institutions of democracy have been reestablished. In June, Congress will convene, thereby completing the circle of our country's great political accomplishments. The political stage has been set for the recovery that is already beginning.

We have managed not only to keep the economy afloat but have accomplished what few had realistically thought possible: an economic turnaround. The stage has been set for sustainable growth, if only the debt problem will not send it crashing to its foundations. We need little more than look around us to see the signs of an economy that is finally beginning to take off.

Still, as I have said, our accomplishments merely underscore the great task that remains undone: giving a decent life to all Filipinos.

When we drew up our economic agenda for the next six years, we all agreed that it would focus on the following: first, the alleviation of poverty; second, the generation of productive employment; third, the promotion of equity and social justice; and, finally, the attainment of sustainable growth.

The economic crisis of 1983 hit the poor the hardest. In 1985, real per capita income was set back a full decade to 1975 levels. Real per capita consumption naturally fell. The incidence of malnutrition rose significantly, as did mortality and morbidity. In 1985, 60 percent of all Filipino families were officially considered as struggling below the poverty line.

This is not the kind of statistic that any country would like to lay claim to. But even more appalling is the fact that poverty was greatest in the rural areas, traditionally the refuge from urban blight. In the countryside, where the vast majority of our people live, 64 percent of all families live below the poverty line. For that reason, we have embarked on a rural-based development strategy. In the last analysis, our administration will not be judged by our people in terms of GNP increases or some such indicator, but by how far we have improved their living conditions.

This is why I am particularly gratified to note that this conference has been given a decidedly community service orientation. Let me assure you that there will be no lack of opportunities for such service.

While it is not my intention to preempt your discussions these next three days, there are quite a few areas of cooperation that come readily to mind.

We have, for instance, a project to provide financing to small enterprises, which are basically family business concerns. The idea is to extend to these enterprises financing on liberal terms through volunteer organizations that will monitor the loans.

With your extensive network, you are in an ideal position to keep this Government accountable to the people. I ask you to monitor public works projects throughout the country. Some Rotary clubs are doing this already with our Community Employment Development Program. As a result of this private sector monitoring, we have had a very high rate of timely completion of our projects.

Aside from monitoring, I ask you to help us identify projects relevant to the needs of your communities. No one can know those needs, nor how to meet them, better than yourselves. You can also serve as two-way information channels, helping Government understand the problems, needs and views of your communities, and helping bring Government's programs to the people.

It is my hope that this gathering will forge a lasting and productive partnership between Rotary and the Government. As I said earlier, there is so much that remains to be done. Our partnership should get it done better and faster.

A

USE

Toward the Constitution’s goal of truly people-based defense, President Aquino defines the challenge before the Government: to get the people involved in defending their values and communities, but to make certain that there are adequate safeguards to prevent abuses.

Our Constitution provides that the “Armed Forces of the Philippines shall be composed of a citizen armed force which shall undergo military training and serve, as may be provided by law. It shall keep a regular force necessary for the security of the State.”

In recognition of the long process that will be required, the makers of the Constitution stated the ideal and provided for the Congress to implement it. For the matter will require deep study and much discussion. I am pleased, however, that the AFP National Reservists Association has called this conference to study the means by which we can come closer to the Constitution’s goal of truly people-based defense.

I have already referred for study to the appropriate Departments other Constitutional provisions regarding our nation’s defense forces. I refer in particular to the provision for a National Police Force, in lieu of all other police and paramilitary forces. I am awaiting the study being prepared by the Defense and Local Government Departments. I realize that our people must be assured of their security. The challenge is to mobilize people and involve them in the defense of their values and communities, but with all the safeguards that will prevent the abuse of this great power.

Another area of reform involves closer cooperation between the civilian population and our military forces. Both sectors are most effective when they are mutually supportive. I saw this when I visited the Lopez-Catanauan Road in Quezon. The area is heavily infested with Communist rebels. The lack of infrastructure, particularly a farm-to-market road, has kept the area extremely underdeveloped. The road construction project being undertaken there by our military engineers will probably do more to solve the insurgency in the area than any number of battalions we pour in. I felt the great trust that now existed between the farmers and the Government, and realized how little our people ask of the Government. I was also pleased at the great efficiency of the work being conducted. Although 12 percent of the road project has been completed, only 10 percent of the budgeted amount has been spent. This is how I would like to see the great potential of disciplined forces used: constructively rather than destructively, and with the natural efficiency and honesty of our common people.

I see the same great potential for constructive service to the people in the million or more AFP reservists that this association represents. I have studied your proposals for the effective utilization of this force and have referred them to the Secretary of Defense for further study. The results of your conference, I can assure you, will be given equally serious consideration.

Even before this conference announced its theme, the essence of effective national defense as the mobilization of the power of the people was acknowledged by me. I have said again and again, I have never been safer than in the affections of our people. The gravest threat to my life and the stability of our democracy was made in a military camp. The greatest sense of security I ever enjoyed was in the midst of our people, even in the darkest days of the dictatorship.

People power is the force that is most feared by the enemies of freedom, of the Left and the Right. And well they should, for it is always in the people's name that they commit their abuses. Today marks the start of another effort on our part to give institutional and abiding expression to another facet of people power: its potential for national defense and reconstruction. I commend the initiative of the association in this respect and wish you all every success.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 34th Convention of the Rural Bankers Association

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 34th Convention of the Rural Bankers Association

[Delivered at the Manila Midtown Ramada Hotel, April 24, 1987]

THE ROLE OF RURAL BANKS

The government aims to create an environment where the private sector, including the rural banks, can effectively and efficiently supply on a sustained basis the credit requirements of the economy. The partnership between the Government and the rural banks, in particular, is a joint effort directed towards the singular goal of increasing the income of farmers.

I am very pleased to be your guest today for two principal reasons:

First, because it is rare that we have opportunities to interact with you in the face of our country's grave problems, and the need to find lasting solutions to them.

Second, I am happy that your convention is focusing on the partnership between Government and the rural banks, a partnership aimed towards national recovery. In fact, it is the nature of our partnership that I would like to address today. It is high time that we determine the terms of that partnership and base it on the lessons we have learned in agricultural credit and rural development over the past 15 years.

What are these lessons, which we have learned the hard, expensive way?

First: we have learned that subsidized credit is not the most critical factor in increasing the income of our farmers, which is our primary goal. Out of the total production costs of our farmers, the cost of credit is only 6 percent. The more important cost factors are those for labor, fertilizer, pesticides and seeds. Thus, Government assistance to farmers should be focused on lowering the costs of these inputs rather than on credit. As you know, we have done this already. We dismantled the monopoly on fertilizer supply and we removed the 10-peso surcharge on fertilizer which was being used to pay off the obligations of that monopoly. We intend to do more. We are also working on a policy to give incentives and protection to seed producers.

The second lesson we have learned is that the private sector has always been the principal supplier of credit to our agriculture. At the height of the Masagana 99 and all other supervised credit programs in 1979, Government's share of the total supply of bank credit was still only 24 percent. In 1985, that share dropped to 5 percent.

You may as well know it: Government cannot begin to meet the credit requirements of our agriculture. The agricultural sector's total estimated credit requirement for 1987 is estimated conservatively at P60 billion. The Government has less than P5 billion in agricultural credit funds at its command. Clearly, the proper role of Government in the credit system is not the provision of credit itself, but in the creation of an environment where the private sector, including the rural banks, can effectively and efficiently supply, on a sustained basis, the credit requirements of our economy.

The third lesson we have learned is that the relationship that has existed between Government and the rural banking system has resulted in the overdependence of that system on Government support and subsidies. This overdependence is painfully evident in the current state of the rural banking system. Most rural banks would not be in financial trouble these days if the system had not been so dependent on government-sourced deposits, rediscounts and subsidies. When this support dried up after the crisis of 1983, the system folded up quickly. From a high of 1,167 rural banks in 1981, we are now down to about 850.

These lessons were painfully and expensively learned. We will make the most of them. Thus, even as the Central Bank prepares to implement a rehabilitation program to set the rural banking system back on its feet, that program will be selective. Some rural banks do not need any help, and will get none. Others are beyond help, and will be treated accordingly. At the end of the road we shall have a leaner but stronger and more self-reliant system of rural banks.

Hand in hand with rural bank rehabilitation must go the reform of our agricultural credit system. Government can no longer afford to borrow high and lend low to the agricultural sector. The previous government did this for the past 20 years, with such programs as Masagana 99. Government lent money to the rural banks at one and three percent which it had borrowed abroad at 13 and a half percent. Government lending these days will be close to market rates and, at best, to a qualified few. You will have to mobilize deposits from the private sector. Market-oriented deposit rates will help you attract more deposits.

Given the lessons we have learned, and the imperatives of development we face, what should be the terms by which Government and you, the rural bankers, can be partners in economic development? To answer this question, we must first establish what our partnership is all about.

I believe that our partnership is a joint effort, made by Government with the private sector, to increase the income of all our farmers. Naturally, our main effort is focused on the low-income farmer. All our combined energies and attention should be directed at this singular goal: increase his income.

In thus focusing our efforts, let us not confuse help for the rural banks with help for our farmers. Our experience shows that helping rural banks does not necessarily translate into help for our farmers.

We must therefore ensure that whatever special subsidies and benefits will continue to be given to the rural banks are indeed passed on to the agricultural borrowers, particularly the small-holders.

Today, I should like to state the commitments of the Government in that partnership of which I have spoken.

First, I confirm Government's commitment to make farming more profitable, to increase the income of farmers. When farmers are able to buy at lower costs the critical inputs of fertilizers, pesticides and seeds, then their incomes will rise. Also, when farmers can sell their produce at higher prices, then their incomes will rise further. With higher incomes, farmers can pay back their loans.

Second, I commit Government to a more rational policy with regard to the rural banking system. Essentially that policy will call for a less paternalistic supervision of its activities, thereby giving rural banks more flexibility to respond to emerging profitable opportunities and adjust to changing market conditions.

Since this is a partnership, we expect corresponding commitments from the rural banks.

We expect the rural banks to act more like banks, that is, institutions which transform savings into loans. In the past, rural banks served more as one-way channels of funds from Government to the public. As a result, they fell under increasingly close and tighter government regulations.

We have found, of course, that government cannot run your banks for you. You know your communities, you know your borrowers. In short, only you can be the bankers. Government can set the overall framework, but you alone can make your part of it work.

This is a facet of the general economic policy I pledged to implement: to get Government off the backs of private business and its hands out of your pockets. Business, however, will find the same policy imposed on it. We intend to get business out of Government and its hands out of the national coffers and national affairs, until the State is confined to its proper role of providing for the protection of basic rights, the security of the people, and the basic well-being of its least advantaged members. There will be no favors for anyone. The power and prestige of the State will not be used for any but the most exalted purposes of democratic political community and national honor.

The rural banks play a very important role in the countryside. This is reflected in the great influence they wield in their areas. As a closing note, I ask you to use that influence for the greater good of our country, particularly in the coming elections. Join me in urging our countrymen to vote responsibly. Every sector has its own special interest to promote and protect, but come election day we should all be, first, Filipinos.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Inauguration of BFD Offices and Laboratories

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino

At the Inauguration of BFD Offices and Laboratories

[Released on April 30, 1987]

DEFINING OF A NATIONAL DRUG POLICY

ELEMENTS

The Government will cooperate with all sectors to ensure the availability of necessary drugs and medicine. In doing this, the public interest will be its first concern. Public interest dictates the reduction of drug prices. Hand in hand with this is the assurance that drugs are safe, effective, and are made available to the great majority of the people.

We inaugurate today the offices and laboratories of the Bureau of Food and Drugs, an agency whose mission and functions are enshrined in our Constitution. Section 12 of the article on social justice and human rights enjoins the State to establish and maintain an effective food and drug regulatory system. What we inaugurate here today is a concrete step towards realizing the Constitutional mandate to see to the health and welfare of our people through food and drug regulation.

First, let me address the health professionals involved in food and drug regulation, particularly the men and women of the Bureau. Your task is no ordinary task. Your work is our people's assurance that what they take for sustenance or cure will not harm them instead. Knowing how poor the vast majority of our people are, your work maximizes the value of their hard-earned wages in terms of health protection.

But even as your work is intended to maximize benefits, its failure can maximize hurt even to succeeding generations. The world has not forgotten the example of thalidomide as a tragedy of regulatory failure. Your work touches all of us, you and me, and our families personally.

Second, may I address our foreign friends. In behalf of the Government and people of the Philippines, I would like to thank the government and people of Japan whose generosity made this building and its facilities possible. In particular, I would like to thank the World Health Organization for extending sustained technical support for many of our past and present food and drug regulation initiatives. Secretary Bengzon tells me that WHO has been invaluable in helping us formulate a national drug policy. I would also like to thank the many other governments and individuals who continue to extend various forms of assistance in this area. The gratitude of our people cannot be measured.

Having addressed myself to special publics, I would like now to address myself to the public at large, whose health and medical needs, particularly drugs, have been largely unmet. In all my consultations in the various regions, a recurring issue is that of the quality, availability and affordability of drugs and medicines. From Department of Health reports, it appears that health is one of those things that the poor must also do without.

The lack of affordable, safe, effective and good quality drugs and medicines is a central concern of this Government because these things are a vital component of health services, and because they are the major, if not dominant factor in the overall cost of health care.

As a nation, we are not properly utilizing our already deficient resources for drugs and medicine. There is clearly a need for better coordination of Government efforts in this area. To that end, Secretary Bengzon has been hard at work formulating a national drug policy. I understand many meetings, consultations and discussions have gone into this effort. I would now like to outline the major elements of our national drug policy.

The national drug policy will, first of all, be built on the bedrock of competent, fair, honest, effective and thorough regulation. We are committing this Government to strengthen the Bureau of Food and Drugs – legally, organizationally, technically and financially. The reorganization of the Department of Health will include a substantial expansion of the Bureau’s capabilities. The food, drugs and cosmetics law, as well as the pharmacy law, will be amended to strengthen the legal basis of food and drug regulation. We are undertaking a manpower training and development effort in order to provide adequate support to our inspection and registration activities. In short, a Bureau worthy of its offices and facilities, and of the commitments hereby made by Government.

I expect the Bureau to spearhead the removal from the market of fake, banned, harmful and ineffective drugs. I expect that its stamp of approval will be widely accepted as an indubitable mark of safety and quality. This can only happen if its policies are sound, its technology solid, its personnel adequate, and its procedures appropriate.

As a second element of the national drug policy, the Government will be a more aggressive participant in the procurement, production and distribution of drugs and pharmaceuticals. As the biggest buyer and user of pharmaceutical products, Government will systematize its procurement in order to maximize its limited budgets for health. Such measures as bulk purchasing and contract manufacturing will be utilized to bring our people the best drugs at the lowest prices. We shall start up and operate our four herbal processing plants and expand our vaccine and biologicals production. We shall pursue the Botica sa Barangay project and link this with our national network of drug distribution for rural health units and hospitals. We shall take advantage of our dominant role in drugs and medicine to benefit our people. As we do this, I expect the Bureau to apply the same stringent standards and regulations on government as well as on private entities.

A third element of national drug policy shall consist of a package of initiatives designed to provide the right information to physicians and patients. Adequate and accurate information is a key requirement for the rational use of drugs. Some measures to control the proliferation and reduce the number of brands in the market are needed to focus scarce resources on the most essential drugs. Another initiative involves the adoption of generic labelling as a tool for educating doctors and patients on the characteristics and use of various therapeutic preparations. Our policy shall seek to encourage full information and discourage misleading or inaccurate claims.

The final element of our national drug policy is the coordination of investment and trade policies in order to achieve self-sufficiency in pharmaceuticals, while assuring good quality and affordable prices. I myself have sounded the call for a revival of free enterprise, but that call has not deafened us to our people’s pleas for better health care, nor has it blinded us to the current realities. Our local pharmaceutical industry is underdeveloped and cannot respond to the specific conditions of the local market. Many companies are captives of their mother corporations; uncritical reliance on the free market system neglects the majority of our people whose low purchasing power has made them an uninteresting market for industry. Industry can afford this neglect. Government cannot countenance this situation. The poorest are also the most ill; they are the most in need of medicines, and the least able to buy them. A democracy cannot survive when its industry cannot respond to one of the most basic needs of man.

The Government will cooperate with all sectors to assure the availability of necessary drugs and medicine. We recognize and respect the interests of various sectors but the Government has to put itself squarely behind the public interest. In drug policy, public interest clearly lies in reducing drug prices, and in assuring the safety, quality, effectivity and availability of drugs, and their intelligent use. These are our goals to which I believe we can all be committed, being Filipinos first before anything else.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Philippine Air Force Day

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the Philippine Air Force Day

[Delivered at the Villamor Airbase, May 4, 1987]

MEETING NEEDS OF THE COUNTRY

SECURITY

President Aquino underscores the need for more military hardware which will give the Armed Forces of the Philippines greater ground mobility in dealing with threats from the Left and the Right. The Philippines' security needs cannot wait on the generosity of the country's principal ally. The AFP must depend on its valor and native ingenuity to meet the national security needs of the country.

I made a solemn vow at the Philippine Military Academy to end all threats to our democracy, coming from the Left or the Right, in five years. I aim to keep it. And when I say that, I speak for the officers and men of the AFP under my command. I called for a string of military victories to follow upon my announcement of war. For there is no better cure for the insolence of our enemies than swift retribution. In this regard, I commend Army Chief General Canieso for his swift and decisive resolution of the Black Saturday mutiny.

In the fulfillment of that oath, the Philippine Air Force plays a critical role. On such important matters as national security, I put first trust on the evidence of my senses. In Lupao, aside from the need for greater self-restraint on the part of our soldiers, I saw the critical part that mobility plays in bringing our power to bear on the enemy in a timely and conclusive fashion. I saw how the lack of it can bring tragedy.

The reports I received at the last command conference on the distressingly high ratio of patrols to contact revealed the inadequacy of our tactical intelligence and our inability to act quickly and decisively on the reports we receive in the field.

In the Kalinga-Apayao effort, an attempt to encircle the enemy in a highly inaccessible area demonstrated that, with all the will in the world to achieve a smashing victory, we can only do as much as the means available permit us. I will not dwell on what happened there, except to say that our principal military supplier should not expect our brave soldiers and determined commanders to fight the insurgents with our teeth and our hands.

I have, time and again, asked our military ally for more gunships, at least 10 per region, and for other means that will give our troops greater ground mobility. At the last command conference I gave the sense of their objections: inability of our Government to support such a capability and the inexperience of our military to use it. At the conference, too, I got the sense of what the Armed Forces of the Philippines thought of their objections. I am assured, however, by Chief of Staff General Ramos that JUSMAG, at least, has a better opinion of our ability to sustain and effectively use such a force. We shall continue to press for our requirements.

In the meanwhile, we shall, as I had warned, have to depend on our valor and our native ingenuity to meet the national security needs of our country. Much as we need relevant, adequate and timely assistance from our ally, our security needs cannot wait on their generosity. With the strength of our arms and the courage of our hearts, with such means as we have patched together, and above all with the support of our people, we have enough to fulfill our pledge to bring a wide and permanent peace and a just order to our land.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Business Community

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Business Community

[Delivered at the Philippine International Convention Center, May 5, 1987]

A REVIEW OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENTS

President Aquino emphasizes the promotion rather than the regulation of trade and industry. For its part, the Government has restored initiative to the private sector with such measures as dismantling of monopolies and special privileges that dampened free enterprise and implementation of tax reforms aimed at more efficiency and equity. Every structure of unfair competition has been removed. Now in place are programs such as privatization, the provision of necessary infrastructure, and an efficient market information system.

The President also campaigns for Congressional and Senatorial candidates who will back up her programs. She notes that it is better for Congress and the President to have a shared vision of the country's future and direction.

It was only five months ago when I addressed a sizeable gathering of our business community. This was at your Philippine Business Conference. Since then, there have been so many favorable economic developments; making this, perhaps, one of the most remarkable five-month periods in our economic history. The activities of our business sector have been accelerating at such a rate that I thought it would be timely to meet with you in order to review these developments and look ahead.

The bedrock of our economic policy, we had pledged, would be one of restoring to the private sector the initiative and the principal role in the development of the economy. Insofar as Government must have a role, it would be supportive, and always informed by the widest consultations possible among the sectors affected. You would be the engine of economic growth. Government might stoke the engine when it stalls, but never to the point of overheating.

To restore initiative to the private sector, we dismantled the monopolies and special privileges that had strangled trade and dampened the spirit of enterprise. In an effort to improve the much eroded purchasing power of our people, we implemented a package of tax reforms aimed at more efficiency and equity.

After judicious assessment and wide consultation, Government has spelled out its economic priorities. We would welcome substantial investments in employment-generating, export-oriented, agriculture-based and import-substituting industries. We have removed every structure of unfair competition and put in their place such programs as privatization, the provision of the necessary infrastructure, and an efficient market information system.

This is apart from Government's own investment program in such basic services as transport, power, water supply, social infrastructure and agriculture. The aim is to stimulate demand-led growth. The Community Employment and Development Program was our response to your call for some pump-priming measures and its effects are already being felt in the economy. In fact, some economic sectors are beginning to strain with the surge in economic activity. My economic ministers have sadly advised me that this is not a sure sign of sustained growth. Well, it sure beats depression.

Our priorities call for investments that will create new jobs, and not just buy out well-established and flourishing enterprises. We need investments in those areas that can generate much needed foreign exchange, and that will put our native resources to the most efficient use.

Government is currently targetting a 33.4 percent growth in construction investment for 1987. This is up from 15 percent last year. Government expects to spend P35.5 billion in investments in the current year, and a total of P330.7 billion for the next five years. Among the programs planned is the construction of 91,800 housing units in 1987. This will benefit not only the construction and real estate industries, but also other industries related to construction.

On the other hand, the private sector is expected to increase its share of total investment in construction from 17.4 percent this year to 24 percent in 1988, or an annual average of 20 percent over the next six years.

The Department of Trade and Industry is reviewing the New Omnibus Investments Code of 1987, which will feature a tax holiday incentive. The new code will make our incentives more competitive with those of neighboring countries. It will be much simpler to administer and understand than the former tax credit scheme, and will emphasize the promotion rather than the regulation of trade and industry.

As a further help to prospective investors, the Department of Trade and Industry and its 120 industry associations are finalizing the organization of a One-Stop Industry Center. Its aim is increased coordination in Government efforts to help trade and industry and the elimination of red tape.

It appears that everything is now in place and in motion. So much so that many sectors now speak, not of recovery, but of economic growth and accelerated development.

But the private sector should not confine its role to just investments in the economy. Much to our satisfaction, a harmonious partnership is taking shape between Government and private business, a partnership whose first expression is the Medium Term Philippine Development Plan, in the formulation of which the private sector was extensively consulted.

But the private sector's role need not end at the policy formulation level. Its participation is even more important in the implementation of policies and programs. A number of our community service programs have been much improved by their implementation by private individuals contributing their expertise, experience and grassroots reach. We are seriously studying the use of private organizations as conduits for government-lending programs, to cut down on graft.

The efforts of non-governmental organizations, particularly the NAMFREL, the Rotary Clubs, the Jaycees, to monitor the CEDP program is an example of continuing democracy in action. We had people power to restore democracy. This is people power to keep it honest.

We remain as determined as ever to untangle the web of corruption spun by Marcos and his cronies. He is reported to have told one recent visitor in Honolulu: "Tell everyone, malakas pa si Marcos, at mayaman pa rin." Not everyone is happy with the way we are unravelling his empire. And sometimes zeal gets the better of those particularly charged with the task of doing it. But we reiterate our commitment to restore to the people what was stolen from the people.

When I said I want Government off the backs of business, I meant honest business. I don't want those business thieves back in this country. I don't want them buying back, with the money they stole from us, the revitalized enterprises they plundered. That is adding insult to injury.

A week from now we shall have Senatorial and Congressional elections. In July, Congress will convene. The circle of our democratic achievements will be complete. Yet even before this event, for which our people have waited 15 years and for which so many of our loved ones and friends suffered and died, the Congress which doesn't yet exist is being criticized. I am being rushed to legislate on a variety of subjects before Congress gets its hands on them. This is unfair. Many of those who will make it to the Senate and Congress have shown their worthiness in the long fight for Philippine freedom, when the odds were against them and commitment to the good involved the highest risk. Surely they will not fall short of the high standards they themselves have set.

While on the subject of Congressional and Senatorial elections, it has been said that I should stand above the fray and not devote time and energy to elections involving a separate branch of Government. This observation ignores the realities of power and the legitimate workings of democratic governments through the world.

The Constitution mandates a separation of the powers of Government to protect liberty, not to promote paralysis. The Constitution recognizes the desirability of an independent executive and an independent legislature working together towards a shared vision of what this country should be. In giving the veto power to the President, the Constitution even strengthens her hand against any attempt by Congress to change her policies and programs. It is better, of course, that Congress and President should be of one mind and heart with regards to the direction of the country.

It is therefore my duty as President and chief of the political movement that brought me to power and restored democracy in our land to campaign for those who will back up my programs. Let's not kid ourselves. The opposition will be an obstructive force. Their track record shows them to be interested only in seizing power by promoting instability. They won't hesitate to ruin the country just to get it back. Let us not forget that in 1972 they destroyed democracy in order to save it.

It has been asked: Why do I use government planes and other facilities in my campaign? I answer: because, much as our enemies would wish it, I cannot be physically divided. The President who campaigns to get the friends of her programs into Congress is the same President who is obliged to accept maximum security measures for the safety of the Republic. I have done no more, and in fact much less, than other democratic leaders before me, whether of this or of any other democracy.

This is our first election in over 15 years. I want it to be the best we have had in our history. I want it to be the model of future elections – honest, orderly and fair. I have gone around the country to campaign not only for the candidates that have pledged to support my programs but also for the cause of good elections. To that end, I have refused our candidates the use of Government resources to match those accumulated by the opposition while it was in power. I have given the opposition equal access to media, even media that is presently government-controlled, although the opposition has more money than our candidates to exploit that access. I may be sorry for this. But this is not just a campaign to get our candidates into Congress, but also an effort on my part to establish the true style of genuine elections and hopefully set the future tone of Philippine democracy.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the 13th Anniversary of the Department of Natural Resources

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the 13th Anniversary of the Department of Natural Resources

[Delivered at the DNR Ninoy Aquino Park, May 15, 1987]

BENEFICIARIES OF OUR RESOURCES

Filipino citizens should be the true and primary beneficiaries of the country's natural resources. These resources should be shared equitably by Filipinos through the prevention of monopolies, cooperatives and small-scale utilization by subsistence farmers and fishermen. Agrarian reform will determine the use and allocation of resources while national policies and programs will protect the rights of cultural minorities to their ancestral lands. Tougher laws against the illegal exploitation of resources will be a priority of Congress. Hand in hand with this development, the Department of Natural Resources must strive to project an image of integrity and credibility.

I remember that 11 months ago, I and some members of the Cabinet planted trees in this park to commemorate the launching of a national forestation program. Those trees, I presume, are alive and well and growing under the auspices of the DNR and the caretakers of this park. It is not true that if the tree dies, the Cabinet member will be fired. I presume also that the various projects initiated by the former Ministry, now the Department of Natural Resources have managed to take root and survive, despite a number of changes in your leadership and organization. You enter your 13th year as stewards of our nation's natural wealth. That number should not prophesy ill-fortune, but rather, a new year marked by increased growth, productivity, efficiency, creativity, better morale and stricter adherence to your goals and principles.

These factors will sharpen your perspectives and direct your energies this coming year. For one, it will be your first year under the new Constitution. That Constitution poses, under Article 12, comprehensive guidelines for the exploration development, utilization and protection of natural resources in lands classified as public domain. In its various sections, Article 12 also provides:

That Filipino citizens will be the true and primary beneficiaries of the nation's resources;

That these resources will be shared more equitably through the prevention of monopolies and the encouragement of cooperatives and small-scale utilization by subsistence farmers and fishermen;

That a sound agrarian reform program will also determine the use and allocation of resources;

And that national policies and programs should protect the rights of indigenous cultural communities to their ancestral lands.

A second factor, which will be to the benefit of the DNR and its role as guardian of the nation's patrimony, is the imminent convening of Congress. It has been said that the illegal exploitation of resources, specially our national forests, is due largely to the lack of tougher laws against such exploitation, as well as tougher measures for the implementation of such laws. When Congress convenes, a priority issue will be to determine as soon as possible, by law, the specific boundaries of lands of the public domain and how they may be acquired, developed, held or leased. Another issue is the need to prohibit logging in endangered forests and watershed areas. I am certain that such issues, threshed out in the open by the majority of pro-Filipino members of Congress, shall insure the fairest and most stringent legislation. People power too, expressed through local government officials and their representatives in Congress, will encourage vigilance and adherence to the law on the grassroots level in the countryside.

Meanwhile, the Department of Natural Resources must strive to project an image of utmost integrity and credibility. The new political climate is now conducive to the maintenance of your independence and vigilance. The recently concluded national elections, involving a staggering 90 percent of our voting population, have strengthened the fabric of democracy on the lowest socioeconomic levels and put the insurgency on the defensive. Citizens are now more aware of their rights and privileges, specially in the protection and conservation of their lands and resources. The limited number of forest guards of the DNR can now count on the help and support of an enlightened citizenry. Added to this, a free and inquisitive press can monitor the granting of licenses and concessions, insuring the protection of the rights of small settlers and the dispersal of resources from the privileged few to the many.

With such natural checks and balances, the DNR need not fall under the influence of foreign interests, big business, or terrorism from the Left and Right. You continue to face, I know, difficulties and daunting problems. Forest destruction continues at an estimated average of 100,000 hectares yearly. You must continue to strike the difficult balance between the full use of our resources for the purpose of economic recovery, while insuring that future generations can continue to avail of the abundance of the land. With other departments of Government, along with private business, you must help spearhead the thrust towards the processing of our own raw material rather than the simple exportation of such prime products as wood and ore. You also face the challenge that confronts all other countries of the world, and that is to maintain an ecological balance in an environment where populations continue to grow and industrialization is unavoidable.

Remember that while you are charged with the protection, conservation and development of our lands and waters and the abundance they hold, your ultimate duty is to the country's greatest resource, and that is, its people. In this, all other branches of Government are on your side. May that encourage you, and guide your activities, projects and efforts in your 13th year.

PATIENTS DESERVE THE BEST CARE
— AT THE LEAST COST

President Aquino calls on physicians to take initiative in making the national drug policy a success. She notes that the doctor is the key to the dispensation of quality, safe, effective and reasonably priced drugs. Doctors will truly serve their patients by doing their best to give them the best care at the least cost. To do this, they must first liberate themselves from pharmaceutical propaganda and rely on their informed judgment as true medical scientists.

Fellow physicians,

I use that greeting deliberately because the principal tasks of my government appear to be that of healing: of binding a nation's wounds, of effecting its recovery, of restoring the strength and integrity of its body and spirit, so it can achieve the many things that we believe it to be capable of.

In likening the Government to a physician, I try to honor and give due recognition to our native capacity to be all we want to be. I am really saying that what we need is already in us and that we need not wait on the uncertain generosity of outsiders. To honor the work we do by likening it to the restorative work of a physician is also an affirmation of our faith in the Filipino.

Before continuing, let me first congratulate your new officers. The year ahead is going to be a year of hard work for all elected officials. I should also like to thank your outgoing officers for having served during the critical period that has just passed. Your officers have a major role to play in leading the medical profession towards the excellence and devotion we all expect of it.

Today I will talk about two issues. One is a review of your profession's response to our call for deeper and more fruitful involvement. The other is about your further participation in national reconstruction.

Health and medical care is one of the key social services. The attention given to this area measures the sense of responsibility we have as a Government and a people. I am greatly heartened that your response has been wide, enthusiastic and sustained. Secretary Bengzon told me yesterday that the first three volunteer surgeons left for Palawan and Mindanao. He has told me also of the great efforts exerted by the Philippine Pediatric Society in controlling and treating the incidence of diarrhea among the children of the poor. Many PMA chapters, specialty groups and individual physicians have extended their time and talents to work with Government in delivering vital services to our people. For these, I thank you deeply.

I would like now to address the issues of the future. There are two of special importance. I am referring to the cost of medicine and the availability of doctors' services, particularly in the rural areas. I shall address the first issue here, and reserve my comments on the second for some other occasion.

More than two weeks ago, I announced my national drug policy. That policy calls, among others things, for more information on the quality, safety, efficacy and cost of drugs. I would like to focus on this particular aspect and your role in making the initiative it calls for to succeed.

The doctor's mind is the real battleground between the propaganda of the drug companies on the one hand, and the principles of drug and medical science on the other. Sad to say, science is losing to commerce every day. The pediatricians among you know that the Philippines is one of the biggest consumers of anti-diarrheals in the world yet many studies show the doubtful clinical usefulness of these prescriptions.

The ordinary patient trusts his doctor implicitly. So when he gets a prescription that costs, say, ten times his daily income, he complains about drug prices but never doubts his doctor's wisdom and care in prescribing the drug. But me ask you now to examine yourselves. Do you carefully weigh the financial consequences of your prescriptions? Do you carefully consider the true merits of the drugs that are advertised and pushed on you by salesmen? By and large, none of them are harmful; but how many are really needed, and aren't there cheaper substitutes? Have you truly served your patients by doing your best to give them the best care at the least cost?

Our national drug policy aims to make information available to the doctor and the patient to assure the more rational use of drugs. Government is doing its part to disseminate this information. I ask you to help out; and to help out first by liberating yourselves from pharmaceutical propaganda. I ask you to become true medical scientists by relying on your informed judgment rather than on the commercial hype of your suppliers. I ask you to consider both the merits of your prescriptions and the situation of your patients. There is much you can do to make a real impact on the prices and effectiveness of drugs and medicine. The PMA is particularly well-situated, in terms of organizational reach and resources, to be effective in this effort.

In the many countries where reforms in pharmaceuticals were undertaken, the doctors were a crucial factor in deciding the outcome. I am confident that it will be the same here.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the Baptist Vesper Worship Service

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the Baptist Vesper Worship Service

[Delivered at the Malacañang Palace, May 22, 1987]

THE FAITH GROWS STRONGER

President Aquino shares with the Baptists an intense devotion to certain ideals. Like the Baptists, she believes that the wife should be totally supportive of her husband, that children should be given fair amounts of love and discipline, and that a nation is defined by its people, and a people is judged by the kind of society it builds. Transformations of nations and societies take place first in the hearts of people and this is what happened during the Yellow Revolution.

It is not often that I address a Baptist Vesper Worship Service. I am not a Baptist but I have friends who are, and I know that we share not only the same faith but also the same intense devotion to certain ideals.

The Baptists are considered among the most conservative of the Christian sects. By the standards of the world today I, too, might be called a conservative. I adhere to certain time-worn truths, in the area, for instance, of family living. The Baptist wife, I understand, must strive to be the Biblical wife – totally supportive of her husband, mindful of his needs, respectful of his role as leader of the home in the way that Christ is head of His Church. I must say that as Ninoy's spouse, I was, in much of my behavior and attitudes, scriptural. My life revolved around him and our children. And that served to keep the balance of our marriage throughout the turbulent years of his meteoric rise in politics and the dark despairing years of his imprisonment and exile.

In the rearing of children too, I am rather old-fashioned in dispensing fair amounts of love and discipline. That is a fact that my youngest daughter Kris will attest to, with some chagrin, I am sure. She once complained to Diane Sawyer, the host of the TV show, 60 Minutes, that nothing had really changed. When I became President, Kris had projected that my responsibilities would keep me from checking up on her with the same frequency and closeness. She was wrong. It remains as Ninoy wanted it, but most of all, as Christ expects it. Our children are not only ours, but God's own. "Let the little children come to me, and do not hinder them, for the Kingdom of God belongs to such as these," Christ said.

The Baptist faith is also known as one of the more fundamentalist of faiths. Your philosophy of life, and the life hereafter, is distilled to its essence in God's Word. Your view of society is focused on its nucleus, the family; and the epicenter of the family which is Christ.

I would agree with your view that a nation is defined by its people, and a people rightly judged by the kind of society it has built. Even so is a society judged by the families that compose it, and families by the individuals that make it up. Transformations of nations and societies take place first in the hearts of their people. That is how it happened here, with our Yellow Revolution. That improbable event might be easier to understand when you consider the years when the hearts of our people slowly turned from despair to heroism, like a piece of steel turning in the fire. So it was with Ninoy also. At the lowest point of his seven-year imprisonment, Ninoy wrote his friend Soc Rodrigo of that experience, and I quote:

"In the loneliness of my solitary confinement in Laur, in the depths of my solitude and desolation, during those long hours of meditation, I found my inner peace. Christ stood me face to face with myself and forced me to look at my emptiness and nothingness, and then helped me to discover Him who has never really left my side." Ninoy then quoted Paul: "For the sake of Christ, I am content with weaknesses, insults, hardships, persecutions and calamities, for when I am weak, then I am strong."

Many Filipinos experienced the same light in those years of darkness. Now that that light has been kindled, it continues to spread and grow, even in the noonday brightness of our freedom. And as more and more Filipinos bask in that light, my faith in the future grows stronger. As it is written in Proverbs: “Trust in the Lord with all your heart and lean not on your own understanding. In all your ways, acknowledge Him, and He will make your paths straight.” That is an old, conservative and fundamentalist notion, but it is as true and revolutionary today as it was two thousand years ago. And we Filipinos can attest to it.

I thank our Baptist friends for having been, and continuing to be, part of our inner revolution. Thank you for your prayers for the success of our recent elections. Please continue praying, this time, for the transformations in Government that will soon take place with the convening of Congress. May Christ once again hold the floor and steer its members to straight paths as they work to serve our people.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 70th Anniversary of the Department of Agriculture

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 70th Anniversary of the Department of Agriculture

[Delivered at the DAF Compound, May 29, 1987]

A BETTER LIFE FOR FARMERS

The bottomline of Government efforts in agriculture is to increase the income of the Filipino farmer. After setting the basic conditions for profitable farming, the Government is determined to make Philippine agriculture robust, long-lived and strong.

Binabati ko ang Department of Agriculture, kayong mga kawani at opisyaes nito, ng isang maligaya at makahulugang pagdaraos ng inyong ika-pitumpung anibersaryo. Hindi nakapagtataakang ang kagawarang ito ang isa sa mga unang naitatag, bilang isang kawanihan muna noong 1901, ng bagong Republika ng Pilipinas. Ito'y nagpapatunay lamang ng kahalagahan ng pagsasaka sa ating kabuhayan bilang isang bansa. At pagpapatunay din sa makasaysayan at mahalagang katungkulang nakaatang sa balikat ng Department of Agriculture at sa mga magsasaka ng Pilipinas.

Isang taon na ang nakalipas buhat nang ako po'y huling tumayo sa harap ng ganitong pagtitipon.

One year has passed since we gave honor to our nation's farmers. For, no sooner had we struck off the shackles of political slavery than we proclaimed the revival of Philippine agriculture to be the first priority of our new democracy. We would do this, we declared, by making farming a truly paying proposition for the farmers. Our first goal would be increasing immediately the income of our farmers. That would be the bottomline of any and all initiatives we would take in agriculture.

Today, one year later, we can say that we have set in place the basic conditions to make farming profitable. We have put life back into Philippine agriculture. What remains is to make it robust, long-lived and strong.

This is still a tall order. A lot remains to be done.

Public investments must support the productive work of our farmers and agribusiness entrepreneurs. But, since our resources are limited, Government investments should be focused on those activities and projects that will have the most immediate impact on farmers' incomes.

We should therefore invest in irrigation systems, in farm-to-market roads, and in communication and information systems that will enable the farmer to learn new methods and find immediate markets for his produce.

Along with these, and other measures such as improving extension services, we must provide adequate credit.

In these measures, I assure you the Administration will extend the fullest cooperation and support to the Department.

I said I would govern by consultation. I am pleased to note that this has been followed by your Department through the national agriculture and fisheries councils. Let me assure you that the feedback you have given us from these councils, in which the private sector is represented, will inform our decisions regarding agriculture.

Lastly, let me dwell on agrarian reform. First let me state the first principle of any policy in this area: Agrarian reform must produce a better life for our farmers. It must increase incomes. It must be sustainable and effect a real and durable improvement in the lives of Filipino farmers. Distribution for the sake of distribution is not enough. The principle we defend and for which we shall work and devote all our energies and the prestige of our office is a better life for the Filipino farmer.

In the past few weeks, a lot has been said about how we should go about land reform. Several issues have been raised; issues of legality, of technical feasibility and financial capability. Although most of the issues regarding land reform have been resolved, several issues regarding legality, technical feasibility and financial capability remain unresolved. Saving the resolution of those issues for a later occasion, let me state certain things that will not change:

One. I truly believe that agrarian reform is necessary for our people and for our future, and thus I have pledged to see that agrarian reform is carried out, and carried out soon;

Two. I believe that in order to successfully implement agrarian reform, we should develop a program that is within the present capabilities of our Government to manage and finance;

Three. I believe that agrarian reform is a process to which our Government and the public are jointly committed and engaged. This requires intensive consultation, consensus and cooperation between all Filipinos. To generate such a commitment and cooperative involvement, our agrarian reform program must have a strong training, education and community organization component. I have seen what these factors can produce in San Simon, Pampanga. There I saw self-reliance produce dignity and generate energies that many said our farmers were not capable of.

Finally, let me go back to my first principle. I am for agrarian reform, not for the sake of the thing, but for the improvement it promises in the lives of Filipinos. I am for agrarian reform because it promises to give the farmer a better life. It is not enough for us to subdivide our present miseries on the land. Division must produce improvement. We shall go for an agrarian reform program that will succeed. It may not be everything everyone wants. But it will succeed in doing what it sets out as its goal. That goal is a better life for the farmer.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the Elementary School Principals

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Elementary School Principals

[Delivered at the Malacañang Palace, May 29, 1987]

THE ROLE OF SCHOOL PRINCIPALS

President Aquino expresses her thanks to schoolteachers for the fairest and most honest elections in the country's history. She notes that the schoolteachers played a key role in making democracy happen. At the same time, she reminds school principals that, as the teachers' superior, theirs is a double responsibility: they must uphold the morale and standards of schoolteachers who are charged with the task of uplifting the integrity and education of the youth.

Since the elections, I have looked forward to this occasion in order to deliver a brief, but deeply felt message. And in this I believe I speak for all our people.

Our nation thanks the schoolteachers for the fairest and most honest elections in the history of our country. I say this again, in spite of the charges of electoral fraud that have been hurled. Because all sides know that the elections were fair and that the results accurately reflect the popular choices.

The elections were a stirring example of democracy in action. And the schoolteachers played a key role in making it happen.

In your invitation to me, you said that the teacher in the classroom works in a very sensitive area because he or she shapes the attitudes and values of our youth. In a very palpable sense, teachers are making the future. They hold our children in their hands. In discharging this heavy responsibility, the first important step has been taken. The stirring example of their dedication in the last polls will do more than any number of classroom hours to imbue our children with a profound patriotism.

Even as we reiterate the tremendous responsibility of the schoolteacher in moulding our youth, and underscore the honor and nobility of their role, we point up the double burden and responsibility of their superiors – the school principals. You must hold up the morale and the standards of those charged with uplifting the integrity and education of our youth.

Even as we ask our teachers to be an inspiration and support for our youth, so must the school principals be an inspiration and support for their teachers.

It is said that our children spend most of their waking hours in school, and that is why school is so important in the formation of the right values and skills. We can also say that the schoolteachers spend most of their waking hours in school. It is true for them also, that the school plays an important part in shaping their values – the very values they teach our children. This is the responsibility of the school principals. Treat your teachers fairly and with the respect you expect them to accord you. Encourage them to turn to you with their problems, and help them where you can. This willingness to be a helpmate and support will repeat itself in how they treat their students. The school is what all of you make it – principal, teachers and students. Make it a place of right living. A place where the right values are taught and practiced. A place where our youth can learn the right standards by which to judge our world and acquire the inspiration to change it.

In closing, may I congratulate the new officers of the Philippine Elementary School Principals Association. I wish you a successful term. I take this opportunity to invite you to join with us, the Government, in studying the many problems that beset Philippine education. We look to your wealth of experience to guide our future decisions in this field.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Inauguration of Our Lady of Peace

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the inauguration of Our Lady of Peace on EDSA

[Delivered at Our Lady of Peace Shrine, EDSA, May 31, 1987]

THANK GOD FOR THE WONDERS OF EDSA

At the inauguration of Our Lady of Peace Shrine on EDSA, the site of the February Revolution, President Aquino expresses her deepest thanks to God and the Virgin Mary for the wonders that transpired on this avenue. On behalf of the Filipino people, the President is thankful for the rebirth of democracy in the country and the overwhelming ratification of the new Constitution.

Shrines and monuments that commemorate political victories are usually built in battlefields, over the mass graves of heroes, or where the executioner has spelled the martyr's blood.

We are happy and proud, but most of all deeply thankful to God, whose spirit moved so mightily along EDSA for the privilege that allows us now to build our marker, not where men fought and fell, but where they reconciled with their estranged brothers and rose as one from humiliation to the greatest pride in that miraculous liberation.

We thank God for the wonders that transpired on this avenue. We thank him for our new and vibrant democracy, anchored now in a Constitution that implores His aid and guidance in defining a Government that is humane and just. We thank Him for the miracle of a concerned and discerning electorate that turned out massively and voted overwhelmingly to ratify that Constitution. This against the prediction of experts that the people were only good for one people power exercise, that no one really bothers to vote in plebiscites over difficult questions. We thank God for the recently concluded Senatorial and Congressional elections – by His protection and grace, and by most objective accounts, the most peaceful, honest and widely attended election in our nation's history. We thank God for the victory of those who have always stood by democracy, and who will strengthen and defend it in the months and years to come. We thank God again for a people who defied the experts again by rising early, patiently awaiting their turn at the polls, and filling out their ballots completely. We thank God for a people whose powers and achievements have been prodigies and miracles. We thank Him for our answered prayers, and for miracles yet to come from Him through his noble and chosen people. For it is written in Corinthians: "No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who love Him."

We thank God for the peace we now celebrate and seek to sustain, not only here in this intersection that was the crossroads of our destiny, but everywhere in this country that seeks His wisdom, mercy and strength. Christ said, "My peace I leave with you; my peace I give you. I do not give to you as the world gives. Do not let your hearts be troubled and do not be afraid."

It was that peace that must have filled the heart of Mary even as she watched her Son dying on the cross. For she knew by faith that beyond the suffering, beyond the iniquities visited by men upon men, her Son would bring peace and the final victory.

As the angels sang after she gave birth to her Child: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men on whom his favor rests." And so it was in EDSA.

In a shining moment in the world's history, God's favor came to rest on Filipinos. It was just as Mary sang in her own moment of joy and thankfulness: "My spirit rejoices in God my Savior . . . He has performed mighty deeds with His arm; He has scattered those who are proud in their inmost thoughts. He has brought down rulers from their thrones but has lifted up the humble.”

Let us join Mary, a true Lady of Peace, in her praise and gratitude for a God that loves and a God that cares. May the grace her Son Jesus Christ gave us at EDSA work in our hearts wherever we are, whatever we do, in more years of peace to come.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the GSIS Golden Anniversary

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the GSIS Golden Anniversary

[Delivered at Government Service Insurance System, Arroceros, June 1, 1987]

A NEW BEGINNING FOR GSIS

The GSIS should be restored to its former strength and original mission as the country's premier social insurance institution. A GSIS member herself, the President sees the importance of promptness on the part of GSIS in giving each member the benefits and privileges due him. The President is pleased to note the beginning of the transformation of GSIS from extravagance to economy, from losses to gains. The President, however, sees a lack of cohesion in the institution's social security set-up. She would like to see a consolidation of all insurance packages into one integrated scheme without diminishing the benefits already enjoyed by GSIS members.

On the occasion of your Golden Anniversary, your President and General Manager, Sonny Belmonte, wanted to bring all of you to Malacañang for a courtesy call. Ang sabi ko, it's your anniversary, it's your celebration – I'll come to you.

You have given me a wonderful reception. I hope the way you received me today is reflective of the way you receive and service the 1.4 million members of the System. I am, after all, just one of them.

I have just received my policy contract as a public servant and member of the System. I shall treasure it, and, you can be sure, I shall collect on it should need arise. I shall treasure it for what it represents, for what it offers and provides, and for what it can do for the civil servant and his family, in their time of need. But this policy is only as good for the civil servant as you make it.

Sa akin pong palagay, ang pinakaimportante sa aming mga miyembro ay ang pagtanggap ng aming benepisyo sa oras mismo ng aming pangangailangan. To my mind, retirement benefits which are granted months after a government employee has retired have substantially lost their usefulness, a funeral benefit paid out after a member has been buried has lost its meaning and betrayed its intention, a monthly pension delayed may actually come too little and too late for the increased need of the pensioner.

The bottomline is that everytime you issue a policy contract to a member, you are committing to pay his benefits and privileges not at the time of your choice but at the time of his need; not at the time when you are able to provide but at the time the member needs to be provided for.

I took these things into consideration when I was looking for a President and General Manager for this institution. I felt that the person for the post should not only share my thoughts on what GSIS is and should be, but should also have the capability to restore GSIS to its former strength and original mission as the State's premier social insurance institution.

Looking over your president's report, I note with satisfaction the direction in which he has set you, the transformation that has begun. A transformation from extravagance to economy, from losses to gains, from deficits to surpluses, from ignominy to high esteem in the eyes of our people.

I particularly appreciate your P31 million savings on administrative expenses. It is a good and auspicious beginning.

I note with equal satisfaction the other financial gains your management has reported. They are encouraging signs of growth and improvement, and indeed serve as assurances of a better future for your members.

Regarding our policy on privatization, I appreciate your desire to extract the best price for the assets you hold. You should indeed maximize returns on the disposal of your properties, as you have apparently been doing. As for that P2.5 billion building which you inherited from the past regime, how you dispose of this is a crucial test of your ingenuity, managerial ability and business acumen. I am sure you will exercise the same prudence and fidelity to the principle of privatization that has marked your dealings thus far.

With regard to housing, may I say that while Executive Order No. 90 transfers the operation of a home mortgage market to the National Home Mortgage Finance Corporation, your housing program can continue as a complement to the Corporation's functions, giving special attention to the housing needs of Government employees.

I note your initial accomplishments in your general insurance business. But there is a great deal more that needs to be done, particularly in the matter of extending coverage to all Government property.

But what is really of paramount concern to me is your social insurance responsibility. This is, after all, the reason for your being. Through you, Government extends protection to its workers. Unfortunately, I see a lack of cohesion in your social security set-up.

For while you provide life insurance, you also have independent coverages for retirement, Medicare, employee compensation, disability and survivorship. The simultaneous existence of different and independent insurance coverages results in duplication of benefits and the charging of multiple insurance rates, not to mention a larger overhead. I am instructing your President and General Manager to consider the consolidation of all existing insurance packages into one integrated scheme; without, of course, diminishing the benefits already enjoyed by your members. The aim should be to remove disparities among the retirement schemes of the various sectors of the Government.

And finally, I am equally pleased to note the decentralization moves you have initiated to bring the GSIS closer to the grassroots with more complete frontline services. That's the test of good government: Does it finally deliver? No amount of corporate success can compensate for any failure you incur in your first responsibility to provide prompt, efficient and honest service to your members.

In closing, I would like to say that your Golden Jubilee Celebration is very timely and appropriate to what is unfolding in our country today. A jubilee means an emancipation and a restoration. And that is what is happening both here in the GSIS and throughout our country. We have begun to free ourselves from the waste and fraud and neglect of the past, and we are on the way to restoring the public service to its true character and mission: honesty and efficiency in the service of the country. This is a new beginning for the country and for the GSIS, in particular; a beginning marked by the enormous and deeply heartening trust and confidence that our people have in all who serve in the name of the Republic.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Kalayaan Village Groundbreaking Ceremony

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Kalayaan Village Groundbreaking Ceremony

[Delivered at MIA Avenue, Parañaque, June 2, 1987]

FULFILLING A PROMISE

At the groundbreaking ceremony of the Kalayaan Village housing project of the National Housing Authority, President Aquino fulfills her promise to do something about the housing problems of public school teachers and members of the police forces. The first of several housing projects, the village will be home to 806 police families and educators by the end of 1987. The occasion also marks the launching of 17 new slum improvement projects of the NHA in Metro Manila.

I have said, the time for talk is over; the time for action is now. One of the things about the National Housing Authority that has pleased me is precisely this action-orientation. It was not too long ago that I acknowledged the housing problems besetting our public school teachers and the members of our police forces – these indispensable and much neglected sectors of the public service. I promised to do something about it. Not long after, NHA General Manager Lito Atienza was in Malacañang with the blueprints and models for several housing projects. Today, we stand here in this groundbreaking ceremony to give concrete fulfillment to my promise.

The Kalayaan Village project is only the first of several housing projects which we shall undertake to meet your housing needs. This village will be home to 806 police families and educators by the end of 1987, which is not too far away. It is our way of expressing belated recognition of your great services to our people.

Today's occasion also marks the launching of 17 new slum improvement projects of the NHA in eight cities and municipalities of Metro Manila.

I congratulate the NHA for its deep commitment to meeting the housing needs of the poor, and for its readiness to answer the Constitution's call to make decent housing available to our poor and underprivileged countrymen.

Some have commented that it is provisions like this that spoil our new Constitution. What relevance does housing have in a document that should be about political liberty and democratic institutions? The answer is plain. It is projects like these that give our people a real stake in democracy. When democracy goes hand in hand with a life of dignity, our people will readily defend it with their lives.

Once more I congratulate the Agency on its performance. To the first beneficiaries of this housing project, some of our school teachers and police, I wish you all the best.

Address of President Corazon Aquino at the Command and General Staff College Graduation Rites

Address of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Command and General Staff College Graduation Rites

[Delivered in Fort Bonifacio, June 5, 1987]

A CITIZEN ARMY IN THE MAKING

Addressing the graduates of the Command and General Staff College in Fort Bonifacio, President Aquino announces the abolition of the Civilian Home Defense Forces and other paramilitary units as called for by the Constitution. These forces have made more enemies than friends, more Communists than loyal citizens. The Constitution suggests, however, the integration of the CHDF into the regular force or the creation of a citizen armed force to take up the slack after the CHDF is abolished.

May I first congratulate the Class of '87 on its graduation. You are the first graduating class of the College in this year of full democracy. The past year has given you a sense of the new dimensions that the restoration of freedom and civil rights has opened up in the theory and practice of military leadership. The middle of this year will see the opening of Congress and the final division of the powers of Government among its three counter-balancing branches. Although the Armed Forces remains the special constituency of the President and Commander-in-Chief, the separation of powers adds new responsibilities and duties to all of us in the military. In the meanwhile, the problems that are specifically our concern remain with us, largely unresolved.

The repeated affirmations of our people of their iron commitment to democracy proves that the emotional and intellectual attractions of Communism have greatly weakened among our people. We must not, however, become complacent. Many structural reforms are needed to make our country proof against Communism. Moreover, Communism's terrorist grip remains something to reckon with.

It is a truism in counter-insurgency strategy that we must continuously deny the countryside to the insurgent. A continuous Government presence must be felt in rural communities. Armies come and go in their periodic sweeps, but the communist terrorist, often operating alone, remains. The Armed Forces has neither the numbers, nor the duty, to provide a constant presence to offset the pervasive climate of insurgent terrorism.

In the past, that requirement was met by the Civilian Home Defense Forces. But these forces made us more enemies than friends, more Communists than loyal citizens of democracy. Predictably, when the Constitutional Commission convened, it called for the abolition of these and other paramilitary units. Congress and I are sworn to defend the Constitution and achieve its promises. I intend to perform. So will Congress, I am sure. The CHDF will be abolished and its place will not be taken by other paramilitary units under a different name. But I also pledged that I will not compromise the security of our people; I will not relent in my determination to destroy all threats to democracy from the Left and the Right in five years, and I will take all measures necessary to achieve this aim so help me God. I said before the Mindanao representatives last year that the security presently afforded by the paramilitary units will continue to be provided, even if we have to enlarge the military establishment. Communism will not win in the Philippines by default. It will not win, period.

The Constitution supports me in this. For the very article that abolishes the CHDF, suggests its integration into the regular force or any measure that will preserve and enhance our capability to discover and destroy the enemies of freedom.

The Constitution that mandates the abolition of the CHDF has wisely provided a way to take up its responsibility to secure our communities.

Section 4, Article XVI of the Constitution provides that ‘The Armed Forces of the Philippines shall be composed of a citizen armed forces which shall undergo military training and service as may be provided by law. It shall keep a regular force necessary for the security of the State.’”

This is a recognition that people power is the backbone of effective national defense and that, in a democracy, the sword must be wielded not primarily by a military caste but by the nation in arms.

The Secretary of Defense, the Chief of Staff and other Department Secretaries have been involved in earnest consultations on how to effect both the abolition of the CHDF and the creation of a citizen armed force to take up the slack that will be created. The expansion of the regular military establishment will entail an additional half to three-quarters of a billion pesos more in military expenditures. We need to husband our limited resources for the economic measures that will dry up the roots of insurgency over the long run, even if we recognize the need for a sufficient military capability in the short run to buy time for our socioeconomic initiatives to bear fruit.

We shall therefore proceed to implement the existing law on the creation of a citizen army, specifically the National Defense Act. Following the organization of these forces, they shall be called into active duty by me, as Commander-in-Chief, in areas of heavy insurgent activities to assist the regular armed forces. These units shall be recruited from the communities that need to be protected, from among the best of its able-bodied citizens. Present CHDF members shall be processed to test their qualification to join these new units and a social program will be devised to facilitate the reentry of others into regular civilian life. These citizen armed forces shall be organized in the pattern of regular AFP formations, and shall be subject to military justice and discipline. To the regular virtues and qualities of the soldier, we shall add to our fighting capabilities the home loyalties of our local citizen armed forces and their special knowledge of the terrain and the communities they are defending.

We shall prove that the introduction of the democratic element, even in the rigid occupation of the soldier, will result in an addition to the power, rather than in a reduction in the effectiveness, of our national defense effort.

Even as you graduate, a new factor has been added to the national defense equation: People Power. Study it well. We live in fluid times; times of challenge and, yes, times of risk — but also times of great opportunities for even greater achievements than those for which our nation is already renowned.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the National Artist Award Conferment

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the National Artist Award Conferment

[Delivered at the Cultural Center of the Philippines, June 11, 1987]

WHERE THE ARTIST IS FREE TO CREATE

Conferring the National Artist Award on Atang de la Rama, President Aquino says that the best in culture and the arts is achieved in a climate of political freedom. A democratic republic is one which guarantees the freedom to create, with no special instruction attached.

I regret I am not seen often enough attending cultural events. I know my presence in expositions and celebrations of the arts is not as marked as that of first ladies of past administrations, most specially the last. It is not that the new Government does not concern itself with art and culture. It does, and not only by natural inclination, but, more dependably, by the injunction of a Constitution which, in five sections, defines the State's responsibility to preserve, enrich and encourage the dynamic evolution of Filipino culture. However, this Administration does have one limitation. It does not have a First Lady. Or rather, I am both the President and First Lady, and that imposes the most unusual and stringent demands on my energy and time.

Culture and the arts certainly have a place in our new climate of social and political freedom. I would even say that many barriers limiting their growth and evolution have been removed. For one, the stigma of political patronage and control has been lifted. Culture, especially when subsidized by the State, is no longer regarded as a propaganda tool. The rich tapestry of our ethnic heritage is no longer used to cover the multitude of sins committed by a gross and tribal tyranny. Also, the atmosphere of favoritism, elitism and exclusiveness has been largely dispelled.

I admit that I and other members of the Government have our individual tastes in the arts. But the last thing we would do is impose our tastes on an entire country.

Patronage should not impose its taste, however liberal it may be. What should be supported is not a particular kind or style of art, or any special theme, but the talents that make art happen in all its rich diversity.

As a consequence, I will be brief. What art serves, I leave to the artists to decide. A democratic republic guarantees, but cannot impose any special instruction on the freedom to create. All I can say is that, if we go by the historical record, the best is achieved in a climate of political freedom. But I'm no expert in the history of art, and if after all I am wrong, and slavery has produced art, it can't have been worth it – at least from the viewpoint of the slaves, which is the only viewpoint that counts, because it is the human viewpoint. And if art has a moral purpose, then it should never be achieved at the cost of freedom.

It is my privilege today, and proof of Government concern and support for the arts and for those who have devoted their lives to it, to witness the conferment of the National Artist Award on Atang de la Rama. Honorata de la Rama-Hernandez, also known as Queen of the Zarzuela, "Reyna ng Kundiman" and "Mutya ng Dulang Tagalog," deserves more than our awards. She deserves to be known and remembered by all Filipinos. She did not only give the best years of her life to Philippine drama and song, she was also a fierce and tireless patriot.

Talumpati
ng
Kagalang-galang Corazon C. Aquino
Pangulo ng Pilipinas
Sa pagdiriwang ng 1987 Araw ng Kalayaan

[Ipinahayag sa Quirino Grandstand, ika 12 ng Hunyo, 1987]

“MULING KAILANGAN ANG KAGITINGAN”

The country’s fight for freedom and democracy is far from over. Enemies of the state are out to prove to Filipinos that Government is not in control. The congressional elections, however, proved that the enemies of democracy do not have the support of the people. The President reassures the people that Government, with the cooperation of a concerned citizenry, has the capability to stop terrorists from destroying this democracy.

Sa katapusan ng buwang darating, ang Kongreso ng Republika ng Pilipinas ay magpupulong. Lahat ng mga institusyon ng demokrasyang Pilipino ay nasa kani-kanilang lugar na.

Mayroon na tayong Pangulong nahalal sa demokratikong paraan, mayroon na tayong tunay na malayang Korte Suprema, at isang Kongresong tunay na kumakatawan sa mamamayan.

Ngunit ang laban ng Pilipino ay hindi pa tapos. Ang mga kaaway niya na naglalayong manira, mang-alipin at sirain ang ating mga karapatan at kalayaan, at muli hilahin tayo sa hindi na maka-Diyos na pamamaraan at pagmamalupit ay narito pa at nagnanais gawin ang kanilang masamang layunin sa kahit na ano pa mang paraan.

Ang mga kaaway natin ay hindi tayo hahayaang maranasan ang kaligayahan, katahimikan, at mga biyaya na dulot ng demokrasya.

Ang nakaraang eleksiyon ay isa na namang pagpapatunay na silang mga kaaway ng ating demokrasya ay walang suporta ng mga mamamayan. Ang mga kaaway na ito ng ating kalayaan ay walang paggalang sa mga mamamayan, gayundin sila ay walang paggalang sa hatol ng mga mamamayan. Ngayon, sila ay nananakot at pumapatay upang maipalabas lamang ang kanilang kagustuhan at masamang intensiyon sa mga mamamayang Pilipino.

Sa loob lamang ng limang araw, ang karahasan sa lungsod ay nagdulot ng kasawian sa tatlong pulis at dalawang sundalo. Dalawa pang pulis ay malubhang nasugatan. Noong isang araw, ang kandidato ng Partido ng Bayan, na si Bernabe Buscayno, ay nasugatan sa ambush ng mga hindi kilalang lalaki na kunwari ay mga sundalo.

Alam ko na marami sa inyo na mahal kong mga kababayan ay lubhang nag-aalala.

Ang inyong tanong – ano ang dapat gawin? Ang mga terorista ay dinala na ang digmaan sa lunsod. Ang aking sagot: Dalhin natin ang digmaan sa kanila.

Kanilang ginambala ang katahimikan ng ating mga tahanan at katiwasayan ng ating pamumuhay na siya nating pinaglaban at sinakripisyo; kailangan natin silang pagbayarin sa mga kaguluhang ito.

Ang mga kaaway ng ating kalayaan, na lubhang nahihiya at nagtatago sa kaduwagan, ay patagong sumasalakay, upang ang ating mga militar at pulis ay hindi sila malabanan ng parehas. Lubhang matitindi ang kanilang ginagawang pagsalakay upang paniwalain kayo na ang inyong Gobyerno ay hindi kayo kayang protektahan.

Ako ngayon ay narito sa inyong harapan upang ipaalam sa inyo na ang inyong Gobyerno ay kayang sugpuin ang mga pananakot at paghamon na kanilang ginagawa.

Subalit tulad din ng mga hamon at pagbabanta na ating tinalo noong nakaraan, muli kailangan natin ang kagitingan, pangangalaga at matiyagang pagbabantay ninyo, mga mahal kong kababayan.

Kayo ngayon ay aking tinatawagan, mga mahal kong kababayan, na sana'y kayo ay makipagtulungan sa ating militar at pulis upang hulihin ang mga duwag nating kaaway. Kayo ay tinatawagan ko upang ipaalam agad sa pulis at militar ang mga taong inyong pinaghihinalaan na maaaring kasangkot sa mga kaguluhang ito. Kayo rin ay aking binabalaan na huwag ninyong labanan ang mga teroristang ito na kayo lamang. Sila ay may armas at madaling pumatay sa inosente at walang armas. Ang inyong tungkulin ay isumbong sila upang pangalagaan ang inyong mga tahanan at pamilya. Hayaan ninyo ang ating mga pulis at militar upang gawin ang nararapat sa kanila. Sa pangangalaga at matiyagang pagbabantay ng ating mga mamamayan, naniniwala ako na kaya nating talunin ang mga kaaway na ito sa madaling panahon.

Tinatawagan ko ang ating mga OICs sa Metro Manila at sa lahat ng panig ng bansa na bigyan nila ng kaukulang suporta at tulong ang ating mga militar at pulis sa pakikipaglaban sa ating mga kaaway. Ang inyong panunungkulan at pagkakahalal kung sakali ay nakasalalay sa akin at sa ating mga mamamayan.

Tayong lahat ay bahagi ng isang kamay: ang inyong Pangulo, ang Armed Forces, mga local officials at kayong mga mamamayan ay magkakuyom ang mga palad sa iisang layunin upang wasakin at durugin ang pananakot na ito sa ating buhay, sa ating kalayaan at sa ating pananampalataya.

On Independence Day '87

[Delivered on June 12, 1987]

SALUTE TO THE FILIPINO PEOPLE

Taking pride in the country's independence and democracy, the President salutes the Filipinos, a people so poor yet so proud and jealous of their freedom.

Today we celebrate the 89th anniversary of Philippine Independence with double pride: pride in our independence; pride in our democracy. We were Asia's oldest republic, and its first democracy, in the old style. We are today the world's first democracy, in the new style – of People Power.

We were the first Asian nation to win its freedom by means of war, and the first to restore its freedom by the ways of peace. No other nation has shown a richer repertoire of political action.

One year ago, we gathered here to celebrate the 88th anniversary of Philippine Independence, and the first quarter of its democratic restoration. Since then the Filipino people have outdone themselves repeatedly. Against every prediction that they would fail to uphold the democracy they so wondrously restored, the Filipino people came through for democracy again, and again, and again.

Against rightwing coups and leftwing terrorists, in the plebiscite, and in the recent elections, they gave one astonishing demonstration after another of their deep sense of responsibility and commitment to democracy – as if to underscore what the rest of the world had refused to believe, that a people so poor could be so proud and jealous of their freedom.

We celebrate independence today just a few weeks from the convening of Congress, the act that will complete the shining circle of our political achievements. We have here the elected Senators and Representatives of that distinguished body.

We have here the proud achievement of our people: the judicial wisdom, the legislative will and the executive power of a democratic State – wisely divided by the Constitution, but here united by a common resolve to prove ourselves worthy of the sacrifices of our people.

Ladies and gentlemen, please join me in a toast: To the Filipino People and the outstanding democratic example they have set before the world. May we, their leaders, always prove worthy of their trust.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Ateneo Law Alumni Homecoming

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Ateneo Law Alumni Homecoming

[Delivered at the Mandarin Hotel, June 19, 1987]

WE'RE HOME, BACK IN A DEMOCRACY

President Aquino reacts to complaints of a sense of drift under her Administration. Her reply to those who make such complaints: "Get yourselves an engine and set yourself goals. The rest of the nation has done so." Now that Filipinos are back home in a democracy, it is not a time to whine but a time to keep going.

I understand that this is the first time an Ateneo Alumni Homecoming has the President of the Republic as guest of honor and speaker. That is because this is the first time you have a President who is virtually an Atenean. Aside from honorary doctorates from three Jesuit universities – Ateneo, Xavier and Fordham – I also get a lot of advice from Jesuits, some of it is even good.

I want to use this opportunity to react to one particular advice or complaint that I have received.

Some complain of a sense of drift under my Administration, and urge me to do something about it. Not too long ago, they complained of a sense of being pushed around and dragged into disaster. Father Bernas here knows that when we planned our march to freedom, we all believed that liberty would spontaneously give us back a sense of purpose.

At that time, it was the lack of freedom that gave us a sense of drift, because the rudder had been taken from our lives. We did not know where dictatorship was taking us, and so we gave up having any long-term aim in life. We drifted from day to day, waiting on rumors, living on speculations.

And then one man died and showed that a brave decision could end the sense of drift. That man's death gave us all a sense of purpose. Suddenly there was no question, among the best of us anyway, about what we wanted and what we needed to do. We were going for freedom – and we were prepared to do what was needed to get there.

You chose the man's wife to lead you. Not just anywhere she wanted, but to freedom, as we had all stipulated – to the freedom where every Filipino would have the right again to make of his life what he wanted.

We got there. We got to where we are now: the land of the free and, as it turned out, the land of the brave as well. For our journey was marked by astonishing acts of heroism and is now the most stirring chapter in the story of democracy.

Why, therefore, do some people complain of a sense of drift? Let's face it, 14 years of slavery has given them the habit of obedience, of wanting to be led by the nose.

Well, I'm not going to do it. Furthermore, the best of us don't want to be led by the nose. The best of us are enjoying our newly won freedom and are determined to make something useful out of it. By the best I mean the vast majority of our people.

As a result, the economy is taking off. All the studies show that, and, more reliably, you can feel it in the air. The energy and optimism are there again.

Democracy is firmly in place – its structure is complete. A Constitution and a Congress complete and balance the democratic institutions with which we started last year: a people's Presidency and an honest Supreme Court.

These things could not have been achieved by a people in drift.

And in fact, they were not. The people weren't drifting. They knew what they had: a democracy, and they backed me in defeating every challenge to it. They were with me all the way when I faced down threats to democracy from the Left and the Right. They were with me when I called for an all-out vote for a new Constitution that would enshrine our liberties and proclaim our hopes. And they were with me again when I called for a new Congress to support me.

Now I am asked to repudiate what the people have given us: a Congress that is both of their choice and of my sympathies, just to show that I'm in charge and we're not drifting. I am asked to steal a march on this grand assembly of men and women who, alone with me, enjoy the mandate of the people.

And who are those who ask me to derogate from the dignity and powers of this co-equal branch? People who will never get elected in a free election.

The elections left me a residual power to legislate until Congress convenes.

I shall use it.

Not sparingly, nor excessively; but wisely, as needed.

And yes, I shall use it to enact the initiatives I have made in regional autonomy and agrarian reform. But those initiatives must be informed by wider consultations.

The watchword is wisely. For in everything I do, I aim for success. It is not enough to be right; I also have to win. That is why my enemies, whom so many feared would overwhelm me, are all scattered.

I would rather achieve a modest success than be initially praised for taking ambitious courses that will, most likely, lead to total failure. It is not my way to grandstand. I must proceed like a President, with the due care and deliberation that the fate of a nation deserves.

To those who still complain of a sense of drift, all I can say is: Get yourselves an engine and set yourselves goals. The rest of the nation has done so. This nation, firmly secure in its freedom, is well on the road to recovery.

I am sure there are no drifters in this audience. My message this evening can be summed up briefly: we're home. This is where we longed to be through 14 years of shame and fear and slavery: back in a free country, with a chance to start over.

That's where we are, back in a democracy. And we have made, by all accounts, an impressive start. The nation's strength has been restored. The wounds have healed. The confidence is back. The pride in itself is such as the country has never shown before. All that remains is to keep going, stop whining, and keep building on the many things that we have already accomplished. That much still needs to be done should not daunt us, because this nation has done so much already.

PEOPLE'S WAR AGAINST TERRORISM

Enemies from the Left and the Right continue in their vain attempts to bring down the regained democracy. Because the people reject them, they have intensified their efforts. Again, Filipinos are called upon to give all-out support to the military in its effort against the left- and rightwing terrorists. It is the people's peace and freedom that the terrorists seek to destroy. Clearly, it is now a people's war against terrorism.

The other day, Balweg and his party were attacked. He escaped. His party was not so lucky. We are on our 32nd murdered policeman. A grenade was thrown at the Comelec offices over the weekend. A grenade attack took more lives in Cebu.

Our enemies, on the Left and the Right, have not relented. Despite the stinging rebuke they received from the people in the last elections, the Left and the Right continue their vain attempts to bring down our democracy. Perhaps it is because of that rebuke that they have intensified their efforts. As the toll increases, it becomes increasingly clear that the price of liberty is not just eternal vigilance, but a mounting sacrifice of lives.

There is no help for it. Our policemen are the front line of the public defense. The first in the face of danger, the first in the list of casualties. They are the natural targets of terrorists who want to show that they can reach with their bullets what they could not seize with their promises, the hearts and minds of the Filipinos.

Last Independence Day, I called on all our people to give all-out support to our military effort against the left- and rightwing terrorists. I repeat that call today. I call on our people to report all suspicious activities and persons to the police and military authorities in the area. It is the people's peace and freedom that the terrorists seek to destroy. It is clearly now a people's war, a people's war against terrorism.

I expect the Defense Department, the Chief of Staff and the Police Chiefs to work out immediately an integrated approach that will use the power of the people to stop the terrorism against them.

In the meanwhile, I call on our naval forces to redouble your vigilance and your efforts to keep our borders secure, especially from arms landings. This is a tremendous task, given our coastline, and our small naval capabilities. But what is at stake here is freedom and what we have so painstakingly built up since the Revolution. We must do what we can with what we have. The terror must be contained and then destroyed. The last thing we need is a massive infusion of arms to our enemies.

I commend the naval forces for the great work it has done so far; not only in the military sphere but also in bringing relief to distressed areas of the country.

I commend the navy's land forces, the Philippine Marines for its particularly distinguished performance in the last elections in the South. Colonel Cabanlig has received our highest commendation for conduct that has made us truly proud to be his Commander.

We have achieved much since the Revolution: not only the consolidation of democracy but also a respectable measure of economic progress and military security. The elections have exposed the real strength of our enemies.

These attacks are signs of desperation, attempts to recoup in terms of fear what our enemies have lost in terms of credibility as popular political forces. We shall not let them.

To mark its 89th anniversary, the Philippine Navy renews and redoubles its commitment to defend the peace and freedom of our country.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Philippine Air Force

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Philippine Air Force

[Delivered at the Fernando Air Base, Batangas, June 27, 1987]

THE IDEAL AIR FORCE

With its speed and mobility, the Air Force should be able to strike back immediately when the insurgents strike in any part of the archipelago. This is the ideal, but unfortunately not the case. The Air Force lacks gunships and weaponry to fulfill its mission. And the country's ally has been advised on this deficiency. But the renewal of the country's fighting forces need not wait on the arrival of foreign equipment. Training must start now to meet the needs of the future.

It is a happy coincidence that I met yesterday with Air Force officers. This occasion gives me the opportunity to answer some of their concerns.

The first of those concerns is the inability of the Air Force, given its present organization and resources, to fulfill its mission as the fastest of the Armed Forces in providing security to the people.

Speed is ideally the essence of the air force. The mobility of the Air Force is Government's answer to the stealth and mobility of the insurgents. Its firepower, brought immediately to bear wherever the insurgents strike, is the best assurance we can give our people that, even in the farthest reaches of our widely spread archipelago, Government can protect them. That is the ideal. The reality is something else.

The Air Force officers I met with underscored the serious lack of gunships and weaponry that will enable the Air Force to fulfill its mission. The Government has repeatedly brought up this deficiency before the highest officials of our military ally. A few weeks ago, the first 10 helicopters were delivered. But this only begins to meet our requirements. I am assured, however, that every effort will be made to answer our needs.

Yet, even as we recognize the critical role of gunships and weaponry in the fight to protect our country from its internal enemies, we must never lose sight of the fundamental fact that it is people that make up armies; it is the individual that makes up a soldier.

The Armed Forces – airborne, earthbound or seagoing – are only as strong and effective as the individual fighting man that is its basic unit. It is in the individual soldier that we find the will to fight which is the moving spirit of victorious armies.

The renewal of the Philippine fighting forces need not wait on the arrival of foreign equipment. The most important work of military renewal should be taking place already.

It begins now, in this time of relative peace: Si vis pacem, para bellum, as the saying goes; if you want peace, prepare for war. The training of efficient fighting forces and capable commanders takes time. We must start to meet the needs of the distant future today.

It begins here, in schools like this, where the soldier gets his first taste of a life of rigor and total dedication, and learns that the object of his efforts cannot be wealth but honor.

Honor is the motivation and inspiration of the soldier. The soldier risks all for strips of colored cloth and pieces of bronze, because these are the age-old badges of honor and the signs of rank. It is therefore imperative that the procedure for the awarding of ranks and honors be transparent and objective, so that no sacrifice or outstanding performance is overlooked.

Very soon, the Defense Secretary, the Chief of Staff and I will meet on how we can improve the procedures for recognizing merit and awarding promotions.

In the last analysis, however, the best assurance of a promotion is your consistent performance. One of the officers I met with said that, unlike other professions where there is a one-time test for admission, the officer is tested every day of his life. The test becomes even more rigorous and persistent from the moment of his graduation from formal training.

Today, therefore, marks not an end of one period of your lives, but the serious start of the constant testing of your abilities and your character that will henceforth mark your lives. That test of a lifetime will decide whether you will cap your career with the highest honors and ranks that the Republic can give the men and women of its Armed Forces.

Unlike other graduations, this is not a welcome but a send-off. I wish you luck in the challenge you have bravely taken up to prove the mettle of the Filipino soldier.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the National Convention of the Philippine Judges Association

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the National Convention of the Philippine Judges Association

[Delivered at the Malacañang Palace, July 3, 1987]

DISPENSE JUSTICE SPEEDILY

Speaking before the Philippine Judges Association, President Aquino notes that the country is suffering from a crisis of confidence in its justice system longer than one can remember. Plain justice that should be dispensed by the courts is not working, partly because of the small budget allocated to the justice system. But this cannot be helped. Nearly half of the country's revenues are committed to foreign debt. Despite this, the men and women on the bench who dispense justice can do their share by resolving cases speedily.

Justice is the first virtue of institutions; it is the first duty of the State. Only after justice is served, do other concerns merit attention. The Lord is first just before he is compassionate; even as the Old Testament precedes the New.

The first in the order of priorities of any state, regardless of political philosophy, is order, order upheld by the rule of law. Not the order of a dictator which is merely the anarchy of his will. But the order of just laws that surrounds and binds us together in a free and orderly society. All our liberties and the rights that protect them rest upon this order of justice. And this order of justice rests on you, the judges.

Our country has many grave problems. Some will require many, many years for their solution: the debt problem, mass poverty. They also call for enormous resources. But some of the gravest problems require only the will to solve them. One such problem is justice.

This country has been suffering a crisis of confidence in its justice system for longer than any of us care to remember. Even under the Old Republic, justice was a joke. And I am not talking about grand ideas of social justice that are hard to pin down as practical programs. I am speaking of the simple justice required in cases that range from the theft of a carabao, the denial of an inheritance, to the swindle of a piece of land, the brazen refusal to pay an incontestable debt, and a plain assault on one's person.

These small matters make up the life of our society. People have to be secure in their persons and properties, however humble they are, however small their possessions may be.

As it is, it is only the rich, who can afford competent counsel, who dare to go to court. And even they hesitate.

It is because the poor have so little that so much depends on their keeping what they have. Nowhere does the denial of a right wreak so much havoc as among the poor, who can afford to lose so little. And yet, justice in the Philippines – and I mean the plain justice that should be dispensed by the courts – isn't working. It isn't even working for the rich. Ask any businessman what he thinks about resorting to the courts to settle any dispute.

Part of the reason is the small budget allocated to the justice system. Our courthouses are shanties and our court personnel, despite some effort on my part to increase salaries, remain grossly underpaid along with the rest of government. But there is no help for it – nearly half our revenues are committed to the foreign debt.

And yet, with all these deficiencies, there is much we can still do, and nowhere more than in the field of justice. In the end, it is not the courthouse, nor the salaries, but the judge – the man or the woman on the bench – who dispenses justice. And he or she can do it just as well in humble, as in proud surroundings, with a full sense of honor more than with a fat wallet.

Justice today is given grudgingly and is slow; so speed it up. It does not take much experience to spot a delaying tactic by one or the other party to a case. Do not allow the parties to use the law to pervert the law. You can easily spot a malicious prosecution to punish or break the will of a litigant. Do not allow the law to be insulted. Throw out the case and throw the book at the lawyer who allows it.

“Do not pervert justice,” says Leviticus, “show neither partiality to the poor nor favoritism to the great, but judge your neighbor fairly.”

Above all, finish the cases before you as quickly as you can. Delay is not the distinguishing mark of due process, despite what the lawyers say. Finish your cases quickly, there is always an appeal to make up for any oversight. But the worst injustice is the interminable delay that gives victory to the one who can afford it. This is the worst injustice, that nothing can repair.

Remember also, in this connection, that the danger today is not to the independence of the judiciary but to the integrity of judges.

Deuteronomy warns: “Do not accept a bribe, for a bribe blinds the eyes of the wise and twists the words of the righteous. Follow justice and justice alone.”

You must deliver justice; but I, and soon the Congress, must deliver the laws. Justice must have teeth.

In light of recent events and increasing reports of common crimes, especially those involving firearms, I called yesterday for a meeting with the Justice Department and the Chief of Staff to work out the details of the following policies:

Bail for all common crimes shall be increased 10 times, especially crimes against persons and property and illegal possession of firearms.

All mission orders issued by any agency or instrumentality of government, other than the Philippine Constabulary and the National Bureau of Investigation are hereby revoked. Mission orders other than those duly issued by these agencies shall not be a defense in a prosecution for illegal possession of firearms.

I have instructed the Justice Department to call upon the Court Administrator of the Supreme Court and present a proposal by the Executive Branch that the trial of common crimes, especially those involving firearms, shall be given the highest priority and shall be speedily disposed of. As I said, delay is not the mark of due process. The swift accounting for crimes, the certain punishment of offenders, on the other hand, is the first and most essential attribute of justice. And we shall have it.

The fruit of righteousness, we are told, is peace; the effect of righteousness will be tranquility and confidence forever. These are also the conditions necessary for recovery and progress; and, quite plainly, what our people deserve after all they have been through.

Justice for all is one goal that is within our reach and present resources. All that is needed is integrity and the will.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the IBM Golden Anniversary

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the IBM Golden Anniversary

[Delivered at the Philippine Plaza Hotel, July 13, 1987]

PEOPLE AS THE GREATEST ASSET

People are the foundation of IBM's great success. The company has regarded people as its greatest asset and the human mind as its most important resource. Thus, in IBM Philippines, the greatest value added is the Filipino himself. IBM has also focused on support to education and on giving recognition and reward to intellectual achievements. For all these the President congratulates IBM on its 50th year.

First, let's get a few things straight. Pinky was working in IBM before I became President, and Manolo met her there. And they are not the reason Rey Reyes is in my Government. Although I must admit that his standing in IBM was the best testimonial of his talents and the invaluable contributions he could make to my Government.

I have to clear up these things because anything I say tonight will be judged in their light. Especially since I shall speak of merit, of the talents and dedication of people that are the foundation of IBM's great success.

If size and wealth were all that IBM is about, I would not say more than "Congratulations" this evening. But few companies have so pointedly regarded people as their greatest asset and the human mind as their most important resource. In IBM, by the nature of its work, the greatest value added is the human being; in IBM Philippines, the Filipino himself.

It is not surprising that IBM has made the development of the human being, inside and outside the company, the principal focus of its efforts. For IBM is as dedicated a profit-taker as any business in the world, and better at it than most. Its business just happens to be people.

IBM makes its money by using the best in people, by improving their intellectual command of their environment, and using their talents to the fullest extent in the operation and development of machines and programmes to which IBM has addicted the world. I must add that this has been to the world's great improvement and benefit. (I am still a mother and Pinky is working here.)

It is again not surprising that, in discharging its corporate social responsibility, IBM has focused on support to education and on giving recognition and reward to intellectual achievements. To celebrate its anniversary, a million has been earmarked for scholarships in higher learning. That's the essence of IBM's social thrust: to make people smart, smart enough to use IBM. This also means helping the country develop so it will need and use IBM.

There is nothing wrong with that. On the contrary, there's everything right with it. Nothing is more useful and lasting than an activity that draws on the most number of instincts to support it; on compassion as much as on calculation, on enlightened self-interest as on the most generous impulse of philanthropy. IBM has had the luck to be both good and smart, for itself and the country.

Before I conclude my remarks, may I extend my congratulations to Dr. Rafael Guerrero for receiving the IBM Science and Technology Award. His achievements in improved food production have earned him the recognition of his science peers throughout the world and the gratitude of many nations, not the least ours.

His methods, however, deserve equal recognition and greater notice. For Dr. Guerrero achieved success by making the most of the little he had to work with. Particularly notable is his use of easily available, cheap native resources. That is why his work is so useful to us. For Filipinos have little to work with.

While it is true this country has made a fresh start, it has had to do so with old burdens: the burdens of mistakes that others made and we must pay for.

This injustice is a given. So is our determination to succeed despite it. And people like Dr. Guerrero are showing us how. We are grateful to IBM for calling our attention to his work.

To IBM, my congratulations on your 50th anniversary. I wish you another 50 years in the Philippines.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the creation of the Cordillera Administrative Region

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the creation of the Cordillera Administrative Region

[Released on July 15, 1987]

AUTONOMY FOR THE CORDILLERA

Granting autonomy to the Cordillera does not, in any sense, subdivide the territory of the Philippines. The aim of autonomy is the strengthening of the whole by means of strengthening of its parts. By the special attention the Cordillera will give to itself, the State becomes empowered to pursue its objective of freedom and prosperity.

I have signed this day the Executive Order creating the Cordillera Administrative Region. This is meant to pave the way for the autonomy of this region that Congress, pursuant to the Constitution, shall enact.

The intense discussions and even the tragic events that attended the formulation of this order both underscore the importance of granting autonomy and the equal importance of reaffirming the overriding duty and recognition we all owe to the one democratic State that rules all our lands.

Autonomy within the State, as the State understands it, can mean no derogation of its territorial integrity or its essential authority over all who were and shall be born under the protection of its arms, the security of its laws, and in the dignity conferred by its great charter of freedom.

This first measure of autonomy, and all other measures that shall follow upon it, cannot in any sovereign sense subdivide the territory of our State. On the contrary, the aim of autonomy is the further empowerment of the whole, by the strengthening of its parts. By the special attention that an autonomous unit of the State will give itself, we expect the State to be, overall, further empowered to pursue its timeless objectives; prosperity; and honor abroad to the one Philippines.

Mabuhay ang Republika.

Mabuhay ang Kalayaan.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during her visit to Bicol Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During her visit to Bicol

RECOVERY AND PROGRESS FOR BICOL

President Aquino expresses her deep concern for the problems of the Bicol Region. She stresses that the success of the region, and the economy as a whole, depends on private initiative and the corresponding infrastructure to make enterprise productive and profitable. Thus, in addition to credit which has been released, the prices of energy in the region will have to be studied. The President also vows to end all threats to peace and freedom before her term ends.

Let me start by thanking the men and women who worked tirelessly to make these consultations a success. Two of them are religious. Archbishop Legaspi, the Chairman of the Regional Coordinating Body, and Secretary Ting Jayme, known in the Cabinet as The Monsignor. May I also thank co-chairman Judge Bonto, and the man that my surprised staff in Malacañang calls the less controversial Arroyo, Commissioner Jack Arroyo.

Levity aside, may I say that every concern that has been expressed here has been duly noted. They will be referred to the appropriate Departments for consideration and, if merited, for immediate action.

In the meantime, we have noted the deplorable condition of the Maharlika Highway, for which I hope we can come up with a better name. Attention has also been called to the need for more school buildings and the repair of farm-to-market roads as well as the provision of bridges.

The success of our economic recovery program turns on private initiative. It is therefore imperative to provide the basic infrastructure to make enterprise productive and profitable.

Initially, I would like to announce that we have released almost P300 million of the P568 million that has been programmed for this region in 1987. I would like to announce the following releases for infrastructure projects in Region V:

For national roads
For barangay roads
For flood control
And for water supply

I am hereby directing the Secretary of Public Works to include in the budget of his Department for 1988 the amount of P75 million for the Quirino Highway. For the Maharlika Highway, in addition to the P20 million allocated for the restoration of portions of the highway, he is directed to provide P2 million for detailed engineering work so that the P290 million project can be submitted to the OECF for additional funding.

We have released all funds for school buildings, totalling P38 million.

Again, our thrust is recovery and progress through private enterprise. We are aware that credit is the lifeblood of enterprise and that it is very hard to get it for small and medium scale industries. I should like to announce that P808,000 has already been released to the Department of Trade and Industry to help this sector. The Development

Bank of the Philippines has meanwhile resumed regular lending operations for agriculture and small/medium scale industries.

In addition to credit, a further, and perhaps the most critical factor in development, is energy.

We shall consider the issue you have raised about the prices of energy in the region despite the proximity of energy sources. This is an issue that requires deeper study. In the meanwhile, may I reiterate our policy of encouraging private sector participation in small power generation. The NEA has also programmed the construction of several small hydro plants in the region: two in 1988, five in 1989 and four in 1990.

We recognize the continuing threat to the security of persons and property in the region, posed by the New People's Army. Let me only reiterate my vow: to end all threats to peace and freedom before my term is over. And to that end we are bending every armed resource we have.

I ask you to be patient, and to be brave. For I have called for a People's War against the Communist insurgency and against continuing fascist attempts to destroy our freedom. The hurt they have inflicted has been terrible indeed. But they have lost the war, even if they continue fighting. Democracy has been their irreversible defeat. And democracy is here to stay. We shall, as I have vowed, mop up these elements and give this country the wide and permanent peace that it richly deserves.

Again, may I thank the organizers of this consultation. To the people of Bicol, may I say that you are always in my thoughts, and high in my esteem. You stood solidly for freedom and democracy even through the dictatorship, and gave me and my Government some of the widest and strongest support in the country. My thanks to you. In the days and months to come, you will see how well I have remembered this day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the signing of the Omnibus Investments Code

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the signing of the Omnibus Investments Code

[Released on July 17, 1987]

A BASIC FRAMEWORK TO ENCOURAGE INVESTMENTS

The basic framework that will guide and encourage investments in the economy has been laid with the signing of the Omnibus Investments Code. Freedom and stability have been put in place while the necessary economic policies have been issued and are being implemented. The country is now back in the mainstream of the world's growth economies. However, much more can be done to promote industrial peace.

Two and a half months ago, I spoke before many of you who had gathered at the PICC for the meeting of the business community with the President.

At that time, reviewing how far we had come and looking ahead in the direction we were heading, I said we were no longer talking of just economic recovery but of growth.

The economic indicators that have since become available appear to bear this out. Our real GNP grew by 5.5 percent in the first quarter, something we haven't experienced since the late '70s.

In particular, we are proud of this feat because it is investments that led GNP growth with an increase of 23 percent; and it is industry which led the way with a 9.9 percent growth.

I am also specially pleased with the results of the last election. If you recall, I asked you at that meeting to vote for my candidates "if you still believe in Cory Aquino." I made that appeal throughout the country, to all sectors. Getting 21 out of 22 senators thus far proclaimed, is not a bad way of learning the level of confidence our country still has in my Government, not to mention the strength of our people's reborn faith in democratic institutions.

I think, ladies and gentlemen, we must all finally agree that this country is off to a good start.

But it is still just a start. Poverty and unemployment continue to hold the majority of our countrymen in their grip. Our economy is still tossed about on the surface of international economic forces over which we have no control whatsoever.

We are certainly proud of our accomplishments so far. And I am deeply pleased with and proud of my team. We have gone farther than any would have thought possible, and we did not violate a single democratic principle nor did we act in the kind of haste that we would live to regret. We showed that democracy, for all the apparent confusion, need not be sacrificed for speed and efficiency. Yet our accomplishments have hardly made a dent on the legacy of problems that the dictatorship left us.

We shall not rest on our achievements. On the contrary, our successes will spur us to greater efforts. For every advance we have made has merely opened a wider view of the many problems that still lie ahead.

Today, with the signing of the Omnibus Investments Code, we have taken another giant step forward. We are putting in place the basic framework that will guide and encourage investments in our economy.

With political stability, and now this Code, most of the elements of a supportive climate for investments are in place. We need only to enhance industrial peace.

It is gratifying to note that with the efforts of the Department of Labor and Employment, the number of strikes for the first six months of the year has dropped 22 percent in the last year. More significantly, the number of workers involved in strikes has gone down by 60 percent and the man-days lost by 56 percent.

Still there is more that can be done if we are to accelerate the setting up of factories that will employ our workers and compete effectively in the world market.

Our Constitution itself enjoins the principle of shared responsibility between workers and employers in the development of the economy, and mandates the State to promote industrial peace through the voluntary resolution of disputes.

In this light, even as we acknowledge our responsibility to protect the rights of workers and to promote their welfare, we also acknowledge our responsibility to foster the right climate for investments and growth.

Without losing sight of the substantive gains made by the Secretary of Labor, I want to see how all of us, working together, can further the cause of industrial peace as an essential factor in our take-off. I would therefore like the Department of Labor, the Department of Trade and Industry, and the representatives of labor and management to meet and submit to me as soon as possible a realistic program of action that will bring industrial peace to our economy.

The stage is set for the great cooperative effort. All the institutions necessary to our freedom and stability have been put in place. The necessary economic policies have been issued and are being implemented. We are back in the mainstream of the world's growth economies.

In ten days, Congress will convene and to them will pass much of the power I have exercised to bind our nation's wounds, restore its strength and give it the confidence to be all it can.

I am counting on all of you to carry your share of the work that must be done.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Agrarian Proclamation

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Agrarian Proclamation

DEFINING AGRARIAN REFORM

Agrarian reform is one of the means by which poverty can be eliminated. Its objective is higher productivity and higher incomes for as many Filipinos as quickly as possible. The key to agrarian reform is the creation of a productive agricultural sector upon which the foundation for the industrialization of the country may be established.

We have discussed and debated the issues for longer than any of us care to recall at this point. The time is up. A decision has been made. Before announcing it formally at this meeting, let me reiterate the principles of my idea of agrarian reform.

Agrarian reform is a means, one of many, to the highest aim I have set my Administration: the elimination of poverty by putting the Filipino to productive work that will pay him a decent livelihood.

The objective is higher productivity and higher incomes for as many Filipinos as quickly as possible. The prosperity and well-being, not necessarily the equality of all, is our aim. That is why I have said that agrarian reform cannot merely subdivide the present miseries on the land. It must effect a substantial improvement. The key therefore is the creation of wealth in agriculture, which is the main feature of our economy. By that creation we hope to establish a firm foundation for the industrialization of our country that can alone assure its final and genuine independence, and a sustained improvement in the lives of our people.

The discussions during the preparation of this program have convinced me that the Constitution was wise to provide for the common counsel of Executive and Legislature in the full implementation of agrarian reform in our country. The proclamation and executive order go as far as the Constitution and a sense of realism allow me.

In this Proclamation and Order, the Executive has said the final word. What remains now is for you, my extensions and instrumentalities, to carry out the law as therein set forth. The discussion here, in this Branch, is over. The real work begins.

I want to thank all those who were principally involved in this project for their dedication and hard work, for that combination of passionate commitment and intellectual acuity that have left their marks, I believe for the better, in these laws that I shall sign today.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the necrological services for Local Government Secretary Jaime Ferrer

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the necrological services for the Local Government Secretary Jaime Ferrer

[Delivered at the St. Andrews Church, Parañaque, August 7, 1987]

DEMOCRACY CAN SURVIVE

During the necrological services for the assassinated Local Government Secretary Jaime Ferrer, President Aquino reminds the people never to give up the rule of law which they long fought for. Democracy can survive the death of noble men.

I campaigned for him in '84. He campaigned for me in '86, where he proved invaluable. I offered him a post in the Cabinet after the victory, but he declined it. He wanted to enjoy in private life the liberty and rights for which he had fought. In the midst of the crisis last year, I prevailed on him finally to take on the thankless and, it turns out, the fatal job of Local Government.

I had not expected him to win in '84, against a worthy opponent, albeit in an unfair contest. But he won, and in the process proved himself not only the better man but a smarter politician. Virtue and traditional politics, like oil and water, don't ordinarily mix. But they did in this man. He was not only right, but he could win. A combination I always prefer. There are no points for mere effort or good intentions.

His devotion to country and his commitment to democracy were complete and uncompromising in war and in peace. And they expressed themselves less in words than in actions of unfailing and unmistakable patriotism.

He brought to public service the regimen and directness of the soldiering life that was his first love and the constant standard by which he tested his effort and those of others.

He was curt in manner and sharp in his speech. And always passionate on the issues he carefully selected. He was one of the few men in Government who believed that their time is not their own to waste.

This was the quality that endeared him most to me. During both campaigns, he was the only politician who let me speak punctually on schedule. The moment I arrived, he cut short whoever was speaking and gave me the microphone.

In my Cabinet, he went straight to the point and declared himself clearly on one side or the other of crucial issues: honesty, responsiveness and accountability in local government, firmness in dealing with revolutionary terrorism or plain political gangsterism.

To his long and distinguished record of achievements, one sadly adds the dark distinction of being the first Cabinet Secretary to be assassinated in the history of the Republic.

Jimmy made a lot of enemies; but we did not think that his straightforwardness would create his killers. He received death threats, but he rejected bodyguards. In his old age, he may have thought there was a cleaner way to die than nature offered. And he was the man to take it.

And he did, in the end, as the best of our race have taken it in the past few years.

His murder is the unwritten paragraph of my State of the Nation. It states the most serious challenge that faces us today: Can we have order without tyranny, and peace without oppression? Must democracy fight with the weapons of its enemies; with treachery and cowardice?

There were no assassinations of public officials under the dictatorship. Perhaps it is not abuse that provokes violence, but decency that is mistaken for weakness.

Jimmy's death states the problem; his life gives us the first part of the solution: fearlessness. As we look for ways by which democracy can defend itself without dishonoring itself, let us never lose heart, never be afraid, never give up that for which our people fought and sacrificed these many years: the rule of law; a Government that, even in emergencies, conducts itself with decency towards its people.

Democracy can survive the death of Jimmy Ferrer, as it can survive the deaths that may follow, although I pray that his will be the last. But democracy cannot survive the adoption of the ways of its enemies.

We shall continue to fight anarchy with law and murder with justice. There are more than enough laws for the purpose. What is needed is the will and the intelligence to enforce them. For as long as the imminent danger is only to public officials, there will be no Constitutional shortcuts to public safety. Let every flagstone on the road be the grave of a servant of the people, but the light of liberty and the protection of rights will be with us all the way to permanent peace.

This is how Jimmy Ferrer would have wanted it, this man whose whole life and tragic death have been one uninterrupted and uncompromised service to duty, to country, and democracy.

Let us hope that he is not the last of his kind.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the Manila Stock Exchange

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the Manila Stock Exchange

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel on August 7, 1987]

MODERATION DURING PROSPERITY

There is renewed activity at the Manila Stock Exchange, after a long dry spell. President Aquino reminds the members to practice moderation in a season of prosperity.

I do not know if the recent activity of the Exchange reflects the revival of our economy or simply the revived spirits of the brokers. Whatever, I know how busy you have all been making money hand over fist. Those of you here, who stuck it out in the Exchange, after the long dry spell, must be taking all this as the just reward of your unflagging faith in our country. Or in the credulity of your clients. And I guess you deserve it. But as you take your well-deserved drink at the well, please do not empty it. The stock exchange runs on faith and credibility. You saw what happened when your colleagues, who I hope are no longer with you, played with that faith and credibility, making large but short-term fortunes at the expense of the economy and the long-term credibility of the Exchange. As I said, it's been a long dry spell, and you deserve a drink of prosperity; but, as the commercial goes, drink moderately. If you don't, if each of you reaches for more than a moderate share, it will happen all over again. And I don't know how we can revive again public confidence in stock exchanges. The law, as experience shows, is not enough to prevent abuses. In the end, you regulate yourselves. You have to watch each other, that no one of you eats the whole goose that's been laying the golden eggs.

I wish you continued success and another 60 years of service to our country.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the occasion of the Philippine Constabulary-Integrated National Police Anniversary

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the occasion of the Philippine Constabulary-Integrated National Police Anniversary

[Delivered on August 8, 1987]

PROTECTING THE PEOPLE'S RIGHTS

On the occasion of Philippine Constabulary-Integrated National Police Day, the President assures the people that the government will protect their cherished rights and liberties through democratic methods. She also announces sweeping measures to eliminate the alarming proliferation of firearms.

Yesterday we buried a champion of democracy, and a friend of order and liberty. He was a soldier-veteran of one war of national liberation, and of another struggle for democratic restoration. He was a friend of the Armed Forces and one with us in our commitments in the military. He was raised to be a soldier, and died a member of the President and Commander-in-Chief's official family. Yesterday, we buried one of us.

His killers are still at large. That is a fact. It is a fact that has been shoved, since last Sunday, in our faces: in your faces and mine by our critics. You would think from their griping that my only duty as President is to ride shotgun for my Cabinet Secretaries. And that our soldiers and police all but exhaust their usefulness when a brutal crime happens. And then they are useful only as the butt of insults.

But you and I know that nothing can stop an assassin's bullet, that there is no sure protection against treachery and deadly cowardice. If there were such protection, our enemies would choose other means to strike at us, and at the liberty and political order we represent and are trying to uphold.

We are blamed for every murder that happens and forgotten for the many more crimes that have not been committed; for the definitive reverse that the insurgency has suffered since we reconstituted the Armed Forces and the police as forces of integrity for democratic order.

But let us not complain at the treatment we have received. For we are not in office, and you are not in uniform; for compliments and flattery.

We are here for a job whose demands will increase with every success we meet, for our enemies will grow desperate and more cruel with every defeat, every failure of their persistent efforts to sow division among us.

We are confronted by a challenge that grows in difficulty with each day of liberty that our people now enjoy.

That challenge is to protect democracy by the methods of democracy, to fight a war for enduring liberty and permanent peace with methods that will enrich the life and dignity of the democratic society that you and I and our people have created.

Thus far, the casualties have largely been our own. Scores of soldiers and public officials have been killed.

We will take our losses manfully.

I have said that there will be no Constitutional shortcuts to public safety for as long as the victims are largely from our ranks. We shall protect our people's cherished rights and liberties by methods that will honor and not diminish them, even if they help the guilty escape as often as they protect the innocent. For the overriding aim is to protect and enhance democracy, not to preserve it as an inviolate memento in a garrison state.

Still, we must show that democracy is not defenseless. That, with all due respect to the guarantees of the Constitution, we can strike at our enemies with the vigor and effect that will overcome their traditional treachery.

In the next few days, the Armed Forces and the police will adopt sweeping measures; measures aimed at eliminating the alarming proliferation of firearms and impunity of crimes in our society.

Checkpoints and searches will be increased and intensified.

The Supreme Court has rationalized the procedure for obtaining warrants.

Let me make myself clear to you, the forces of order: no one is to be spared, specially public officials.

A public office is a private risk. If an official cannot stand the heat, he should get out. No one shall be allowed to plead his office as a ground for exemption from the rigor of the security measures you will undertake. We have directed the Customs to crack down on all persons bringing in firearms from abroad. The more you catch, and the more important the person, the more you will rise in my esteem, and the greater will be my gratitude and that of our people.

Our people, I assure you, will back you up all the way. Because they know, and your conduct will prove it, that you are here for their safety.

These directives are addressed to the military, police and civilian authorities, whose close coordination and unstinting cooperation are indispensable to the success of this campaign. Work together. The success of one is the success of all. We are one Government; one force for order.

Today we celebrate the 86th anniversary of the Philippine Constabulary and the 12th anniversary of the PC-INP. Let us celebrate them as the people expect us to: with action.

Again, so there is no ambiguity, let me give you the standard by which we shall judge success. As I have said, there are no points for mere effort or good intentions. The standard will be mathematical: the more you catch, the more you confiscate, the better. Go now, and do your duty. You have our people's fullest support.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the National Laity Week

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the National Laity Week

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, August 17, 1987]

A 2,000 YEAR-OLD REVOLUTION

Two thousand years ago, a Man chose suffering, humiliation, and death to save humanity. It was a revolution far more sweeping than EDSA, the President declares. As for our own revolution, it began from within and must continue within.

The peaceful, almost joyful, February Revolution that made us free had its seeds in a darker, sadder time; in lives of solitary suffering.

Ninoy's part in the Revolution was fated not to be at EDSA, but to make EDSA possible. It began in the solitude of his cell, where, as he put it, Christ "stood me face to face with myself and forced me to look at my emptiness and nothingness, and then helped me to discover Him who has really never left my side." At that moment, Ninoy found his peace and his strength, and began the journey that ended in our freedom.

In the rest of the country, things were not as wretched, but, in varying degrees the vast majority of Filipinos lived lives of shame and desperation. It was a time like no other in our history, apart from the War, when moral choices were made so clear and yet so difficult: between a life of submission and spiritual integrity; between bondage and life, on the one hand, and danger and the promise of freedom, on the other. Between despair and hope, and the price of working to realize that hope.

It was, in the last analysis, a choice made by an even earlier and more sweeping revolution, begun and completed 2,000 years ago – by One who chose humiliation, suffering and death for himself to overcome humiliation, suffering and death for us all. That one solitary victory continues to change our lives today more than, as a poet wrote, all the armies that ever marched, all the navies that ever sailed, all the parliaments that ever sat and all the kings that ever reigned.

One of the great proponents of democracy said that governments should be of the people, by the people, and for the people. But all nations having "a new birth of freedom" must be first "under God."

We are now free and are enjoying the fruits of freedom to the full. We are also paying its price in grave responsibilities and in mistakes committed, and in the abuses that freedom encourages. But the chief price is continuing labor and eternal vigilance to keep freedom alive and make it meaningful for all; the chief price is heeding the call of our first Liberator.

Ninoy, quoting Thomas A' Kempis, sought to understand the demands of that call. In Laur, Ninoy wrote: "And when He sent His disciples into the world, He sent them not to have temporal joys but to meet great battles; not to have honors but injuries; not to be idle but to labor; not to rest but to bring forth much good fruit in patience and good works."

We in Government, all of us the laity, are fully aware of how much we have yet to overcome. The past will always dog our footsteps, as the debt burden, as corrupt values, as continuing hunger for power and undying thirst to return this country to slavery, deceit and death.

The freedoms we enjoy can be used as levers for their own destruction. In the law and justice we respect, we create the space for conspiracies to destroy the law and deny justice. Though we seek to do right, and work with all our might, there will still be those who by indolence, indifference, malice and violence, seek to undo our best efforts.

As we labor to improve the quality of our lives, let us remember that our Revolution that began from within must continue within, where the search for God's light can alone succeed. As a wise man wrote in Proverbs: "Trust in the Lord with all your heart and lean not on your own understanding; in all your ways acknowledge Him and he will make your paths straight."

On the occasion of National Laity Week, may more of us walk with Christ along straight paths.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Ninoy Aquino's Death Anniversary Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Ninoy Aquino's Death Anniversary

[Delivered at the Sto. Domingo Church, August 21, 1987]

THE EXAMPLE OF A MAN NAMED NINOY

President Aquino compares liberty to a tree, in whose shade Filipinos today enjoy peace and dignity. This tree grows from the grave of Ninoy Aquino, and continues to draw its greatest nourishment from his sacrifice.

This is the fourth year we observe the death anniversary of Ninoy, the second in the freedom he purchased with his life.

The tree of liberty, in whose shade we enjoy today the pursuits of peace and a life of dignity, grows from his grave and continues to draw its greatest nourishment from his sacrifice.

The Revolution that restored democracy in our country drew its ideals and courage from his example: the example of a man who could have avoided, but instead resolutely accepted, seven and a half years of imprisonment, three years of exile, and then a bullet in the head.

No other Filipino was like that. Because no other Filipino loved his people so purely, so much. Those are not my words, but those of one of the anonymous millions who stood outside this Church and made up the Great Funeral that became our country's Great March to freedom.

Without him, I wouldn't be here, the President of this great and proud country. Without him, some of you here would not enjoy the dignity of serving in a Government believed in by the people and respected by the world. Without him, no one could write freely, nor even think without fear. Without him we would all still be sitting in that darkness from which only courage and faith could rescue us. And he gave us that courage and taught us that faith.

Some of us would be fugitives, but most would have struck a separate and shameful peace with the powers in this country.

What he did, what he suffered, and what he achieved by his death, makes it impossible to call anyone else in living memory a hero. I can say this without immodesty or fear of contradiction. Because with our own eyes, we have all seen him rise from his seat on China Airlines Flight 811 and resolutely walk to his death because he knew that this, finally, would be the dictatorship's fatal mistake.

I hope that people don't forget that. But if they do, the loss is theirs. For with the loss of that sense of obligation to Ninoy's memory, they lose their identity with the Philippines as it stands now in the eyes of the world: a nation of courage, of impossible achievements made possible by the unbelievable sacrifice of one man who recreated a nation in shame into a race of heroes.

If they forget Ninoy, it doesn't matter. For his memory will live on in the best of us, in those of us who model our lives after his ideals and his sacrifice, in those of us who are Filipinos as the world understands that name today.

His death has one more consequence. It puts a special value on our freedom and privileges. Each abuse we take of our liberties, each piece of official corruption, is a mockery of what he died for, a waste of the life he gave. For we wouldn't be free, nor would those of us who are public officials be in office, had he not given his life. Remember that when you libel your neighbor, or when you, as a public official, put your hand in the public till or shake down a businessman in the course of an investigation.

Beyond the intrinsic value that our rights and liberties have, and beyond the inherent quality of trust of public offices, Ninoy's death has given them all a special value. He bought them for us with his life.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the occasion of the Philippine Coconut Authority Week

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the occasion of the Philippine Coconut Authority Week

[Released on August 24, 1987]

PROTECTING THE COCONUT INDUSTRY

Millions of Filipinos depend on the coconut industry for their livelihood, and this country accounts for 70 percent of the world's coconut exports. In view of this, the Philippines must immediately counter the anti-coconut campaign of US soybean interests and check the abuses of some irresponsible coconut and copra exporters.

The following few facts about coconut should underscore the importance of this occasion.

Coconut represents 19 percent of the total value of agricultural production, or P12.5 billion out of the total of P63 billion. It contributes about 3-5 percent of the national income.

More importantly, for this people-powered and people-centered administration, by one count, over eight and a half million Filipinos directly depend on the coconut industry for their livelihood. If we include the others who are involved in the processing and trading of coconut products, this number could easily reach 10 million or 17 percent of the population of this country. This is one estimate. Another estimate has roughly 30 percent of our population engaged in this industry, one way or another. There are 2.8 million hectares of coconut planted land. At one family per hectare that would be 2.8 million families or, with an average of six persons per family, 16,800,000 people.

Either way, you are talking about a sizable portion of our population, a great chunk of our economy. These facts alone call us to give high priority and very serious concern to the industry. In the light of information we have received of direct threats to the coconut industry by adverse developments abroad and certain abuses at home, the problems of the industry should have the highest priority.

There is a concerted effort abroad to bring coconut products into disrepute and thereby deny coconut its traditional markets abroad. As you know, the Philippines accounts for 70 percent of the world exports of coconut products. Soybean interests in the United States are alleging that coconut products, like cooking oil, are hazardous to one's health, contrary to the conclusions of the most reputable foreign researchers that coconut is good for the health, that it is indeed the tree of life as we say here. In the Western markets, the allegation that something is hazardous to health can be fatal to that product.

Meanwhile, at home, we are not above shooting ourselves in the feet. Irresponsible copra exporters are bypassing the regulatory measures of the Philippine Coconut Authority and inviting suspicion abroad, especially in Europe, that our coconut-related exports are not up to Western quality standards. As you know, there is already a wave of protectionism in the developed countries that are sweeping Third World products out of their markets. Let's not help this effort directed against us by narrow self-interest.

The first development can be deadly. Unless the Western markets are disabused of the lies being spread by our competitors abroad, 16 million people stand to lose their livelihoods. In that event, land reform will truly be subdividing only misery, at least on coconut lands.

I am pleased to note that the Philippine Coconut Authority, the various associations of coconut producers, and the Coconut Planters Bank have taken the initiative to fight this anti-tropical oils lobby in the United States. I wish the delegation that is leaving for the United States all the luck. They will need it. Our only protection against the economic devastation threatened by that lobby is the truth about coconut. This is a threat against which our Mutual Defense Pact is helpless. What we need here is a Non-Aggression Pact with the Western economies, a pact that will be to our mutual interest. For if this industry goes under, so will the interests that we are pledged in common to defend here in the Pacific. Let me put this more clearly, we will not let the Western Alliance starve our people while they hold up the shield of the Alliance in the Pacific.

The second development is something we can address immediately. I have directed the Philippine Coconut Authority to exercise the most stringent regulation of our coconut and copra exports to assure their quality.

The fatal curse of our numerous export campaigns has been the failure of Filipino exporters to maintain high quality. We have been our own worst enemy. We can't recover and grow with the usual "Take the money and run" attitude. That's for bank robbers, not Filipinos. I would think that, having retrieved our country from the edge of disaster and from the hands of crooks, we would cherish it now for all the dangers we have braved to save it.

I have been apprised of the other problems of the industry, especially the decline in productivity despite the increase in hectareage devoted to coconut and the unauthorized operation for private interest of government-owned oil mills. This should be stopped immediately. I look forward to a comprehensive report from the Authority on these problems and their proposed solutions. The Authority's inputs on land reform for the coconut areas will be very helpful to the Congress in arriving at a rational and pragmatic program for these areas, a program that will build on the present strength of the industry, rather than undermine it.

The Philippine Coconut Authority has been quietly doing its work. Now that it has honest and competent men on the Board, few hear of its important activities. I appreciate this silent industry and dedication on the part of the Authority. Your efforts have not escaped my grateful notice. Presidential Counsel Teodoro Locsin does not waste any opportunity to tell me of the current developments, and especially the problems, of the industry and the work you are doing. I have appointed to the Philippine Coconut Authority men of probity and dedication. It has now a very strong Board and Chairman. Each of them was carefully selected for his intelligence and dedication to the industry. That was important for so much depends on the performance of this body.

I have myself signed an Executive Order, No. 259, that mandates the progressive use of coconut products by foreign and locally owned manufacturers. As protectionism abroad restricts the market for this essential product, we must widen the market at home.

The Executive and, I am sure, the Congress stand ready to help the industry in every way. May I congratulate the Philippine Coconut Authority on the work it has done to protect the industry and advance its interests. You have my fullest support.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on petroleum prices

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On petroleum prices

[Released on August 25, 1987]

THE OIL PRICE ISSUE

Because of positive developments abroad, the President orders the reduction of customs duties on crude oil importations from 20 percent to 15 percent, as well as the prices of gasoline, kerosene, diesel oil, and LPG. She urges the people to “roll with the punches delivered abroad.”

Raising petroleum prices was bad politics but a necessary measure at the time it was made. Government is not a popularity contest.

Last March, we asked our people to brace themselves for a mid-year increase in petroleum prices because the world crude oil price had risen from $13.15 to $ 17.03 per barrel.

The Oil Price Stabilization Fund enables us to adjust petroleum prices gradually whenever there is a world oil price increase.

We should have increased petroleum prices as early as March 1987. But we wanted to delay as long as we could a decision that would undoubtedly burden our people. By June, however, we had emptied the Stabilization Fund. Meanwhile, the international crude oil price continued to rise.

Towards the middle of this year, our decision to increase prices was reinforced by certain adverse developments in the Middle East. These developments specially affected our principal oil suppliers in the Middle East.

The world continues to follow these developments with great apprehension as tankers negotiate the mine-filled Gulf.

Anticipating a turn for the worse, the industrialized countries began stockpiling oil supplies both for the coming winter and a worsening situation in the Gulf. As a result, oil supply tightened, and the price rose further.

Again, we were affected by these developments.

Masakit man sa aking kalooban na payagan ang pagtaas ng halaga ng iba't ibang produkto na nagbubuhay sa langis napilitan kaming gawin ito.

Nalalaman ko na itong hakbang na ito ay magdudulot ng kahirapan sa ating lahat. Ngunit ang katotohanan at alam nating lahat ito: Hindi natin hawak ang halaga ng langis.

Just the same, Government made sure that the price of fuel oil directly used for generating electricity or for powering factories was increased only 31 centavos per liter. This means that despite the increase, cost of production increased only by a very small amount for manufacturers. As a result, we did not expect prices of goods in the market to increase a great deal. We relied on the conscience of the business community not to treat a smaller increase in fuel oil price as a source of profit, but as a means to moderate the prices of their products in the market.

As I said, it was a painful decision but necessary at the time. Yet even as I held to that decision, I requested the Energy Regulatory Board to continue studying ways and means to reduce the prices of petroleum products despite the world price increase that had taken place and the further increases we were anticipating.

Today I am happy to announce that a way has been found because of recent developments abroad.

We have noted a reversal in the upward movement of crude oil price. We think, and hope and pray, that crude oil prices will remain stable for the rest of the year. Some experts assure us that it will be lower than the earlier worldwide projection of higher prices by the end of 1987. At any rate, the stockpiling of oil supplies by the industrialized countries is nearly completed, and there is an increased supply of crude in the market. As a result, we expect prices to either drop or remain stable.

At the same time, our strong dollar reserves promise to maintain the current peso-dollar exchange rate.

While we expect these healthy signs to be reflected in lower crude oil prices, an actual lowering hasn't happened. Still, we have reason to hope.

I am pleased now to translate these hopeful developments into a change in price policy.

By virtue of the powers vested in me by Section 401 of the Tariff and Customs Code, I have ordered the reduction of customs duties on crude oil importations from 20 percent to 15 percent. This will mean a loss of revenues of about P1.7 billion that would otherwise fund projects necessary to economic recovery. We will just have to find some other way to make up for this loss.

To partially make up for the shortfall, I have turned to the Philippine Amusements and Gaming Corporation (PAGCOR) to subsidize the price reduction that I will now announce. The PAGCOR, pursuant to its mandate to devote its revenues to sociocivic projects, has been directed to release the amount of P300 million to enable the Price Stabilization Fund, which is now depleted, to be replenished. This will enable the Fund to continue subsidizing lower petroleum prices.

I therefore recommend to the Energy Regulatory Board the following price reductions as early as possible:

Premium	gasoline	from	P8.20	to	P7.50.
Regular	gasoline	from	P7.85	to	P7.15.
Kerosene		from	P5.69	to	P5.30.
Diesel	oil	from	P5.64	to	P5.25.
LPG from P4.46 to P4.15.

While we shall seize every chance to reduce prices or keep them low, we will not shirk our duty to do what must be done for the stability of our economy and society. If the situation takes a turn for the worse again, we shall consider another increase in petroleum prices. We are not an oil-producing country, nor are we a debt-free country. We must roll with the punches delivered by developments abroad, even as we carry the burden of debt we inherited. This is our country, these are its weaknesses, which we cannot escape. We just have to face the facts and do the best we can.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on her Tribute to the members of the Presidential Security Group

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On her Tribute to the members of the Presidential Security Group

[Delivered at the Libingan ng mga Bayani, Fort Bonifacio, August 30, 1987]

TRIBUTE TO OUR FALLEN HEROES

The President honors the members of the Presidential Security Group who died defending Malacañang and the presidential family from a treacherous attack by rebel soldiers. She also pays tribute to the other officers and men who quelled the bloody coup attempt.

Imitation is the greatest tribute. The fallen heroes of yesterday are honored today by those we shall bury beside them:

Cpl.	Rolando	S.	Salamero,	699090,	Marines.
PFC	Ireneo	A.	Gaddingan,	724808,	Army.
Sgt.	Oscar	Arevalo,	617009,	Constabulary.
Sgt.	Samuel	Santos,	644146,	Marines.

Airman First Class Janayto S. Sunio, 707539, Air Force.

Civilian Agent Joseph Galleta threw himself between my son and the bullets intended to kill him. He was seriously wounded.

All these men are from the Presidential Security Group that repulsed a treacherous and cowardly attack on the lives of the President and her children by rebel military forces. The aim of the rebels was clearly to kill the President and her family. The size and ruthlessness of the attack, the treachery that marked it, the brutality of the rebels who fired on civilians, and the timing – when a significant portion of the Presidential Security had been deployed in three provinces for my Region 3 Consultation – prove beyond a doubt their murderous intentions. But the PSG was prepared. Col. Voltaire Gazmin had earlier received intelligence of the coup and readied his forces. I had made the right choice of officer to lead the Palace guards. The PSG fought with courage and the ferocity of tigers. They threw themselves into a counter-attack that stunned and turned back the rebels, who fled to the short-lived safety of Camp Aguinaldo.

On the first anniversary of this special force I said: The Armed Forces as a whole are the shield and sword of the Republic, but the Presidential Security Group is the armor protecting the Heart of the Republic. The PSG has well deserved that tribute, my gratitude and that of our people.

To that roll of honored dead we add the names of Marine Pfc. Pablito Baladad, whose blood was the first drawn in the assault on Aguinaldo, and Police Corporal Eduardo Esguerra. Scores more were wounded in the Armed Forces and Police that held fast to their loyalty to the Republic and to their honor as Filipinos. I hope I will be forgiven for not mentioning all their names for I have yet to receive the total list. In that roll, we must include the many unarmed and innocent civilians who were mercilessly slaughtered by the rebel forces for expressing their support for democracy and President Aquino.

But the living who fought did equal honor as the dead to the qualities of our race: to the valor and idealism of the Filipino:

I refer to the composite police and Special Action Forces led by Police General Alfredo Lim and other police officers like General Cruz, General San Diego, Major Dula Torre, Major Maganto, Major Barbers, Major Dimaaliw and Major Sonny Razon. Poorly armed and outnumbered policemen and police trainees relieved the siege of Channel 4 laid by crack rebel troops, and went on swiftly to attack the other rebel-held television stations. This action draws belated recognition to the bravery and skill of our police forces.

Take care of your Marines and they will take care of you. The Marines certainly have. Commandant Biazon's Marines came early to reinforce the ranks of the PSG in the event of a second attack. Under the command of Col. Emmanuel Teodocio and Lt. Col Braulio Balbas, the Marines threw themselves with their famous energy and courage into the fight to liberate Camp Aguinaldo.

True to his word that he would stamp out the rebels, Lt. Col. Rene Dado of the Philippine Army threw his men into the fight, and together with the Constabulary under Col. Cesar Nazareno, relieved the siege of the AFP General Headquarters, which had been defended by a small force led by Generals Ermita and Montaña. General Sotelo and a small group denied the Air Force to the rebels, although they had been betrayed by the second in command. Sotelo's group held out until General Protacio relieved them.

Again I beg the indulgence of the many officers I have not mentioned and of the great majority of the AFP who joined in defeating those who seek to bring shame and contempt to the Armed Forces.

Throughout the land, officers and men stood by their oath to the Commander-in-Chief and held their forces and regions fast to the colors and the Constitution of the Republic.

Chief of Staff General Fidel Ramos led and directed, with his Deputy, General Rene de Villa, this great effort to preserve democracy.

For the past 18 months, I and General Ramos have crushed every threat to this Government and our democracy. Last Friday taught them their most bitter lesson. And we shall teach them again, if they want it.

These traitors and murderers of unarmed civilians have been called idealistic. Let not idealism be used to cover the darkest crimes and ambitions of men whose actions only show their hatred of democracy and their contempt for the lives of their people. For one of the most important elements of idealism is truth. One cannot be idealistic and a liar.

The rebels call themselves nationalistic. They dishonor that name. They dishonor the word. But if nationalism means to put our country over all others, patriotism means putting our country over ourselves.

Last Friday showed that in our country today, there are still more patriots than cowards.

Last Friday's valiant action also brings us closer to our dream of military unity. I had thought that the spirit of reconciliation would close the fissures in the Armed Forces. But now I see, that only a common cause, a common danger, and a common fight for the right can forge an iron bond of unity in the Armed Forces.

First in peace, first in war, the Armed Forces and their Commander-in-Chief stand here and say to the heroes buried in this sacred field: We have kept the faith.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 30th anniversary of the Social Security System

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the 30th anniversary of the Social Security System

[Delivered on September 1, 1987]

SSS ON THE GO

During the celebration of the 30th anniversary of the Social Security System, the President cites the accomplishments of the SSS. She approves the SSS's recommendation to increase the minimum monthly pension from P200 to P400, and to increase by 20 percent the monthly pension of all pensioners.

The recognition of outstanding performance is the best incentive to improved public service. I readily accepted Administrator Cuisia's invitation to your celebration of the Social Security System's 30th Anniversary because I know about the good work the management and employees of the SSS have been doing.

The SSS was established 30 years ago to respond to the workingman's crying need for social security, for protection against economic distress brought on by death, disability, sickness or retirement. The philosophy was that men work better when they know there is some provision for the accidents of life and the inevitability of old age and weakness, when there is some sure provision for his family, however modest.

The SSS was created to fill this need for a sense of security.

Today, the SSS covers approximately 11 million members and their families. I note with great satisfaction your increasing annual benefit disbursements to the members and their dependents and beneficiaries. I am equally pleased with the various social programs you have implemented.

I am happy also that the SSS has continued to provide short-term loans to the members at very low interest rates, so they don't have to turn to moneylenders. And while you have stopped your direct housing loan operations, you have given substantial support to the National Shelter Program which is our way of rationalizing our housing measures. I have been informed that you have responded to my appeal for countryside assistance by financing small and medium-scale enterprises in cooperation with the DBP and giving financial assistance for the establishment and upgrading of the hospitals and schools.

These and other projects too many to mention now have been made possible by the continually growing financial strength of the SSS, that rare combination of prudence and creativity that mark its new management. Records show that the total assets managed by the SSS have reached P33.8 billion.

You have achieved much. I congratulate you and I commend you all for a great job. But more remains to be done. You will learn in my Government that the more you perform the more will be demanded of you.

You must extend your coverage to include those not traditionally included in the System – farmers, fishermen, and other workers, and increase your benefits to match the reality of the present. I know of course, that you don't have all the money in the world to do all you want for our people.

At any rate, I am happy to announce that I have approved the Social Security Commission's recommendation to increase the minimum monthly pension from P200.00 to P400.00 effective September 1, 1987.

I have also directed another 20 percent upward adjustment of the monthly pension of all pensioners. This is the second across-the-board increase I have approved this year, bringing the aggregate to 40 percent. This attempts to adjust pensions to inflation.

Although we have increased benefits, they remain modest. We are still a poor country. But let us not compound the modesty of our benefits with inefficiency in delivering them. I commend the positive steps you have taken to improve the delivery of benefits to the members. I am told by Administrator Cuisia that you have completed your reorganization and now have an operational computer system that is the state of the art. With these improvements, SSS members will be anticipating even better service from the SSS.

I know that the improvements in the SSS would not have happened without the dedication of its employee force. Hence, I have approved the immediate adjustment of your salaries and fringe benefits to make them comparable with those of other Government financial institutions. Chairman Roa and Administrator Cuisia have just approved two additional employee benefit programs: the Hospitalization Benefits Program and the SSS Employee Housing Program.

Let me congratulate you on your anniversary and let me wish you even more successes. I remind you that the SSS is one of the few activities of the Government that serve as an accurate measure of the Government's genuine concern for the people and willingness to help them. You make a difference in the lives of our people. Make it clearer by your better performance that we truly care.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Camp Aguinaldo Housing Project

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Camp Aguinaldo Housing Project

[Released on September 4, 1987]

THE HOUSE OF DEMOCRACY

In the Camp which only recently was the scene of fierce fighting following the abortive coup, the President praises those military men who ably defended “the house of democracy.” She also announces a series of low-cost housing projects for soldiers and their families.

In this camp, the Filipino soldier redeemed his pledge to the colors and the Constitution of the Republic, in a victory that has brought us as much sorrow as relief that democracy has been saved again.

That victory did not come cheap.

In this Camp whose buildings are pockmarked by bullets, whose General Headquarters is a burnt ruin, and whose General Headquarters is a burnt ruin, and whose gates and walls had to be rammed down, we must rededicate ourselves to democracy and to the ideals of military professionalism that were here violated.

Here soldiers defended the house of democracy with valor and sad resolve against their comrades-in-arms. The choice was painful but their duty was clear: to flag, country, Commander and Constitution. To the Rule of Law and ordered liberty.

The Government is not perfect, but Democracy and the Constitution cannot be compromised. Any illegal and unconstitutional shortcut to solutions will be met and stopped, as they were here, by the Armed Forces and our people.

Democracy must be matched by progress, by a better material life for our people. Those who stand in the way of this progress are as much our enemies as those who sought to kill democracy.

There can be no greater enemy of the State than the enemy within: he who causes the machinery of Government to slow down; the bribetaker and influence peddler who puts self above country; the public official who follows any agenda but duty to country.

We cannot isolate ourselves from each other. We cannot tolerate even the appearance of disunity. Our people expect us to work together as one solid team. After all, we have one constituency: the Filipino people. One objective: their progress and rescue from poverty. Our people are impatient for results. We cannot tarry or fumble. We must move with speed and telling effect.

The 280 housing units we are inaugurating today are just the first batch of the on-base housing project jointly funded by AFP financial institutions. It is a modest attempt to match the house of democracy so ably defended here with homes and livelihoods worthy of the soldier's daily sacrifice.

The project covers not only Camp Aguinaldo but also Villamor Air Base, Fort Bonifacio, Camp Bagong Diwa and eventually all major AFP camps, ports and stations countrywide. The San Mateo housing project, covering 120 hectares for some 6,000 houses for enlisted personnel and officers, is inspired by the same objective: a home worth defending for the soldier offering his life.

The Development Bank of the Philippines and PAG-IBIG have committed themselves to this same objective. The National Housing Authority is providing assistance in developing major areas designated for AFP housing.

Jointly with the Military Housing board, the NHA has announced that 5,000 lots in Taguig will be fully developed by the NHA. Under the NHA sites and Services Project in Carmona, Cavite, 3,000 lots are ready and developed for enlisted men's housing. The total lots made available by the NHA is 8,000.

Retired General Mison, now in the PNB Board, submitted last month another housing project to be financed by the Philippine National Bank.

The GSIS came up with a solution to the ownership problem of 596 enlisted personnel under the old Presidential Security Command.

The basic issue is affordability. I would like to encourage you in your projects to cut the cost of housing units without compromising the comfort, convenience and safety that our soldiers and their families deserve.

I know the concerns of military widows, specially regarding the education of their children. Existing programs are not adequate to their needs. I have therefore asked a number of private schools to provide special scholarships for the children of soldiers killed in action. Southridge School and the Aquino Foundation have already responded enthusiastically to my plea.

There are other needs that must be met. We were working on this long before last Friday's tragedy. But I am sure that the work which now bears fruit in concrete projects will be deliberately misinterpreted as yielding. But I will not let false pride stand in the way of basic needs.

I am endorsing to the Congress a special public works bill in the amount of P200 million.

The AFP has proposed the release of P16 million from the Calamity Fund for the Officers' Club House, which shall serve as temporary quarters for GHQ. I approved this request today.

I devoted a third of my State of the Nation Message to the requirements of greater military effectiveness, for military initiatives are needed to buy time for our economic programs to bear fruit. The Budget that followed that Message therefore reflected this first priority. The budget for the AFP as endorsed by the Defense Department was therefore readily approved. But after the Budget was submitted to Congress, I was told that original Defense estimates nonetheless fell short of AFP requirements. The estimates were re-calculated and the addition is now the subject of a supplemental budget bill.

The soldiers are not the only public servants whose needs are urgent. But we have only so much to spend for the needs of our people.

The progress of our economy, which last Friday's coup has undoubtedly set back severely, will answer for these other needs. If there is progress. And if our enemies will let us.

We must all work harder now to regain what we lost, and to take off again from where we were on the road to recovery.

It has seemed like one step forward, two steps back since democracy was restored in the Philippines. But we cannot give up. Our people have made so many sacrifices already. Let us take up the burden again and move forward, retracing the steps we lost, and with a stronger resolve to overcome.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the canonization of San Lorenzo Ruiz

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the canonization of San Lorenzo Ruiz

[Released on October 7, 1987]

AT LAST, A FILIPINO SAINT

Lorenzo Ruiz of Manila was “a most ordinary” Filipino who was tortured to death in Japan in 1637, thus achieving greatness for his martyrdom to the Faith. In his canonization, President Aquino declares, we meet the challenge to rise, with God’s help, to the demands of the present.

On October 18, Blessed Lorenzo Ruiz of Manila will be raised to the altars for the veneration of the entire Catholic world, by Pope John Paul II, at the piazza of St. Peter’s basilica. After four hundred years of Christianity in the Philippines, we will have our own first Filipino saint.

What strikes those who read of this man’s life is its ordinariness and obscurity. Born in Binondo of a Chinese father and a Filipina-Tagalog mother, married, with three children, he made his living as an escribano for the Dominican Fathers. His name would never have made the pages of any history book, were it not for a series of improbable events which led him, reluctantly at first, and then with heroic fidelity, to arrest and trial, torture and martyrdom for his faith, in Nagasaki in Japan in 1637.

In the canonization of “a most ordinary” Filipino, a layman, we meet the challenge to rise, with God’s help, to the demands which the present makes of all of us and each of us. Lorenzo Ruiz would perhaps never have arrived at the full measure of his greatness had not the unsought-for demand of martyrdom been made of him. But when it was made, he found the courage, in the power of God’s grace, “to hold his own self in his own hands” and to “stand fast” in his faith to the end. In that steadfastness he now stands forever before us. He tells us that we too can try to respond as he did to the demands we face now in our own lives, in our own moment of history. He inspires us to do all that lies in us, relying finally on God’s strength and power in the struggle to have justice and love prevail in our society today.

In Lorenzo Ruiz we realize with a certain freshness the truth of Ninoy’s words, “The Filipino is worth dying for.” As the bells ring in jubilation throughout our land, and Lorenzo Ruiz de Manila is declared a saint, let us thank God for this singular gift. He gives us and our race, and generations of Filipinos after us. Let us renew in our hearts our faith in God as a people, our resolve to seek and be faithful to His will and His law, for without this we know our nation cannot hold as one. And let us ask our new saint to intercede for us, that the “many thousands of lives” he was willing to give for God, we may find the courage to give, under God, for the healing and making whole of our sadly divided land. Let us pray that something of Lorenzo Ruiz’s dedication, self-giving and courage may enter into our own lives, and that we may become, each in our small measure, the saints and heroes the challenge of our time calls us to be.

San Lorenzo Ruiz de Manila, pray for us.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Senator Manglapus' acceptance of the Cabinet post

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Senator Manglapus' acceptance of the Cabinet post

[Released on October 9, 1987]

FROM THE SENATE TO THE CABINET

The President announces Senator Raul S. Manglapus' acceptance of the position of Secretary of Foreign Affairs. She describes this move to resign from the Senate to join the Aquino Cabinet as an "extraordinary, although not unprecedented, step."

I am pleased to announce that Senator Raul S. Manglapus has accepted the position of Secretary of Foreign Affairs. I have submitted his nomination to the Commission on Appointments.

I asked Senator Manglapus to take the extraordinary, although not unprecedented, step of resigning from the Senate and joining my Cabinet because, in this our critical period of transition, the nation needs a man of exceptional ability, dedication, intelligence and experience to guide our foreign relations and he is the Filipino who today most eminently possesses those qualities.

Senator Manglapus has long been an outstanding articulator of our national issues, including that of foreign affairs. He was, of course, already Undersecretary and then Secretary of Foreign Affairs under Presidents Magsaysay and Garcia. He was Professor of Constitutional Law at the Ateneo Law School, author of the original agrarian reform law in his first term in the Senate, and leader of the Progressives in the Constitutional Convention of 1971-72.

In his exile, he wrote books on international relations at Harvard University, Cornell University and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and taught at the School of International Service at American University.

He was President of the Movement for a Free Philippines which fought peacefully for the return of democracy. His efforts for world democracy received international recognition when he was elected President of the International Center for Development Policy in Washington, D.C., and two other positions which he still holds, that of Vice President of the Christian Democratic International, based in Rome and Brussels, and President of the Democracy International, based in Washington, D.C.

Senator Manglapus, in the first two months of our new Senate, again displayed remarkable legislative leadership as Chairman of the Committee on National Defense and Security and of the Committee on Science and Technology.

I know that our people who voted him to the Senate will not begrudge him this shift in the character of his public service, for like others before him, such as Ramon Magsaysay who once resigned from the House of Representatives when the country needed him more as Secretary of National Defense, Senator Manglapus has agreed to resign from the Senate because we have persuaded him that the nation, at this moment of our history, needs him even more as Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

Senator Manglapus will bring to the Cabinet his talent, patriotism, and Christian-Muslim Democratic vision and I am sure the whole nation is grateful that he has accepted this extraordinary call to public service.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the International Assembly on Human Rights

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the International Assembly on Human Rights

[Released on October 9, 1987]

AN UNCHANGED COMMITMENT TO UPHOLD HUMAN RIGHTS

After a respite, the country is again being challenged by extremist forces. Yet her Administration, President Aquino says, remains steadfast in the quest for unity and peace. Its record of adherence to human rights remain true to the ideals of the February Revolution.

When someone said long ago: "Love your neighbor as yourself; and love does no harm to its neighbor," thus might have been born the human rights movement as we know it today.

Even at the time, it was not a Commandment men easily adhered to. The Author Himself suffered from the rage and violence that have continued to perplex, plague and divide communities of men from age to age.

We in the Philippines had our respite of peace and a momentary reaffirmation of our brotherhood. Yet 18 months hence, we are challenged again, and again violently, by forces of the Left and Right. Yet we hope and persist, and will, God-willing, prevail in our quest for unity and peace because that was how we began our journey towards new nationhood. And in our country, we have a saying: "Those who lose sight of where they came from will also lose their focus on where they intend to go."

Our third Philippine President Ramon Magsaysay, viewing the great majority of Filipinos stricken by poverty, immediately prescribed the least that was due them. "They who have less in life," he said, "should have more in law." Today our resources remain scanty and thinly spread out among us, but we have restored our judicial system and ratified a Constitution that defines and defends the right of every Filipino. Nineteen sections of that document uphold the tenets of social justice and human rights. Our center forces have been victim to travesties by extremists, but our government's record of adherence to those human rights remains true to the ideals of our popular revolution.

I have no absolute answers on how the flood tides of exploitation, destruction and oppression that periodically wash over so many societies worldwide can be stemmed. I know only that men also have a tendency towards peace and brotherhood, for I observed it in my husband during the last years of his life, in a brief but shining moment in our nation's history, and in the convening of this international assembly of men dedicated to the upliftment and protection of the rights of men.

"Who is my neighbor?" someone had asked the Author of that second Commandment. And the answer, following the telling of a parable, was – the man who had mercy and compassion. The world we dream of inhabiting will be created yet by such men. Many of you, I trust, will be among them.

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, October 20, 1987]

SPELLING OUT GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Addressing businessmen, the President informs them that Government has an economic blueprint, and the military's professionalism saved the day during the August 28 coup. She also (1) rules out peace talks with the National Democratic Front; (2) orders the dismantling of illegal barricades of strikers; (3) announces that growth must take priority over foreign debt; (4) creates an Action Committee with a single member – "me"; (5) orders the Manila mayor to clean up the city in a week's time; (6) directs the Department of Public Works to cover all potholes; (7) orders PLDT to improve its service; (8) announces that all Government nonperforming assets will be sold to the highest bidder, and that all Government hotels are up for sale; and (9) orders the investigation of graft and corruption cases against senior government officials.

You invited me here because you say you are concerned about the Presidency, about the way things are going – or not going – in the economy, in the labor front, in politics, in the war against the Communists. Above all, I am told, you are concerned about me, and my leadership.

But first: the formalities. Let me say that it is a pleasure to meet with businessmen, "the engines of economic growth," as you are referred to in all our economic plans. In the next 20 months, I hope to see many more of you, together with those who work with you, on the shop floor and in the fields of your businesses. Because it is there, where Filipinos put their shoulders to the wheel of our national economy, that our future is made.

I have to say that at the beginning because there has been more talk than work in our country today. That is a pity. Because recovery and progress won't come through talking. At this time, when all the talk is about coups and I strikes, it is worth remembering that it is work, by all of us, that is going to lift us to better times.

When politics gets in the way of work, we have a problem. And there's been too much politics.

Let me get down to the issues that made you invite me here.

Issue number one: Government lacks a program of economy and politics.

First, the economy. It is said that Government lacks a coherent plan of economy. Wrong. We have a detailed Medium Term Plan. We are following that plan to the letter, making adjustments here and there as need arises. A lot of spirited and intelligent debate went into the making of that plan. Some people said that the over-spirited debates proved a flaw in the Government. On the contrary, I thought the debates assured a better plan. The Plan sets the direction this Government would like the country to take. It is not set in concrete, because we do not pretend that the Plan foresees every contingency. But there is a direction. If you don't like the direction, let us know. We can reopen the debate. This is a democracy.

The state of the economy was clearly and accurately described by me in my State of the Nation Message. I recounted the disappointments we had met in our effort I to revive the economy with external assistance, but I also pointed out the healthy signs in the economy. Recession bottomed out in late 1986. We posted a modest 1.5 percent GNP growth, whereas the two previous years had been negative. The reforms we had implemented improved the situation further. First quarter GNP, 1987, posted a growth of 5.5 percent. Unemployment dropped from 12 percent to 11.2. The exchange rate remained stable, but I made no promise that it was locked there with any degree of permanence. We had $2.4 billion in reserves. For the first time in three years, investments started to grow.

These were the effects of the structural reforms we had implemented. All monopolies, from sugar to sardines are gone; more than 2,000 items are freed from licensing, with a further 260 items to go. Price controls, whose inefficiencies and distortions always meant they hit the poor hardest, are gone. From power costs to rural credit, we have moved to reform and clean up, so that we can put the country back to work. We shall do more to de-regulate all economic activities, so that the businessman is not hostage to the bureaucrat and the politician. With due regard to public health and safety, we shall move to eliminate licenses and permits to the extent possible.

I pointed out certain weaknesses in our economy – those weaknesses have been aggravated by the public reaction to the August 28 coup attempt. The reaction, let me emphasize, not the coup attempt. The coup was defeated by a timely decision to use maximum force. But our victory was quickly undone by reactions to the coup. That reaction took the form of rumors of another coup; of talk about fatal weakness of the Government, which had roundly defeated the coup; of divisions between military and civilians although the coup was defeated by the solidarity of the two sectors. What happened?

I am not surprised that instead of backslapping congratulations, there was hand wringing instead. For we Filipinos did it again. Coups, successful or unsuccessful, are usually bloodless affairs. But the last attempt was one of the bloodiest anywhere in the world. Another Filipino first. But it doesn't erase the fact that the coup was roundly defeated, the perpetrators are swaying in LSTs awaiting trial, and their leaders are in hiding.

But better than defeating coups, is deterring them, and removing, or at least reducing, the reasons they get some support. The soldiers have legitimate needs that have not been met, BUT they have never been ignored by my Government. We continue to scrape the barrel of our resources to give them better conditions and better equipment for the all-important task of keeping the peace and destroying our enemies. I will go back to this later.

It is said that Government has had no blueprint of political development. I had a blueprint that you helped me formulate when I challenged Marcos for the possession of state power. The blueprint called for a restoration of democracy, respect for its processes, adoption of a democratic Constitution, the establishment of its necessary institutions such as an independent and honorable judiciary, an accountable Executive, and a representative Legislature. I came to power with a democratic blueprint that did not sit well with those who had other ideas about how power should be shared and exercised in this country, such as by a junta. I rejected those ideas and stuck to my blueprint, and I carried it out to the letter and in record time, despite numerous attempts to sidetrack me by coups and threats, all of which I defeated.

We now have a Supreme Court and a revamped judiciary that no one can take exception to, that everyone lauds for its new honesty, competence and independence.

We gave the nation a Constitution that stripped me of the vast, supreme powers I held in my single hand, and got it ratified by a sweeping majority such as this nation had never experienced in its entire history. It is truly a people's Constitution and the manner of its ratification did honor once more to the great people we are so fortunate to be part of.

Pursuant to that Constitution, I called for legislative elections. There were efforts to derail those elections. The people came through again, voting in record numbers, to give us a genuinely elected and truly representative Congress.

Early next year, we shall have local elections.

Part of the blueprint called for a reorganization of the Government, to make it more efficient and responsive. And I gave you, by and large, men and women of the highest integrity and competence to administer that new Government.

So did I have a blueprint? You know I did. And you helped me implement it, in record time to the astonishment of a skeptical world. More than a blueprint, it is now an accomplished and, if I can help it, a permanent fact.

Issue number two: relations with the military. In a sound democracy, civilian government and its military arm have each their respective roles. One makes policy, including military policy, the other enforces it. But, obviously, we have been undergoing a period of adjustment, as all our institutions, the military included, come to terms with the new democracy. Still, the facts speak for themselves. With the military, we have crushed every challenge to the supremacy of civilian authority. There was turmoil. Naturally, because neither side would give up without a fight. They fought me, I fought back. Surrender would have been neater, but it is not in me to ever yield. I want peace as much as the next person, but not at any price. Reality is never neat or nice.

The August 28 coup attempt reveals a fissure in the military. That is true. But more importantly, the determined and forceful putting down of the attempt by the military shows the triumph of professionalism. As I said, there are groups still resisting their personal and permanent loss of power and prestige, but the military as a whole demonstrated that it is firmly with, not against, the new democracy. I retain full confidence in the professional leadership of the Armed Forces.

The period since the coup offers an even more interesting lesson. For all the threats of a further coup attempt, we have actually seen a retreat from military to political action. I suspect the coup bubble is burst.* Threatened coups are used to leverage the political pressure. Somebody forgot to tell them that the place for politics is not the parade ground anymore but the halls of Congress. I have every confidence that their fellow officers will finally get this message through to the dwindling band of coup makers.

Yet I know there will always be ambition. And you should know that I will always be there to stop it from getting out of hand. Those who are desperate to retrieve their lost privileges will do what they can: I will do what I must to stop them.

The third issue is the insurgency. There is talk again about new talks with the NDF. Let me clarify that. The truce ended last February when I ordered the AFP to resume operations against the Communist insurgents. Talk hadn't worked, so it was time to fight. And it is still fighting time. Therefore any talk of resuming talks with the NDF is unauthorized. The insurgents are daily killing our soldiers and civilians. They are destroying bridges and power lines, burning public buildings.

They blow up bridges, we rebuild them. They take down our power lines, we put them up again. All this takes a heavy toll on our economy and meager resources, but it has not and will not in any measure reduce our resolve to fight back and defeat them. The army has orders to hunt them down and pursue the war against the insurgents with absolute vigor.

Poor as our people are, and difficult enough as it is to recover from the ravages of dictatorship, the insurgents are determined to make life worse for everyone. By a twisted logic, they hope that the people will invite them to power so they will stop harassing them. They forget that Marcos tried the same approach with the Filipino people and is now in Hawaii regretting it. The extreme right is using the same strategy. They think that their coups, bombings and assassinations will break the people's resistance to their brand of government and make them accept peace and quiet at any price. I invite them especially to look at their mentor in Hawaii and contemplate his fate.

The war against the Communists must be waged by civilians as well as by the military, by OICs and by officers. I hold both responsible for the results I am still waiting for.

Of course, military initiatives are not enough. Economic improvement and expanded social services are the long-term and final solutions. But we need military victories to buy us the time to make our programs work; to buy us the conditions in which our services can reach the people and change their lives for the better.

One month before the August 28 coup attempt, I devoted a third of my State of the Nation Message to the requirements of a better fighting force, and the Congress is now acting on my specific requests.

My counter-insurgency policy has always been clear. First talk, in keeping with my pledge to negotiate a peace that respects law and democracy. And then fight, should it fail. I have said clearly all that needs to be said. Am I also expected to take up an M-16 myself and do it, just I like I went to the fiscal's office myself to vindicate my honor?

The fourth issue you want a straight answer to is labor. I know you believe that the strike situation has become bad, nor are you willing to accept anymore the answer that this is the exuberance of democracy. And I don't blame you because there is something premeditated and carefully planned I about this exuberance.

I opened my remarks by saying that the future of our nation will be decided on the shop floors and fields of the economy. We have to get our labor relations right. That means labor must accept the same values that drive our democracy: tolerance, fairness, respect for the law, and a shared commitment to bring progress not chaos to our nation.

The right of collective bargaining is enshrined in the Constitution, but so is the duty to preserve order and respect for the law. I believe we must establish a decent daily wage for all our working people and, beyond that, we must have a flexible wage bargaining system that reflects productivity. But I will not tolerate the abuse of any rights. I will not allow an unruly minority to use the rights of labor to improve the conditions of labor to achieve a Communist victory instead. The way to power is the ballot, not the strike.

I therefore order the police and other peacekeeping authorities to give full assistance to the Labor Department to remove all illegal blockades at the factory gates.

A special peacekeeping force has been organized and is now being trained to enforce return-to-work orders and injunctions issued by the Department, so that our response to resistance will be calibrated and reasonable in the application of force.

The Department of National Defense and the Department of Labor will finalize and sign within this week "The Guidelines for the Conduct of the INP/AFP Personnel During Strikes and Lockouts."

The Labor Department has issued the guidelines to clarify the conduct of strikes and lockouts to clarify the rights and obligations of the parties to labor disputes.

But for all that, I ask you, the business community, to do your share. Business operates for profits, and it is hard indeed for all of us to make a go of things while the economy is still struggling to recover. Our laboring class is very poor, and their lives are truly difficult. It amazes me how they survive. I ask you to search your minds and hearts, and probe your pockets, to share with your brothers and sisters in the labor sector the gains you make. Business and labor are indispensable partners in the growth of a free economy. They should act toward each other in that light. Labor has its rights, as much as you have yours. But in the end, what will work is not the mutual enforcement of rights so much as a mutual commitment to grow together in prosperity. That commitment has been demonstrated by the Filipino small businessman and by the Filipino-Chinese entrepreneur who appear to have no problems about this Government's alleged lack of vision, because they have a 20/20 vision for the opportunities that democracy and honest government have opened up.

They know my vision of this nation. A nation immersed in work, and not lost in idle talk. A nation free and at peace with itself and its neighbors; a nation respected in the councils of the world. A nation strong because its people are strong, healthy, well-fed, well-housed, well-educated and firm in their commitment to the rights and freedoms that are the foundation of their dignity. It is a vision we can achieve as surely as we achieved the first: the restoration of democracy which we now enjoy.

The fifth issue I want to raise is foreign debt. That debt is growing even without fresh borrowing. Servicing the debt alone takes up over 40 percent of the budget, and over 45 percent of our export earnings. In the next six years we shall have to pay $20 billion to our official and private creditors, while we shall be getting only $4 billion in additional loans. That means we shall pay out $16 billion more than we will be getting.

Our policy has been very clear from the start: growth must take priority, for the plain and simple reason that if we have no money to pay, we can't. And if we starve the nation of essential services, there may be no one around willing to honor the debt.

Meanwhile, I have instructed our representatives to consolidate the rescheduling agreement by November 15th. That should end speculation and remove at least one excuse for hoarding dollars.

The sixth issue is what really brought you here. The question you all really want to ask is: Can she hack it? Isn't she weak? These are the questions that were asked by all those who have openly challenged my power, authority and resolve, and who have suffered for it. I speak of the shamefaced officers who have abandoned their followers to await trial in LSTs, and the failed politicians who made the last places in the last elections and are now trying to find a backdoor to power.

Well, they can forget it. Although I am a woman and physically small, I have blocked all doors to power except elections in 1992.

You invited me here on the issue of Presidential leadership. The honeymoon is over, isn't it? It didn't last very long. By mid-1986, my Cabinet was getting it. By August, the attacks were hitting closer to the Presidency. And now, it is out openly against me. The Cory who could do no wrong in those early invigorating months after February 1986, is seen as having done nothing at all. Nothing in spite of a Constitution, a Congress, and a well-thought out body of legislation that sets the direction of this nation to progress if you have the courage to follow.

Still you ask, Is she weak? Again, I say, let my scattered enemies answer that.

Still, you have reason to ask. For the style of Government, by consultation, which I hoped would get your understanding and support, has disappointed you, has given you a sense of drift.

It is time again to simplify.

Henceforth I shall rule directly as President. To the ad hoc committees and commissions created to inform me on their special areas, I now add one more: an Action Committee with a single member me.

A President is supposed to be above details, but it seems I must do nearly everything myself.

For a modest start, Metro Manila Governor Jejomar Binay will now turn over the responsibility and authority for collecting the garbage in Manila to OIC Mayor Mel Lopez and the other mayors of Metro Manila. I give Mel Lopez one week to clean up the mess that's been neglected. The public should cooperate. Let's respect ourselves by not making a garbage can of our surroundings.

The Department of Public Works is directed to cover all potholes in the First District of Manila within one week, and is given one-week periods to fix up all the other districts in succession.

The National Power Corporation was poised to increase its rates due to the increase in the international price of crude oil. There will be no increase in power rates this year. Instead, I have directed all concerned agencies to submit immediately the necessary measures to prevent this increase, which measures I will implement this week.

The PLDT must attend to all complaints within 24 to 48 hours, or at least apprise the subscriber that the fault is in the cable and how long it will take to fix it.

I urge the PLDT management to come up with a comprehensive program for improving service and upgrading facilities. The Central Bank, the Department of Transportation and Communications, the NTC, and the NEDA are directed to give them the fullest assistance.

I have ordered an investigation of Meralco on the frequent brownouts, scheduled and unscheduled, that destroy industrial machinery and cut the incomes of our workers.

There is grave doubt about the seriousness of our privatization policy. There is always an excuse for Government not to sell. Fine. Therefore let me make this clear:

I want Government to get out of business. I want it to cash in on all the investments it should never have made.

Non-performing assets listed to be sold, WILL be sold in open bid to the highest bidder. First preference goes to the bidder with most cash up front, using, and let me emphasize this, only fresh money. Buyers who want to use the target company's own funds are obviously going to run it to the ground. The preferred procedure is open bidding. Filipinos and foreigners will compete on the same terms, subject of course to Constitutional limitations. In general, ability to pay the highest price will decide conclusively. That is how PCIBank and Associated Bank will be sold. Combank is a negotiated deal because there is only one serious bidder. I will not tie up hundreds of millions of pesos just to keep some people in their jobs.

All our hotels are up for sale. Including Manila Hotel. Foreigners are invited to bid for the allowable equity. The sale of Philippine Airlines is under serious consideration. We can't have it landing on the South Superhighway. There's enough traffic there.

The policy, in brief, is: no funny deals. No clever schemes. No fears, no favors.

If anyone says that I have made an exception for him or her, report it to the press and to me. I got a copy of an application filed with the Central Bank for the importation of eight million cases of apples. It is signed, "Corazon Aquino, President of the Philippines," as if the signer wasn't sure if the Central Bank knew I was President. Now that's a crook who isn't going to get far. More likely, that's a piece of black propaganda that isn't going to fly. Eight million cases means more apples than there are Filipinos.

I cannot issue a directive to all the banks on this matter, but let it be known that any application for importation of anything, apples, castañas, oranges and guns, alleged to be signed, endorsed, supported or whatever by me or any of my kin should be reported to me and to the NBI.

I have heard the talk of the coffeeshops I addressing your concern about graft and corruption Government. I have directed the Special Prosecutor Office and the NBI to give first priority to the investigation and prosecution of graft and corruption cases against senior Government officials, including the members of my Cabinet.

I am not sorry the honeymoon is over. The sooner we get over the fantasy of the honeymoon and face the hard work of marriage – the marriage of President and nation – the better.

I recently read a formulation of Presidential leadership by Hedley Donovan: "The honesty of Abraham Lincoln, the intelligence of Henry Kissinger and the soothing TV personality of Marcus Welby/Robert Young." He goes on to quote approvingly a former US congressman who said: "The President should like his fellow man, and he should have read Machiavelli." Transposed to this country, you might say the ideal President would have the courage of Abad Santos, the intelligence of Diokno, the charisma of Magsaysay, and the love of country of the men and women and children who converged on EDSA in February '86.

That's quite a tall order, and it is no surprise that the ideal President has never lived and is defined by the traits of different leaders facing different challenges in different times.

I do just fine on the honesty and liking my fellowman, although recently there have been exceptions. But there is no regret on my part if there is not much of Machiavelli. I don't have all those qualities. Some of my enemies, who contributed to the mess left by the previous government, claim to possess them. Maybe, but they lack the one quality I alone have: election to the Presidency and a mandate for my principles and policies that has been tested in a massive voter's registration, a plebiscite, a sweeping electoral victory for the Congress, and in five coups that were handily beaten by me and my forces. They lack the one thing the people will never give them: trust.

I do not have all the qualities of the ideal President who never existed. But I have the qualities for the leadership of our nation in these times. After years of stealing, degradation and abuse from our leaders, the Filipino people made a clear choice. They wanted a leader whose honesty and commitment to them would never be in doubt; who would not clamp down but rather open up the country so that all could be heard; and who would bind our wounds so that we could, as one nation, work together to overcome our common crisis of economic decline.

I expect sniping from yesterday's men, passed over as they are, by the march of history. To all other Filipinos, though, I say the tide is with us. Together our future can be as bright as we choose to make it. So judge my leadership as the sum of all our strengths. What sets me apart is that I bring us together where others would divide us as a nation. Those who challenge me, challenge us.

The last time I spoke here before you, I left you with a slogan that carried us to victory. I leave you with this:

Sobra	na	ang	komunista
Tama	na	sa	kudeta
Ipaglaban ang demokrasya.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the International Travel Agents

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines Before the International Travel Agents

[Delivered at the Philippine International Convention Center, October 26, 1987]

WE'LL MAKE TOURISM GROW

The President calls upon international travel agents to bring more tourists to the Philippines and “witness this miracle of democracy and progress.” She reminds them that the Government is committed to divest itself to the private sector.

First, let me thank you for coming here. I have read the papers abroad, and know the bad image that recent events have painted. Your coming just the same shows that you can still see the fundamental improvement, beneath the continued attempts of ambitious men to overturn what is this country's greatest selling point: its freedom and democracy, and, the people who made it happen and keep it going.

The chief virtue of this country is not just the scenery, or the beautiful things its skillful people make, but the people themselves – and the experiment they are making in their lives and society. It is an experiment whose beginnings you shared and cheered as you watched the triumph of democracy unfold on television screens and across the headlines of your countries' newspapers. You were with us in spirit and I know you are still with us. That is why you are here, to help make our dream a reality. The dream of a nation progressive, prosperous and strong in democracy, a country whose physical beauty should match the happiness of its people.

You can help us greatly in bringing more people here to witness this miracle of democracy and progress, and in your own way help make it happen.

This Government is pledged to do its part.

Last week at the Manila Hotel, I told the gathered businessmen that I want the Manila Hotel and all other government owned or controlled hotels to be sold at the earliest possible time. Similarly, I pledged to sell the Philippine Airlines – which is plainly too costly for the Government to support and manage properly, according to the principles of free enterprise.

I said that Filipinos and foreigners shall compete equally in bidding for these facilities. None of these enterprises and facilities being essential to national security, I should like to see them all sold, immediately, and fairly. There are areas of development in any country that must be strictly nationalist, but tourism is one important aspect of development that must be international, that requires the hands of friendship and cooperation stretched across the skies to make it happen. So there will be no excuses, no long-term studies, no dilly-dallying in carrying out this commitment to make tourism a growth industry in this country.

The sale of these hotels and other facilities, and especially of the Philippine Airlines, to entities with extensive international networks or chains, will increase tourist traffic to the Philippines. In this way, Philippine tourism will have a secure place in the flow of international tourism. You can help us right off by spreading the message that Government aims to divest swiftly to those in the private sector, both local and foreign, who are most capable and committed to making the tourism industry grow in the Philippines.

Much of this traffic, I am told, stays briefly. It is logical therefore to develop tourist facilities now easily accessible from Manila. While we do not mean to neglect the other potentially great tourist spots in more distant parts of the Philippines, our objective is to make the most accessible areas attractive to tourism immediately. We shall therefore emphasize projects with the shortest payback times in areas now already accessible. So, the tourism campaign we are waging today is not meant to bear fruit in the distant future. We shall try to realize it as soon as possible.

Aside from public works construction, there are less costly but equally effective ways to bring and keep tourists here. That is why I gave the mayor of Manila the authority and sole responsibility to clean up Manila in one week. That is also why I have given one-week deadlines to the Department of Public Works to fix up the streets of Manila. You will see results very shortly.

I welcome you here also because I would appreciate your own insights and observations. I am sure there is much we can learn from you on how to improve tourism prospects in this country. I shall pay close attention to your discussions here.

Your being here shows your commitment to grow with us in prosperity. I deeply appreciate it and look forward to a long and mutually beneficial partnership. For a start, you can help me spread the message that the tourism business in the Philippines is going to be played by the book the book of free enterprise, where there shall be no favors to a few, but opportunities equal for everyone.

Message of President Corazon Aquino before the World Peace Corps

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the World Peace Corps

[Released on November, 1987]

A GENUINE REGARD FOR THE INDIVIDUAL

Peace is one that comes from the humble and healing act of kindness. That is what the Peace Corps has been all about. This will lead to lasting peace if the governments would follow their lead and touch the lives of their people directly.

Peace is every government's proclaimed passion. In many cases, I believe, the desire is sincere, but the result has rarely been successful. That is because the rationale for peace has been the costliness of war.

On the strategic plane of war, the price, it is well argued, is unacceptable.

But for as long as we continue to judge wars on a cost benefit basis, the effort will be, not on the total abolition of war, but on the reduction of its cost through the increased swiftness and efficiency of its conduct. For as long as we refuse to question the aims of war, be they national order, national security or, ironically, peace – its horrors will always be us.

The way to lasting peace lies in a genuine regard for the individual who suffers it, for the children who are orphaned but now, more often, killed along with their families; for the communities that are shattered, and for the abiding hatred that is sown to produce the next harvest of conflict.

I have seen only one program for peace that makes sense. And it is one that proceeds from the humble and healing act of kindness.

That is what the Peace Corps has been all about.

It's young and dedicated volunteers in my country have shown the way towards a firmer foundation for peace and harmony than the grand designs that are better known and lauded.

The Summits of the Peace Corps take place in the most inaccessible areas where the poorest of our people coax from tired soils the barest existence.

They are summits between the idealism of American youth and the reciprocal affection of the people they care for, to whom they impart methods of self-reliance and improvement that give them greater dignity than honors of war can confer. They do this by living the same lives and enduring the same discomforts as the people among whom they work.

That the Peace Corps has not achieved lasting peace in the communities they work in derogates in no way from the value of their work. On the contrary, their examples point the way to lasting peace if governments would only follow their lead by going out and putting an improving touch on the lives of their peoples directly.

I am deeply honored to be given this opportunity to pay tribute once more to the Peace Corps. The Corps exemplifies the best virtues of the American people – the preference for action over words and for immediate relief over endless study on the ways to relieve poverty. The Corps is unashamed, in this world that prizes cold and self-seeking realism, to say that love is its motivation and individual acts of kindness its chief program of action.

The Corps is indeed the part of a great American's dream that will surely live on.

On behalf of the Filipino, may I extend our heartfelt congratulations to the Peace Corps.

Message of President Corazon Aquino on the Guarantee Fund

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Guarantee Fund

[Released on November, 1987]

ENGINE OF THE ECONOMY

The significant contributions of five banks to the GFSME program is a show of exemplary trust in the entrepreneurial spirit and hardwork of small and medium Filipino businessmen.

I am pleased to welcome the management board of the Guarantee Fund, and most especially the five banks which, in the past 2 years, made the most significant contribution in the delivery of credit to small and medium scale enterprises. For this notable achievement, you have the gratitude of the nation and the heartfelt congratulations of your President.

By their significant contributions to the GFSME program, the Cocobank, Planters Development Bank, PCIBank, Luzon Development Bank and Asia trust have shown a truly exemplary trust in the entrepreneurial spirit and hard work of small and medium Filipino businessmen, who are really the bedrock of our economy; the ones who, complaining least and working hardest, are true Filipinos.

The five banks and the businessmen they support are taking seriously the role that Philippine business has claimed for itself: that of being the engine of the economy.

While we are committed to withdrawing Government from business, rest assured that we shall match, by programs that foster self-reliance and responsibility, the patriotism that your five banks have shown.

Thank you and congratulations.

Pagpapasinaya

November 7, 1987

Bayto

river

PATUBIG SA KAUNLARAN

Sa pamamagitan ng proyektong ito ng pagpapatubig, naniniwala ako na mas uunlad ang pamumuhay ng libu-libong mamamayang Pilipino at ito ay maisasakatuparan kung ang mga mamamayan kabilang na ang mga magsasaka ay makikipagtulungan sa pamahalaan.

Magandang umaga po sa inyong lahat. Ako'y nagagalak na makapiling kayo sa napakahalagang pagtitipong ito kung saan pasisinayaan ang Bayto River Irrigation Project na batid kong siyang pangunahing tugon upang matighaw ang pagkatuyo ng mga lupain dito sa inyong lalawigan. Sa pagkakataong ito'y nais kong basahin sa inyo mula sa Banal na Kasulatan ang magandang salita ng Panginoong Diyos tungkol sa kahalagahan ng tubig. Sa Aklat ng Lumang Tipan ay sinabi ng Panginoon: “. . . Punuin ninyo ang kanal ng lambak na ito. Wala kayong makikitang hangin o ulan ngunit ang lambak na ito ay mapupuno ng tubig na mainom ninyo at ng inyong hayop . . . Kinabukasan nang malapit na ang oras ng paghahandog, dumating ang agos ng tubig mula sa Edom. Ang lupain ay napuno ng tubig.” Idinugtong pa sa Kasulatan, “Maliit na bagay lamang ito sa Panginoon.” Totoong maliit na bagay lamang ito sa Panginoon, subalit sabi nga ng kawikaan, “nasa Diyos ang awa, nasa tao ang gawa.” Kaya ako'y lubos na nagagalak sa araw na ito ng pagpapasinaya ng sistemang ito ng patubig dito sa Sta. Cruz, Zambales.

Napag-alaman ko buhat kay NIA Administrator Freddie Alday na ang proyektong ito ay makapagpapatubig sa humigit-kumulang sa 1,600 ektaryang lupain sa anim na baranggay ng Sta. Cruz.

Dahil dito, inaasahang lalaki ang inyong ani at makapagtatanim pa kayo ng dalawang beses sa loob ng isang taon. Tinatayang tataas ang kabuuang ani sa loob ng isang taon nang mula 60,000 kaban sa kasalukuyan hanggang 160,000 kaban sa kabuuang lawak na sakop ng taniman. Bawat magsasaka ay makapagtatamo ng humigit-kumulang sa 100 kaban sa bawat ektaryang lupang kanyang sinasaka kung ang kanilang pagtatamnan ay lalapatan ng makabagong pamamaraan ng pagsasaka.

Binabati ko ang mga kawani ng Pambansang Pangasiwaan ng Patubig o NIA sa kanilang pagsisikap na mapaunlad ang katayuan ng mga magsasaka sa pamamagitan ng pagtatayo ng mga proyekto ng patubig tulad nitong Bayto River Irrigation Project.

Kaugnay nito ay dadagdagan pa ng ating pamahalaan ang pondo ng NIA mula sa taong 1988 upang maipagpatuloy ang pagpapagawa ng mas marami pang proyekto ng patubig.

Noong Pebrero 1986, sa unang taon ng aking pag-upo bilang Pangulo, ang pondo para sa pagpapalawak ng patubig ay nasa P36.5 milyon. Ito ay nadagdagan ng P1.1 bilyon mula Abril hanggang Disyembre 1986. Sa kasalukuyan, ang badyet ng NIA ay may kabuuang halagang P1.181 bilyon. Sa taong 1988 ay madadagdagan pa ito at aabot sa halagang P2.8 bilyon.

Ako'y nagagalak na sa kabila ng maliit na pondo ng NIA noong 1986, napatubigan natin ang may 30,000 ektaryang tuyong lupain, at nakumpuni o naisaayos ang mga lumang istraktura ng patubig na kasalukuyang nagpapadaloy ng tubig sa 86,000 ektaryang bukirin sa buong kapuluan. Sa kabuuan, ang karagdagang pambansang ani nanakamit dahil sa naturang dagdag na patubig ay tinatayang aabot sa mahigit sa limang milyong kaban ng palay.

Sa kasalukuyan, ang NIA ay nagpapatubig sa 1.4 milyong lupain na tinatamnan ng palay, gulay, mais at iba pang pananim. Ito ay binubuo ng 136 national irrigation systems na nagpapatubig sa 611,690 ektarya; 6,112 communal irrigation systems na nagpapatubig sa 704,685 ektarya; at 17,031 pump irrigation systems na nagpapatubig sa 152,503 ektarya.

Batay sa 3.1 milyong ektarya ng kabuuang lawak ng lupain na maaaring patubigan o potential areas for irrigation development, may nalalabi pang 1.6 milyong ektarya ng lupa na dapat pang patubigan sa buong kapuluan. Sa kasalukuyan, ito ang pinagsisikapan ng ating pamahalaan na mapatubigan.

Halimbawa ay uumpisahan na ang pagawain sa Balog-Balog Multi-purpose Project. Ang proyektong ito na nasa lalawigan ng Tarlac ay magpapatubig sa 39,150 ektaryang bukirin sa sampung bayan ng Tarlac. Ang imbakan ng tubig na ito ay magbibigay din ng karagdagang koryente sa tinatawag nating Luzon Grid. Ang proyektong ito ay magkakahalaga ng P4.5 bilyon.

Para sa taong 1988 ay uumpisahan naman ng NIA ang 437 communal irrigation projects na makapagpapatubig sa mahigit na 60,000 ektaryang lupa.

Malaki rin ang maitutulong ng mga proyektong ito sa pagbibigay ng hanap-buhay sa libu-libong mamamayang Pilipino. Kung matutupad ang programa ng ating pamahalaan sa pagpapalaganap ng patubig, tiyak na maiiwasan na ang suliranin sa kakapusan ng ani.

Subalit maisasakatuparan lamang ito kung ang mga mamamayan kabilang na ang mga magsasaka ay makikipagtulungan sa pamahalaan.

Kaya tinatawagan ko kayo minamahal kong mga kababayan . . . Ikaw . . . ako . . . kayo . . . tayong lahat. . . magkakabalikat sa pagsasakatuparan ng mga programang tutugon sa pangangailangan ng sambayanang Pilipino.

Iniiwanan ko sa inyo ang malaking paghamong ito . . . Nananalig ako na sa tulong ng Dakilang Maykapal, taas-noo nating maiaahon ang minamahal nating bansa sa kahirapan.

Maraming salamat po!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Philippine Investment Conference, November 12, 1987

Philippine Investment Conference
November 12, 1987

NO FEARS, NO FAVORS

The President stresses our need for foreign investments to fuel our recovery and growth. To encourage foreign investors, we must set the climate for them. Our policy is one of fairness and within constitutional limitations, one of equality towards Filipinos and foreigners who wish to invest in the future of this country.

Two weeks ago, I had the pleasure of addressing Philippine businessmen and managers on matters ranging from my Administration's economic platform to counter-insurgency, labor relations and presidential leadership. I reiterated in the clearest terms my policies in these areas. And I gave special emphasis to the topic of this conference: privatization of government-held assets.

I am grateful for this opportunity to stress again, before Philippine business's foreign counterparts, the Government's commitment to privatize its assets, to liquefy those investments which Government should never have made.

In that address, I said that I want Government to get out of business, and fast. I targetted specific companies for immediate disposition. I mentioned particularly this hotel, the Hyatt, the Philippine Plaza and the Philippine Airlines. None of these enterprises is of any strategic value to the nation and government. All have been a tragic drain of resources. I mentioned the Commercial Bank of Manila, whose sale should be concluded in a week; the Associated Bank; and controlling stock of PCIBank which will be bidded out on November 18. There will be no more postponements.

I laid down the procedures for disposition: open bidding, total transparency, and award to the bidder with the highest bid and the most cash upfront. Funds generated internally from the target company are unacceptable because illegal. We want fresh funds.

I said there would be no fears, and no favors. No fears that we will favor anyone, whatever his political credentials or history of suffering. We give no special premium for past political agony. We want cash on the barrelhead, because that is what we need to fuel our recovery and growth.

I said there would be no clever schemes, no dilatory tactics. Therefore, once the decision to sell is made, all government appointed directors must submit undated letters of resignation, so they will be in no position to thwart the transfer of control or to interfere in management once the sale is concluded.

I am considering turning over to the Asset Privatization Trust the bidding out of all government assets. The APT is doing a very fine and professional job. There have been no complaints. On the contrary, the APT has been justly praised for the fairness, transparency and speed of its procedure. This will prevent self-interested directors from delaying or distorting privatization.

Our policy, let me repeat, is one of fairness, and within constitutional limitations, one of equality towards Filipinos and foreigners who wish to invest in the future of this country.

The foreign investor is critical to our plans of recovery and growth, given the size of the foreign debt, its improvident investment and the present general reluctance of foreign banks to engage in new lending.

We need foreign investments. And we have set the climate for them. Behind the troubled headlines is the fact that our democracy has met every challenge, and emerged stronger from every confrontation with forces that seek to return this nation to corrupt, unaccountable and irresponsible government. Democracy is here to stay – along with the rule of law, and the equity and justice that mark it. All its institutions are firmly in place.

On structural and economic reforms, we have deregulated where regulation might obstruct progress, and responsibly regulated to promote the general welfare.

We have implemented reforms to improve tax collection and equitably distribute its burden. We have exacted greater financial discipline from government agencies and corporations. The progressive reduction of bank reserve requirements over the past 18 months indicates the expansionary stance that our monetary authorities have taken.

On the external front, we have reached agreement with the advisory group of commercial banks on a multi-year restructuring package. A restructuring agreement with the Paris Club is already effective for the period January 1, 1987 to June 30, 1988.

Along with our privatization policy, we have implemented a debt to equity conversion program to promote long-term equity investments in the country, as well as a moderate reduction in the foreign debt.

These reforms are already producing the desired results. The first half of 1987, shows an increase in gross domestic capital formation of 10.7 percent, after declining 73 percent in the last three years.

Foreign investment, based on balance of payments accounts, posted a significant increase in net flows in the 3rd Quarter: from $25 Million to $88 Million. Foreign investments increased by 53.1 percent – from $96 Million to $47 Million.

With a 5.1 percent growth in the first half of 1987, and an average inflation rate of 2.8 percent in the first nine months of this year, we can say, with some confidence, that an economic turnaround has occurred. But, unquestionable, the foundation for economic recovery has been laid.

But, like the recipe for dinosaur soap, the trick is to find dinosaur. In this case, it is private investments. For our whole programs of recovery and progress turns on a robust private sector committing its capital to the recovery and long-term growth of this nation. that is the key ingredient. I hope that this Conference will help us find it, in the magnitude and with the enduring commitment that the undertaking requires. I wish the Conference every success. Good day and thank you.

Message of President Corazon Aquino on the Business Sector, November 14, 1987

Business

November 14, 1987

COOPERATION OF ALL SECTORS

One of the long standing policies of the President is to keep government in government and leaving business to business. She stresses her desire to speed up privatization of some of the government corporations through the Asset Privatization Trust. She adds that labor and management must work together in a spirit of common commitment to national recovery, and the key element is the willing cooperation of all sectors in the task of recovery.

Ever since this speech was announced, I have been getting a lot of calls from people who want to know if today's speech will be as good as that of October 20.

First, I have to contend with the Left and then I have to contend with the Right, and now I am expected to outdo myself. Oh, come on, give me a break.

One speech turned a bad situation around. That's what people said after I addressed the businessmen last October 20. But I had merely repeated my long standing policies:

of respect for law and order, of all-out war against the armed enemies of the State, of integrity and quick performance in public service, of the equality of all before the law, and of keeping government in government and leaving business to business.

What was striking perhaps were the deadlines. For in the end, what is a speech but words, and what are words without action?

Therefore following on my directives of October 20:

I have adopted a package of measures to stop the NPC from increasing its power rate until the end of the year. Otherwise, NPC and MERALCO would have increased their rates by 12 centavos and 25 centavos per kilowatt hour, respectively, effective September this year.

MERALCO has briefed my Office on the measures needed to minimize systems losses, which include pilferage. I have the list of business establishments and individuals who are stealing electricity. The full force of the law will be applied to them. They will not be allowed to pass the cost of their theft onto the great majority who honestly pay their bills.

We have directed MERALCO to take the appropriate measures to reduce its systems losses to less than 10% so we can reduce power rates by the same percentage. This should bring down power costs in our country to the competitive levels of our ASEAN neighbors.

The MERALCO management is itself on the line here. We will not tolerate inefficiencies. Government owns MERALCO and has made a commitment to business to meet its energy needs.

Meanwhile, Government is vigorously pursuing a program for the widespread dispersal of the stock ownership of MERALCO. No single family or group will be allowed to hold a controlling or even a sizable bloc of MERALCO shares. Power is a strategic industry we cannot entrust to any bloc or family. We fought a revolution to restore freedom, but not to return to the past. We expect this divestment program to be completed in 1988.

We have finalized the government position on the rescheduling agreement for submission to our creditors tomorrow. Only two creditor banks have not signed the agreement.

I directed the Special Prosecutor's Office and the NBI to give first priority to the investigation and prosecution of graft and corruption cases against senior government officials, whether appointed or elected, whether related or not to me. Given the number of complaints, NBI Director Carpio has proposed the creation of a committee to implement this directive. Meanwhile, he is actively pursuing the case of Margarita Cojuangco.

I gave Mayor Mel Lopez a week to clean up Manila. I myself looked into the problem. He reports 90% completion. I don't see mounds of garbage anymore, but I still see litter. To augment the dumpsite in Balut, another has been opened which can accommodate garbage for another 6 months.

I issued Memorandum Circular No. 30 creating the Presidential Task Force on Waste Management to review the various proposals and studies on the garbage problem, and consolidate them in one comprehensive plan. There is provision for an alternative livelihood program for scavengers.

I gave the Department of Public Works successive one week deadlines to cover all potholes in the 6 districts of Manila, the Department reports:

100% completion on all national roads.
90% completion on all city and municipal roads.

I mentioned potholes. I should have specified trenches. There is a trench on the corner of Vito Cruz and Taft that's been there for over a year.

PLDT has directed its service centers to respond to complaints and fix them within 24-48 hours, unless there is a cable problem. Further to my directive, the PLDT has prepared a study on the telecommunications industry with recommendations to improve and upgrade telephone service in the country. I direct the NEDA, the Department of Finance and the Central Bank to study PLDT's proposals.

All the laws and regulations in this area were put together in the Telecommunications Code of the Philippines, but the former Batasan failed to act on it. It is being revised to include postal, aviation and maritime matters before submission to Congress.

On the insurgency, the AFP and Integrated National Police have recovered the initiative, launching more offensive actions than the enemy. Firearms have been recovered. The ratio of casualties is 1:3 in our favor. Metro Manila police have conducted saturation drives in the city. Local governments are starting to pitch in with livelihood programs.

The Communist foe has predictably responded by escalating its terrorist activities. This is the price of vigorous action on our part. We must be ready to pay it.

But I am equally concerned about, and as strongly condemn, the terrorism of the ultra right.

Pursuant to my directive, illegal barricades in 31 establishments were removed by the police or voluntarily dismantled by the strikers themselves.

Two barricades in the Bataan Export Processing Zone were voluntarily removed.

The Department of Labor and the Department of National Defense issued the guidelines for the conduct of the AFP/INP during strikes and lockouts. 130 members of the Special Peacekeeping Force have completed a seminar on labor laws and the appropriate procedures for their enforcement.

Last November 10, I met with labor leaders to discuss the creation of a Tripartite Review Committee to review the labor laws in order to promote more effectively the aims of industrial peace, employment generation, social justice and economic recovery. A high-level Tripartite Labor Management Council will serve as a continuing forum for the discussion of policies and measures to achieve these aims.

Now there is more order on the shopfloors, and I hope soon a greater compassion and sense of justice in the hearts of management.

Labor and management must work together in a spirit of common commitment to national recovery. Meek obedience to the law will not give us that explosion of labor energy, ingenuity and dedication that created the newly industrialized nations of Asia.

Only a sense of shared destiny, of common cause, on the part of management and labor will achieve the miracle we need in our economy.

The only way to develop that sense and commitment is by equitably sharing with labor the fruits of the redoubled efforts we are asking them to make.

Remember that labor is not only the producer but the first market of a resurgent Philippine industry.

And now, for a subject equally close to your hearts. Getting government out of business.

Last Thursday, I stressed again our decision to liquefy immediately all government business assets, to cash in on the investments government should have left to the private sector.

I stressed again the importance of speed, transparency, fairness and absolute equality of treatment to all bidders.

To prevent any delay on the part of government appointed directors, I directed that they should prepare undated resignations from their positions so they cannot thwart the transfer of control over these assets, nor interfere in the management after their sale. To assure the integrity of the process, I have entrusted the disposition of these assets, performing or non-performing, to the Asset Privatization Trust, which has earned the respect of all who have dealt with it.

It's been two years since we took over these assets. Complete privatization should have been accomplished by now.

36 NDC companies, such as Semirara, Philphos, National Steel and PASAR, were earmarked for privatization over a year ago. I want this speeded up.

I order the Philippine Airlines management to prepare a net asset valuation of the company by certified accountants with the participation of the Commission on Audit. The same order goes out to the managements of Manila Hotel, the Philippine Plaza and the Hyatt. I give them 60 days to submit these audits to my Office.

Regarding the Broadcast City properties, Channel 9, which had a debt of over P200 Million to PNB, was transferred to the APT. The APT should prepare to bit it out soon. Channel 2 and Channel 13 shall likewise be transferred to the APT, for similar disposition. The incumbent managers of all three stations will remain in their positions until the stations have been sold. We would prefer that these stations be sold to non-political, purely business concerns.

I want us to greet the New Year with complete privatization well underway.

I want 1987 to be the last of the years of excuses and delays, and 1988 to be the year of initiative, action and progress.

My staff and I are going over your list of concerns.

Let me address some of them.

On the matter of credit, the Government of Japan has agreed to increase the amount under the 14th Yen Credit Package and to accelerate its disbursement. This is the type of meaningful and timely support that we welcome. On our part, we are prepared to put all our systems in place so that the projects under this $570 Million loan package can be implemented without delay.

On the matter specifically of agricultural credit, the Department of Agriculture contributed P100 Million each to the Philippine Crop Insurance Corporation, Quedan Guarantee Fund, and the Guarantee Fund for Small and Medium Enterprises.

Yesterday we commended the five banks that have been most supportive of the effort to extend credit to what is the backbone of our economy, small and medium business. The sector that complains least, works hardest, and kept this country afloat when the bottom fell out in 1983. Small and Medium business and the Filipino-Chinese entrepreneurs talk less and work harder, and as a result make more money.

Based on my discussions with them, I think what they want is just to be left alone, not to be harassed and shaken down by elected and appointed public officials, so they can concentrate on their businesses. I hear and I will do something about it.

I have gone over your list of concerns and do not find explicitly stated the regulations, procedures and hassles – of the BIR, the PCGG, Customs, elected officials – that plague you. I should like to meet with you again, not to give a speech, but quietly to discuss your problems.

I truly believe that it is you who will make a difference, because only you have had the faith in this country to invest your honest capital in its recovery.

More on agricultural credit, there are 390 applications for rural banks with the Central Bank, yet, to date, only 19 have been approved. I expect speedier action here.

To take up the slack, the United Coconut Planters Bank has set aside P100 Million for loans to small farmers without security and P200 Million for rice quedan financing.

There is already a market information center: the Bureau of Agricultural Statistics and the Agri-Business Service group in the Department of Agriculture.

The National Food Authority is reminded to confine itself to rice and corn price stabilization. If there is indeed a wheat cartel, the appropriate response is anti-trust legislation, not a sure monopoly with all its evils.

We have converted the Bureau of Agricultural Extension into the Agricultural Training Institute, which works closely with local colleges to train both extension workers and farmers. And, since farmers prefer to learn from their peers, we have the Farmers' Cross-Fertilization Program which facilitates the exchange of technology within the farming sector.

Revisions of the Tariff Code regarding items affected by the import liberalization program were submitted to Congress as Administration Bill No. 1. The bill has been approved on 3rd reading by the House. We expect it to pass the Senate shortly.

I have taken note of the other issues you have raised. My staff are studying some of your proposals. You should know however that practicability is a major consideration. Your solution may be the best, but can we implement, given what we have? Sometimes the cure is worse than the disease.

Given what we have to work with, it is sometimes better to leave some things alone – until we are better prepared to tackle them.

These and other measures proposed are only a fraction of the solution that will work. The key element is the willing cooperation of all sectors in the task of recovery.

We can enforce the laws but we cannot dictate the kind of wholehearted cooperation and vigorous commitment that are behind the tremendous productivity and progress of the developed economies of Asia. For you cannot dictate patriotism, and in the end it is really patriotism that we are asking for when we call for total commitment and cooperation. For at this time, when we are just starting, these are acts of faith.

Thank you and good day.

Message of President Corazon Aquino on Public Works, November 16, 1987

Public
November 16, 1987

Works

A CRITICAL ROLE FOR THE DPWH

The Department of Public Works is the most important agency in the public sector and plays one of the most important and critical roles in our economic recovery efforts. A great part of our hope rests on its performance.

The 52nd anniversary celebration of the Department of Public Works and Highways comes at a most auspicious time. In the past month, I have repeatedly stressed one of the cornerstones of our economic policy: the withdrawal of government from areas that properly belong to the private economy. As I said last Saturday, I want to confine government to government, and keep business in business.

In saying this, we recognize that we have two responsibilities: to get out of the private sector and to support the private sector in its role as the engine of economic growth.

In opting for the minimal state, we still have many responsibilities and tremendous tasks before us. For we still have to provide the security and the infrastructure for the private economy to succeed.

This makes the Department of Public Works the most important agency in the public sector. When we think of pump priming the economy or helping relieve unemployment, we turn to public works construction. We think of increasing farm productivity, we think of farm-to-market roads.

The Department is therefore in the forefront of our economic recovery efforts. All eyes are on it, a great part of our hope rests on its performance.

In the first year of our Administration, we stressed fiscal controls in this Department – the weeding out of corrupt practices. Now, we must move forward to positive action.

The Department plays one of the most important and critical roles in our recovery efforts. Much is expected of its officials and employees: in the way of integrity, and in the way of performance. I know you will not disappoint our people.

I congratulate you all on your Department's 52nd anniversary. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 31st ASEAN-CCI Council Meeting, November 26, 1987

31st
Meeting
Manila
November 26, 1987

Asean-CCI

Council

NEW DIRECTIONS FOR ASEAN

This meeting is an opportune time to review how far ASEAN cooperation has progressed given the advantage of being able to harness political will at the highest level behind summit decisions.

Cooperation on both management and labor has been insured thru a series of policy initiatives to bring about a climate of lasting industrial peace.

The convening of this series of ASEAN-CCI meetings a few weeks before the third Asean Summit in Manila is not only very timely in terms of preparation, but also demonstrates the zeal and readiness of the private sector to move. It is also very appropriate because, as President Suharto expressed to Secretary Concepcion last month when I asked him to convey some messages for me, the main thrust of the summit is on how to promote private sector participation in Asean Economic cooperation. He said that this should be the case, because the private sector should be the primary engine for implementing Asean cooperation programs. From our experience with the first few Asean industrial projects, which were undertaken by the Asean governments, the Asean leaders would now like the private sector to take full initiative in Asean business projects.

In the first ten years of Asean's existence, there were two summits held, the first in Bali in 1976 and the second in Kuala Lumpur in 1977. In its second ten years of existence, the forthcoming summit in Manila will be the first and only one. This summit will therefore be the first opportunity in ten years for the Asean Heads of State to review how far Asean cooperation has progressed, to address outstanding issues, and to adopt new directions and objectives for Asean in a new and fast-changing international environment.

If we were in a corporate setting, the summit would be comparable to a long-range, strategic planning search for the year 2000. However, the basic difference between the two, and the most significant advantage of the summit is being able to harness political will at the highest level behind summit decisions.

The Manila summit agenda will cover political, cultural and social aspects of regional cooperation, but it will focus on economic cooperation. This was the result of a decision of the Asean Foreign Ministers in view of a widespread perception that Asean economic cooperation is lagging behind other aspects of cooperation which, if resolved, would spur the overall upsurge of Asean cooperation in all areas.

Judging from your program of meetings over the past few days, several members of our Cabinet have adequately briefed you on the various new economic initiatives which we expect to formally adopt at the summit a few weeks from now. As you have probably noted, a significant number of these new economic initiatives were originally based on recommendations from the private sector, notably the report of the group of fourteen on Asean economic cooperation and integration. When finally adopted, these few initiatives to enhance regional economic cooperation will be an excellent demonstration of government-private sector collaboration on Asean endeavors.

Just as an example, the government has taken a series of policy initiatives with the cooperation of both management and labor in order to bring about a climate of lasting industrial peace. As a result, while we were averaging 40 strikes per month from January to October this year, in November we recorded only 17 strikes, the lowest over that period.

From all these new initiatives, you can discern the emphasis on private sector initiative to be aided by supportive and transparent government policies, liberalized and streamlined procedures.

Recent developments in the industrialized market economies have led to uncertainties in the international economic environment especially for developing countries significantly dependent upon foreign trade.

At an international conference in Singapore two weeks ago, Prime Minister Lee alerted the Asean countries to the probable unfavorable consequences of these trends. However, he said that with the appropriate international trade policies and strategies, Asean countries can maintain their growth rates in the 1970's and attain half of the present per capita GNP of Japan.

Through the coming Asean Summit, the Asean Heads of State hope to create a substantially improved environment for a new upsurge in Intra-Asean trade and investments. This is therefore a challenge to the private sector to take full advantage of these new dimensions of regional cooperation.

Many Asean leaders have correctly pointed out that regional cooperation cannot be a catchall solution to all our respective national problems. However, an even greater number of leaders have advocated that Asean should go beyond their areas of difference and minimize their areas of cooperation in order to provide the best conditions possible under the prevailing political, economic and social circumstances for the Asean private sector throughout the region, and for the Asean governments to collectively get the best possible deals in negotiations with our major trading partners.

It may be timely to point out that as both the Asean Heads of State and the private sector meet in the closing months of this year, they should prepare to enter the Year of the Dragon with a firm resolution to join the ranks of the four newly industrialized countries of Asia.

National Malacañang

NO RENEWAL

UNITY

GENUINE

It is pleasing to note that the theme for this year's convention is "Unity and Renewal." There is an urgent need for unity in our nation and we cannot hope to have a lasting unity without genuine renewal. No genuine social and political renewal can ever take place without renewal of the person and this shaping and re-shaping of the person should first take place within the family.

Before events swept me into this office I now occupy, I was a housewife, a woman who had made the care of her husband and children her main occupation. It was a task I gladly took on, for it had not seemed then a duty. It was work that instead gave me great joy and fulfillment, even if, because of the demands on Ninoy's time, the duties of parenting fell mainly on my shoulders. But those days are behind me now, and as I have said time and again, there can be no turning back.

But even as I perform the duties of president and commander-in-chief, at the end of the day, I revert to Cory Aquino, mother, and grandmother. And it is within this loving circle of my family that I find renewal and strength. Which is why I feel such a close kinship with the couples, the solo parents, and your children here today.

I am especially pleased to take note of the theme you have chosen for this year's convention, which is "Unity and Renewal."

The events of the recent past have shown there is an urgent need for unity in our nation. Twenty-one months after the events at EDSA, we find our nation wracked by dissent and division. Threats not only to our government, but to our democratic ideals.

The Filipino people have proven impervious so far to these divisive elements, yet there persists a nagging sense of national unease. We cannot hope to have a lasting unity without genuine renewal. During the campaign for the presidency, I made a commitment to restore the tenets of public service and public accountability in government. I had hoped to serve notice on the grafters and corrupt officials within our ranks that their days were numbered, because I would not tolerate their putrid presence. But government by example and dictum has proven a puny weapon against their entrenched ways. Which is why we have strived to clean up the ranks of the public service and bureaucracy even more vigorously, with the appointment of men and women of proven integrity and dedication.

But we seek renewal not just in government, for we in the public service do not exist in a vacuum. We operate within a society, and the men and women who serve in government take their signals from the citizens they serve. They would, I suppose, be less brazen or cavalier about corruption, if they knew society would not tolerate it.

Our search for renewal, then, should not stop at merely cleansing the ranks of civil servants. The entire fabric of Philippine society needs not just laundering and repair, but perhaps re-weaving as well, changing ways we relate to one another, our attitudes towards government and civic responsibility, our sense of justice, our spirit of nationhood.

But to re-weave the tangled threads of our social fabric, we must work on the individual filaments. For no genuine social and political renewal can ever take place without renewal of the person. And where else does the shaping and re-shaping of the person take place than within the family?

This is where organizations like the Christian Family Movement could prove most helpful in our task of nation-building. You have made it your mission, as your statement of purpose says, to “promote the human and Christian values of the family, so that it may become in the community a force that forms persons, transmits the faith and through its members, is committed to the total development of family and community.”

I commend you for your programs reaching out not just to every member of the family, but to all kinds of families. I am especially pleased at your Solo Parents program. Being a solo parent myself, I know full well how solace can be provided only by those who have shared the bittersweet experience of loving and then losing. And how strength can be derived from those who have survived the loss and have gone on living full lives, not just for the “sake of the children,” but more important for themselves.

I am also told you have begun a program for wives and husbands of overseas workers. These men and women toiling in foreign lands truly deserve the nation’s gratitude. The amounts they pour into our economy, by way of precious dollars earned by their sweat and paid for by their separation from those they love, have provided our country a buffer against total economic disaster. And I am truly happy to see how the CFM has taken as one of its programs, the task of looking after the spouses and families left behind. That is the least that society and the government owes them.

But let me add that what truly heartens me about the Christian Family Movement is its firm commitment to providing a social dimension to all your activities. For as I have said earlier, of what good to a nation are strong and happy families if they, like the children in our analogy, only end up fighting one another? Beyond your marriage and family enrichment programs, you have placed CFM squarely in the center of the movement for change and social restructuring, which will in the final reckoning, be your source of strength and continuity.

For my part, I have strived, from the very start of my administration, to make the family, and family-centered values, an integral part of government policy and programs.

Earlier this year, I signed the Family Code, which seeks to attune our laws governing relationships between and among spouses, parents, and children to present conditions and changing mores of Filipino society.

The majority of CFM couples and families belong to the more comfortable segment of society. In this sense you have much to lose, but also much to share.

I ask you to consider sharing not just of your time and treasure, which you already do through your CFM involvement, but, as with the Biblical widow, to share of your substance. In our context, I ask you to commit yourselves to building a truly just, equitable and human society.

And lest you readily assent to these beautiful words, let me remind you what they could entail:

* Many of you are employers. Justice, and the papal exhortations, ask you to pay your workers not just a legal wage, not just a living wage, but a family living wage. Which means, paying a worker enough to provide for his family’s basic survival needs, plus education, leisure, medical care, and savings.

* Some of you may be landowners. We have recently promulgated (or are about to promulgate) an agrarian reform law that seeks to redistribute ownership of land and its fruits among a greater number. I ask not only that you throw your full support behind this program which I am convinced could end the age-old cycle of poverty and dependence in the Philippine rural heart-land. I also ask that those of you who receive remuneration for the lands re-distributed to your tenants, re-distribute this wealth, in turn, among people you will employ, re-channeling the wealth you have reaped from the land into economic and business activity that will further fuel our growth.

These are but two examples of what are demanded of you as citizens who profess to believe in the Christian ideals of justice and peace, and commit themselves to seeing them translated into everyday reality. I hope I have not already frightened some of you away.

Thank you for inviting me to share these thoughts and challenges with you. Congratulations and my best wishes for the success of your National Convention. May we as a nation, find unity and renewal soon.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Council of the Laity Magnificat Awarding Ceremony

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Council of the Laity Magnificat Awarding Ceremony

[Delivered on December 4, 1987]

PEACE FROM THE HEART

The President presents the Magnificat Award to Canon Rene Laurentin of Paris, an outstanding Marian scholar and theologian who has dedicated his entire priestly life to Marian studies and whose scholarship and wisdom has enlightened and enriched the church.

I am pleased to welcome the heads, (Cardinal Sin, Ambassador Dee), organizers and staff, of the first International Theological and Pastoral Conference on the Two Hearts, of Jesus and Mary.

In a special way, May I welcome one hundred foreign visitors and guests, especially the speakers and resource persons. It is significant that many of you, who have come for the first time to this country, have come in connection with a major religious event which centers on the themes of UNITY, SELF-DEDICATION, and PEACE: themes particularly meaningful for our nation today.

We are informed that the Holy Father has sent a special Apostolic Letter to this Conference. This is a recognition of its importance as an event for the worldwide Church. The Holy Father underlines the inner significance of the conference in relation to peace in the world. With the Holy Father we believe that no authentic peace will come except "from within", ie., from the heart. There has to be a conversion to the values of truth, justice, freedom and love. The hearts of men and women, in private and in public life, must learn to make these values their own. Pope John 23rd spoke of these four as the great pillars of society; he spoke of a society grounded	in	truth

guided	by	justice
realized	in	freedom
perfected	by	love
... and thus flowering in peace

True, human hearts find it so hard to be unwaveringly committed to these great ideals of human community. And yet without them, an authentic and enduring peace is impossible. We, as people of faith, believe that it is by God's grace alone, by God's power alone, that these values can become truly part of the life of persons, part of the life of communities.

In this I see the relevance of your conference not for the Church alone, but for the larger community. I have myself so often said, "We must work with all our might, we must pray with all our hearts, but always we must leave "space" for God to work in." If I understand it rightly, your conference was concerned precisely to widen," I join myself then, to your prayers and your resolve in this. May your conference bear ample fruitfulness in our country in the months and years to come.

It is with a special joy that I have gladly consented to present the MAGNIFICAT AWARD to Canon Rene Laurentin of Paris. The Council of the Laity has, I believe, done well to confer this award on one who is regarded by many as the outstanding Marian scholar and theologian in the entire Catholic Church today, one who has dedicated his entire priestly life to Marian studies, and whose scholarship and wisdom has enlightened and enriched the entire church. We are honored by Canon Laurentin's presence, as also by the presence of Fr. Michael O'Carroll of Dublin, Msgr.

Luciano Guerra of Fatima, and all the other speakers and visiting resource persons. We trust our visitors are having a pleasant visit with us, and we hope they will want to return.

We may be going through difficult times, but our people are going through them, I believe, with much faith and courage and trust.

Thank you for your visit. I ask you to pray for our people, and for us who try to serve them. May you have a blessed Advent season and a truly happy Christmas.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Diokno Foundation, December 7, 1987

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Diokno Foundation

[Released on December 7, 1987]

THE MOST BRILLIANT FILIPINO

There is a need to breed more Dioknos, more brilliant Filipinos, so that we can match with competence and cap with real achievements, the passion of our nationalist aspirations.

Foundations like this are meant to keep the memory of a particular individual alive.

Pepe Diokno does not need this foundation. Those who were privileged to have known him directly will never forget him. I mean, both those he helped and those he fought. For in everything he did, he showed the courage, tenacity and brilliance of a champion. As with his co-prisoner in the first years of Martial Law, time and mounting difficulties had no effect but to reconfirm their total commitment to their causes. Every year that passed, every defeat that was suffered was not a reason to relent or regret, but an added reason to see through to the end the investment of courage and endeavor they had already made. As Antoine de Saint-Exupery said, One's love for the flower grows with the attention and care you give it. So it was with their causes.

At Pepe Diokno's funeral, I said:

Diokno, in the days of the Old Republic, prefigured the kind of politics that would be possible in this country only after the painful experience of dictatorship. Diokno represented the possibility that you can mix power and virtue, intelligence and popularity, professed devotion to the highest ideals with the willingness to pay the highest price for one's commitment.

He won several elections without compromising his integrity or diluting his ideals – long before People Power made it possible for us to do the same with equal chance of success. Pepe Diokno showed, before EDSA, that you can be true to yourself, true to your people, and still triumph.

But Pepe has a lesson also for the EDSA generation in the post-EDSA period.

The flash of courage and the sudden surrender to Faith that enabled the Filipino to free himself from tyranny, which were preeminent Diokno qualities, must be supplemented by perseverance and competence if we are to defend and build on that miraculous gain. These qualities, especially supreme intellectual competence, were Diokno's as well, the man Ninoy called the smartest man in the Senate and then the most brilliant Filipino.

I said that Pepe Diokno needs no foundation to be remembered. But to impart his qualities to the rest of his race so that his ideals will live on and prove victorious, a foundation such as this is needed. For we must breed more Dioknos, more brilliant Filipinos, so that we can match with competence, and cap with real achievements, the passion of our nationalist aspirations.

It is not enough to cry for true independence, we must be able to really stand on our own. We must show that we can give the least of Filipinos the economic security and physical well-being that others have offered them – but with a portion of shame.

True nationalism is not the mere rejection of everything that is alien but the confident affirmation of virtues and achievements that are undoubtedly ours.

The Diokno Foundation points the way by its commitment to help in the development of our youth, in the creation of a whole generation of Filipinos who will approximate the fortitude, the courage, and, above all, the brilliance of the great man we honor today.

Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 3rd ASEAN Meeting of Heads of Government

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the 3rd ASEAN Meeting of Heads of Government

[Delivered in Manila on December 14, 1987]

NEW INITIATIVES FOR ASEAN COOPERATION

The new initiatives on regional cooperation of the 3rd ASEAN Summit signal a renewed vigor in avowed commitment to ASEAN objectives.

I have the honor to speak on behalf of the Philippines in this Third Meeting of ASEAN Heads of Government.

The key to ASEAN's strength, to its increased recognition as a respected force in international affairs, is the economic progress of each and every one of its members. It was hoped, by the founders of ASEAN, that the regional cooperation of its members, the gradual integration of their economies, would enable them to achieve the full measure of progress that none of them could achieve alone.

In my speech to the 19th ASEAN Ministerial Meeting more than a year ago, I expressed the view that "after 19 years of existence, ASEAN should already be evaluating the impact of regional economic cooperation instead of endlessly discussing how to get it off the ground."

This created quite a stir in ASEAN circles with, I should like to think, silent admission.

Today, at this third ASEAN Summit, I am pleased to hear that our Ministers and officials, in consultation with our private sectors, have completed new initiatives on ASEAN cooperation. Their proposals signal a renewed vigor in our avowed commitment to ASEAN aims. There is a greater willingness to cooperate, to share opportunities, even in areas that continue to promise exclusive advantages to those who choose to go it alone.

Our Ministers have recommended expanding the scope of preferential treatment to intra-ASEAN trade, and deepening the margins of preference for the products to which we extend preferential treatment. The agreement to freeze non-tariff barriers and negotiate their elimination or reduction should help in further expanding the ASEAN market for ASEAN products. The proposal to encourage the use of equal commitment to the security of the region, the hemisphere, and the world.

Your presence here underscores our collective determination to measure the progress of ASEAN only by the individual success of each and every one of its members, and to found its security on the strength and stability of each and the solidarity of all.

May I express once more our deep appreciation for your presence and our great pleasure in welcoming you all to the Philippines.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the ASEAN Delegates, December 14, 1987

Welcoming Remarks
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the ASEAN Delegates

[Released on December 14, 1987]

THE PHILIPPINE FACTOR

The Philippines feels a strong responsibility for maintaining peace and stability in the region and beyond. Our presence is said to have contributed to the securing of the air space and all lanes that are vital to the continued economic stability and growth of our neighbors in Southeast Asia, East Asia and the Pacific.

On behalf of the Filipino people, may I extend our warmest welcome to Your Majesty and Your Excellencies, and to the distinguished delegates and other honored guests to the Third ASEAN Meeting of Heads of Government.

May I also express our appreciation of your steadfast decision to proceed with our Summit as scheduled despite efforts to derail it. We have tried to match your unwavering resolve with our best efforts to ensure the peace and safety of these proceedings. We are glad to announce that those efforts paid off before your arrival.

We appreciate your determination to proceed, because the Third ASEAN Summit finds our country once more going through a political and economic transition. We are attempting to rebuild an enduring structure of responsible government, such as we had in an earlier period not so long ago. And such as you, our neighbors, have since attained.

Equally, we are trying to recover the measure of economic strength and promise that was ours in that same period, when some of you were going through your own economic and political trials.

I am reminded that the first time I addressed the issue of ASEAN, at the ASEAN Ministers Meeting in June of '86, I expressed some skepticism about its continued utility. It was not until I made my first ASEAN state visits, that I realized that ASEAN is first about friendship and responsible statesmanship, about the unhesitating support that friends extend to each other and the wisdom to see that, in this day and age, devotion to national security and peace requires an equal commitment to the security of the region, the hemisphere, and the world.

Your presence here underscores our collective determination to measure the progress of ASEAN only by the individual success of each and every one of its members, and to found its security on the strength and stability of each and the solidarity of all.

May I express once more our deep appreciation for your presence and our great pleasure in welcoming you all to the Philippines.

The key to ASEAN's strength, to its increased recognition as a respected force in international affairs, is the economic progress of each and every one of its members. It was hoped, by the founders of ASEAN, that the regional cooperation of its members, the gradual integration of their economies, would enable them to achieve the full measure of progress that none of them could achieve alone.

In my speech to the 19th ASEAN Ministerial Meeting more than a year ago, I expressed the view that "after 19 years of existence, ASEAN should already be evaluating the impact of regional economic cooperation instead of endlessly discussing how to get it off the ground."

This created quite a stir in ASEAN circles with, I should like to think, silent admission.

Today, at this third ASEAN Summit, I am pleased to hear that our Ministers and officials, in consultation with our private sectors, have completed new initiatives on ASEAN cooperation. Their proposals signal a renewed vigor in our avowed commitment to ASEAN aims. There is a greater willingness to cooperate, to share opportunities, even in areas that continue to promise exclusive advantages to those who choose to go it alone.

Our Ministers have recommended expanding the scope of preferential treatment to intra-ASEAN trade, and deepening the margins of preference for the products to which we extend preferential treatment. The agreement to freeze non-tariff barriers and negotiate their elimination or reduction should help in further expanding the ASEAN market for ASEAN products. The proposal to encourage the use of ASEAN currencies for intra-ASEAN trade and investments should increase the volume of business among us. And we are turning to each other more often for mutual support against the efforts of developed countries to undercut our exports, including our agricultural exports.

But what pleases me most is that we are willing now to quantify our measures, to set targets against which we can, in future, judge the sincerity and vigor of our commitment to ASEAN goals.

This willingness to set targets, so that we can measure progress or delay, is one of the most important developments in ASEAN. It shows a commitment to really go forward, to build tangibly towards our aims.

Although the main Philippine preoccupation is economics, the primary Philippine position is nevertheless defined by its geography, and its geo-political implications for the Region.

We are earnestly striving for the day when the Philippine position will be defined primarily by its economic progress, and we look to the economic character of this Summit to help bring this about. But for the present, our geographical position provides the important dimension to our role.

Of all the ASEAN states, the Philippines is the most distant from the Indochinese peninsula. By virtue alone of its geography, it can afford to be indifferent to foreign threats. Except in the event of a global war between the superpowers, we are virtually immune from invasion. Certainly, the country with the fourth largest armed force in the world, Vietnam, poses no threat to us. So, if geography alone were to dictate a foreign policy for the Philippines, it would be one of the coldest indifference to developments in the Region.

But the Philippines, like other ASEAN states, has felt a strong responsibility for maintaining peace and stability in the Region, and beyond. In this respect, it has been said to play a major role in keeping an equilibrium among the great powers in Southeast Asia – perhaps, in the entire Asia-Pacific region.

The Philippine factor is said to have contributed to the securing of the air space and sea lanes that are vital to the continued economic stability and growth of our neighbors in Southeast Asia, and the Pacific.

This is part of the reality that we are going to address in our security discussions this afternoon. In sum, the situation that presents itself is as follows:

Once more the Region is experiencing the convergence of an impressive, and disturbing array of military power. Fortunately, that power has been held in check by the approximate parity of the forces deployed and, we hope, by the lessons of recent history about the folly of intervention and confrontation.

But if history teaches anything, it is that no one learns from history except in sad retrospect amidst the ruins of war.

Not surprisingly, ASEAN has moved to push the protagonists outside the Region, to make it difficult for them to settle their differences on our doorsteps and in our houses. This has led to the vision of a Zone of Peace, Freedom and Neutrality and the call for a Nuclear Weapons Free Zone in Southeast Asia.

The Philippines anticipates that the coming discussions on the issue of the over-all Asian peace and security situation, in which it plays a most significant role, will enlighten its future decisions on the matter.

Setting aside the larger geo-political picture, the Philippines' chief concern is the recovery of its economy. And we see increased intra-ASEAN trade and economic relations as a significant step in that direction.

Our faith in this parallel route to recovery, running alongside our efforts to improve the strictly domestic economy, is based on the solid achievements of our Association in the more volatile field of diplomacy. Our willingness to stand together and face, as one, imminent dangers to some of our partners, gives us reason to hope that an equal measure of cooperation can be achieved in the safer and peaceful pursuits of trade and industry among us.

We agree that the collective ability of ASEAN to ensure the Region's peace and stability rests first and last on the individual strength of its members, on the vigor of their economies and the material well-being of their populations. Let us be candid: the aims of ASEAN are economic and its means are trade and investments, but the final fruit that we all seek is a just and lasting peace within our homes, within our countries and throughout the Region.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Dinner	Toast	to	Takeshita
December 15, 1987

A heritage of courage and daring, this is what Japan and the Philippines share in common. Japan's remarkable progress has given her people not only prosperity but it has also devolved upon her serious responsibilities to her people and to those of other nations as well.

Your visit betokens the special relationship that we both seek between our two countries. That relationship is characterized by a profound appreciation on our part for Japan's noble aims in the region, as well as her generous objectives in the Philippines. It is equally marked by Japan's deep and sympathetic understanding of our country and her needs, and by Japan's support, particularly under the leadership of Your Excellency, of our burning ambition to improve the lives of our people.

Prime Minister Takeshita, Japan has generously assisted the Philippines in the past. Yet, let me say that Japan will never feel as rewarded and justified as she will be by the assistance that she will extend to us in the future. For this government aims to make the best use of her friends generosity.

In electing you, Japan has chosen the leader for her future role as a major stabilizing influence on the world and as a force for progress, particularly in countries like the Philippines.

Distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, please join me in a toast:

to Prime Minister Noboru Takeshita, friend of Philippine freedom and progress, to the people and Government of Japan, Filipin to/Nihon tono/Aidano/Suenagaki/Yuujo ni/ Kanpai! (and to the long and enduring friendship of our two countries).

FRIENDSHIP AND A SENSE OF COMMUNITY

Friendship and a strong desire for community brought the ASEAN members together. These are the overriding aims of ASEAN. These friendship and community find expression in a proud commitment to strive harder for the attainment of ASEAN goals.

I was touched by Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew's remark yesterday that he had overruled the decision of his security advisers not to attend the Summit and the information regarding President Soeharto's resolve to show support to the Philippines. In the spirit of ASEAN, the other leaders had also decided to brave the risks and show solidarity with the Philippines. In the spirit of Prime Minister Lee's comments last night about the religious character of our Revolution, I would rejoin by saying: No greater love, indeed, has a man than to lay down his life for a friend. I thank the leaders of ASEAN for this moving demonstration of solidarity.

As I had occasion to remark on my return from my ASEAN visits last year, the aims of ASEAN were already attained at her foundation. For it was friendship that brought us together in the first place; a strong desire for community among nations that might as well have progressed separately. And yet it is friendship and community that are the overriding aims of ASEAN. No necessity compelled our hands to join in the difficult pursuit of the vision that inspires all our labors: the vision of the ASEAN states living in peace, amity and concord, and working together for their common progress and prosperity.

This friendship and sense of community have borne fruit in a mutual regard for each other's safety and stability on many occasions in the past. Our common stand on the Kampuchean crisis being one of the most notable.

Today that friendship and community find expression in a proud commitment to strive harder for the attainment of ASEAN goals, and in concrete measures of greater economic cooperation.

We have signed today the Manila Declaration of 1987. The Declaration reaffirms the principles of our Association and sets forth the decisions arrived at in this Summit. It charts the direction we are determined to take to bring a more progressive, prosperous, and cohesive ASEAN to the 21st century.

The Declaration affirms our solidarity in the face of the dangers to the stability and peace of our region, particularly our persistent search for an enduring solution to the Kampuchean problem.

Our economic ministers have entered into agreements intended to liberalize trade among our countries through the improvement of the preferential treatment that we extend to one another's products, and through other measures to lower the barriers to intra-ASEAN trade.

We have revised our agreement on joint ventures in order to accelerate such investments and encourage them to come from in, rather than from outside the region. Furthermore, to encourage such investments, our countries have signed an agreement for the promotion and protection of intra-ASEAN investments.

In addition, we have directed our governments to adopt measures to strengthen our cooperation in transportation and communications, agriculture and forestry, banking and finance.

The general aim of these measures is our common progress and the great improvement in the lives of all our peoples. For in their hands and in their abiding faith in the meaningfulness of ASEAN lies our countries' continuing commitment to the ASEAN dream. To that end, the Manila Declaration expresses our common determination to involve our peoples in a broader range of ASEAN cooperative endeavors in order to strengthen and enrich the fabric of the Association. If anything has stood out in this meeting of ASEAN heads of government it is precisely this strong emphasis we have placed on the role of the private sector in the activities of ASEAN.

It is the direct linkage between the work we do in ASEAN and the difference it will make in the lives of our peoples that has made my experience of participating in and presiding over this Meeting so rewarding and enriching. I thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the RP-Japan Heads of Government Marketing

Opening Statement of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the RP-Japan Heads of Government Marketing

[Released on December 16, 1987]

GREATER ACCESS TO JAPANESE MARKETS

The bond of Philippine-Japan friendship and cooperation is stronger than it has ever been. The President notes that Japan's remarkable progress devolved on her the equal responsibility to use her tremendous economic resources to bring a greater measure of progress and stability to the developing world. At the same time, she admits that the Philippines' contribution would depend largely on its swift economic recovery.

I am very pleased that this dialogue between us has taken place so soon after my state visit to your beautiful country just a year ago.

As we have had occasion to say time and again, the significance of this visit by Your Excellency, Prime Minister Takeshita, has not escaped us and is deeply appreciated.

The meeting which Your Excellency had with me and with the other ASEAN heads of government yesterday was a successful one, despite its brevity, and gives us reason to be confident that our meeting today will prove equally fruitful for our two countries.

Your Excellency, my state visit to Japan started a process of broadening and deepening our bilateral relations. Considerable progress has been achieved, especially during the visit of the high-level economic and technical cooperation mission, and during the first Philippine-Japan subministerial meeting. These consultations produced mutual understanding on many issues, an understanding and an appreciation of our needs and your country's capabilities to assist us. To be sure, those capabilities are less than divine as you pointed out yesterday. But Japan's prosperity is more than normal, and it has been the work of man. Moreover a firm common determination to exhaust all possible means seems to have been achieved. This augurs well of subsequent subministerial meetings next year. I am glad that we are having these talks so that we can consider even more comprehensively certain bilateral issues, and strengthen further our relations.

Much has indeed been achieved, yet much more needs to be done. But this much can be already be said, that the bond of Philippine-Japan friendship and cooperation is stronger than it has ever been.

We observed yesterday that Japan's remarkable progress devolved on her the equal responsibility to use her tremendous economic resources to bring a greater measure of progress, and therefore stability, to the developing world. Japan's announcement of its major program for recycling its surpluses to the developing world is her most recent acknowledgment of this responsibility.

The Philippines, despite its trials and its difficulties, has never faltered in its own contribution to the security, peace and stability of Southeast Asia and the Asia-Pacific region in general. These are areas that are as vital to Japan's own security and continued progress as they are to the countries that are located there.

Therefore, in the spirit of our mutual recognition of each other's critical interests in this area of the world, we call upon Japan to bend her great economic power to support the economic development of the region, particularly that of the Philippines.

Our country's capability to contribute even more meaningfully to the common security and stability depends on its swift economic recovery from the waste and mismanagement of the past government. I need not detail what happened to our economy, nor the enormity of the debt we inherited.

At the core of the Philippine plan of recovery, which is also the core of our economic agenda, is the need to increase exports to, and investments from, Japan. Japan must improve access to her markets and increase the flow of investment into our economy. We have every confidence that she will exert her utmost in these areas.

A great deal of improvement is needed in these areas. Our exports to Japan are far below the level of the early Eighties. At the same time, Japan's direct investments in the Philippines dropped from $61 Million in 1985 to $26 Million. This at a time when Japan's investments in the rest of the developing world showed a marked increase.

I have repeatedly stressed that our country aims to recover, as yours did, by increasing its economic activities through a dynamic private sector. Hence, the need to meet the capital requirements of the sector, and the need for much more access to Japanese markets.

To meet capital requirements, we are pleased to reiterate our appreciation for the initiative represented by the ASEAN-Japan Development Fund to promote private ventures.

Market access now appears more probable with Japan's announced intention to open her markets more widely to the rest of the world.

We invite cooperation to improve the international competitiveness of our export products, through such measures as the development of a comprehensive Philippine export promotion plan, and the implementation in the Philippines of the New Aid Plan put forward by Japan to promote Asian export industries.

There are many more areas for increased Philippine-Japan cooperation, which I urge the officials of our two countries to consult on immediately. These include the revitalization of our industrial base, tourism development, the development of export processing zones that could host Japanese manufacturers, and the Philippine Government's industry dispersal program.

These and other like measures will promote the long-term economic recovery of our country, but many of our requirements are urgent. We need to buy time, through measures for immediate relief, so these programs can bear fruit. Immediate external financing is imperative to give the necessary impetus to our economy and to lift in some measure the crushing burden of poverty on our people. Japan has the capability and the will, and the leadership, to help.

We need sustained and higher levels of assistance to support the implementation of the Medium-Term Philippine Development Plan. I should like at this point to reiterate our appreciation for the conclusion this year of the Calaca II Special Yen Loan and the Economic Recovery Loan from the Export-Import Bank of Japan. We are also grateful for the 14th Annual OECF Yen Credit Package on which both of us have exchanged notes just this morning. We are encouraged at the effort of your government to make it possible to disburse against the commodity loan component of this package before the end of this year.

Now that the size of the 14th Yen Credit approximates the level of OECF loans being provided to other ASEAN countries, we look forward to swifter negotiations and progressively greater amounts in subsequent packages. Time is of the essence, our needs press ever harder on our scarce resources. We cannot afford the delays encountered in past annual programs. Consequently, we hope to develop the 15th and 16th Yen Credit Packages as soon as possible, with a larger component of commodity loans.

Most urgently, measures are needed to alleviate the impact of the Yen's appreciation that negates the concessionality of Yen loans, and increases the burden they were meant to lighten.

On the related issue of currency risk, allow me to suggest that the solution does not require a godlike ability to anticipate and provide against it, but the human will to mobilize the resources Japan has to compensate for it.

Furthermore, to limit our debt, we need to have more recourse to better quality, non-debt assistance. Grants should be increased so that they will account for a larger component of our bilateral official development assistance flows.

A very special area of concern is agrarian reform. I wish to convey to Your Excellency the readiness of our officials to immediately discuss with their Japanese counterparts the details of a broad-based Japanese assistance for the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program, on which so much of the success of our recovery program, and our political stability, depends. This, we hope, can be supported by accelerating the 16th Yen Package.

The Japanese people are aware of my deep concern for Filipino workers in Japan, and I am glad that our respective officials have started to institutionalize consultations for their protection and welfare.

I hope that Japan can ease its immigration rules and liberalize its labor market, particularly where there may be a need for more workers. The dedication and industry of Filipino workers is widely-known; they have proved as valuable to their host, as to their native country. And they deserve respect and dignity.

We are also prepared, Your Excellency, to work for greater cooperation in the educational, social and cultural fields. We can learn a great deal from the educational system that produced that Japanese economic miracle. I expressed my desire for more extensive cultural exchanges between our countries at your alma mater and mine the Waseda University.

I shall conclude, Your Excellency, by reaffirming my country's commitment to increased bilateral cooperation with Japan and by expressing my profound appreciation for your initiatives in increasing Japan's assistance to the Philippines. We shall work together, with equal dedication, to preserve the great friendship that our meeting celebrates today.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 17th PNRC Biennial National Convention

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 17th PNRC Biennial National Convention

[Released on December 17, 1987]

A RECORD OF CARING AND SHARING

The President pays tribute to the Philippine National Red Cross for its humanitarian endeavors and the impressive record of service of its professional workers and volunteers.

Your convention is a special occasion for me to pay tribute to the good work the Philippine National Red Cross is doing as a trusted private, voluntary and independent organization assisting the Government in humanitarian endeavors. I also accord that wholehearted tribute to all of you, the delegates — adult and young volunteer leaders — who are the backbone of the Red Cross in our country.

As one of the 165 nations that are signatories to the Geneva Conventions, the Philippines stands committed to the goals and objectives of the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement. I fully recognize the role of the Red Cross especially in our country today, not only the PNRC but the International Committee of the Red Cross and the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies. I am glad to know that the PNRC and ICRC are working in tandem right in the center of humanitarian needs brought about by the insurgency menace which our Government now is trying hard to put to an end. And that the PNRC and the League have joined hands, too, in a concerted effort to help our Government improve the health care delivery in the rural areas, among other things of equal value.

Although your aim, as true to the mandate of Red Cross the world over, is mainly to alleviate human suffering and to protect life and health, you are promoting to a great extent the spirit of peace in the process. For the Red Cross transcends all ideologies, race, creed, religion and politics in the performance of its duties. Therein lies the uniqueness of Red Cross. And since the Red Cross serves everyone and is open to all, who are willing to help humanity, it is considered a potent instrument of peace. In all its actions, the Red Cross fosters understanding, friendship and cooperation among the people of the world. Ultimately this will lead to harmony and peace.

In your convention, I understand you are aiming for a stronger Red Cross in terms of manpower and financial resources so essential in the delivery of your services. I know your biggest problem is funding. And so, I encourage you to try again to ask for bigger support for your service programs.

Our Government and the general public have high regard for your Organization, not only because of its impressive record of service but the devotion of your professional workers and volunteers as well.

It is heartwarming to know that you are striving to make the broad spectrum of your nationwide service programs more relevant to the present-day needs of our society. Like disaster preparedness and relief, the blood program, safety, youth leadership training, primary health care, home and community nursing care, which you have started to innovate and refurbish, little by little, as funds come in. All these are in cadence with the aspiration of this Government: to take the challenge of building a better and stable future for all of us Filipinos.

Let us therefore continue to work harder together towards that direction – in the spirit of solidarity and in the highest degree of moral sensibility to caring and sharing which defines man's humanity.

In closing, I am wishing you all in advance a "Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year!"

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the anniversary of DBP, January 2, 1988

DBP

January 2, 1988

A NEW CORPORATE CULTURE FOR DBP

President Aquino stresses the need for a high degree of professionalism in the rehabilitated DBP. Political behests nor selfish interests should not be allowed to influence the management decisions of the DBP core of officers. She also warns against special privileges and preferential access to government resources.

Last January 2, 1987, I gave you a gift of a new charter, formalizing my government's commitment to DBP's rehabilitation. This year, on your first anniversary as a rehabilitated bank, I have come in person to join the DBP family, particularly in your celebration for the significant progress you have made.

I am aware of the reforms you have initiated. A new corporate culture has been introduced. New systems and methods have been put in place. Training is emphasized. Prudence and discipline have been brought back to your credit evaluation process. Morale is high, and there is a new eagerness to excel. I want you to know of my government's unwavering commitment to DBP's 3-year rehabilitation program.

No program of rehabilitation can succeed unless a high degree of professionalism is observed. I am determined that no political behests should be allowed to shortcut your credit evaluation procedures. Nor should any selfish interests be allowed to influence the management decisions of your professional core of officers. I have specified under your new charter that ordinary members of your Board of Directors confine themselves solely to policy-making tasks. I expect them to abide by this and other provisions that foster complete professionalism within the Development Bank of the Philippines.

You must be thoroughly professional because so much more is expected of you. You have to be much better than you ever were because now you have to fully compete against so many good banks in the financial system. Moreover, you must be the best, because you are also expected to take the lead in developing lending. And you are to do so while at the same time ensuring your own financial viability. To some, this is an impossible challenge. To you, however, these are your marching orders. Take them as a very special mission you have to carry out for our own people and for the common good of our nation. I know you are equal to the challenge.

I am here to assure you that you are not to be left without the tools to compete effectively. Your special prerogatives and privileges have been removed from you. Even the special government deposits you still have, are being gradually withdrawn. Increasingly, you must rely on your ability to tap sources of funds in competition with other banks which do not have the development duty that is yours. My sense of fairness tells me that you have to be given at least the same tools and the same capabilities that other competing banks have. Let me make clear the operative principles for the new DBP: No special privileges and no preferential access to government resources; but at least equal footing and similar powers as the banks you have to compete against.

As a development bank, you cannot limit your vision to the here and now. You cannot confine yourself to the immediately profitable and to the short term cash cows. You have to nurture a broad vision of development. Your thinking must be longer term. Your concerns must be strategic. Your preoccupations must be more comprehensive. Urban renewal, regional and industrial development, quality education and health are areas that seem to be orphaned by the fixation of others on more pressing problems. They should find a natural home within DBP.

Congratulations on the first year of the new DBP!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 87th Anniversary of the Western Police District, January 9, 1988

87th Anniversary of the Western Police District
January 9, 1988

STILL MANILA'S FINEST

The President announces a package of incentives to the police like; 1) no equity deposit shall be required to qualify under the NHA plan for police housing; 2) a system of automatic promotion of patrolmen; 3) DOH to formalize specific arrangements for hospitals to fully treat wounded lawmen without requiring a deposit.

Last year, I had the honor to congratulate you on your 86th anniversary. I thank you for giving me that honor again.

Many things have changed since that occasion. I said then that our democracy is fighting two wars:

One against the communist insurgents (and military adventurers); the other against crime, lawlessness, and anarchy. The first is fought by the Armed Forces. The second by the police, not least by the men and women of Manila's Finest: the police of the Western District, under the extremely capable leadership of our fighting Police General Alfredo Lim. He is one reason I sleep well at night.

The first called on our warfighting capability, the second on our crimefighting capability.

Much has changed since then. In the past year, criminality, insurgency and military mutiny struck indiscriminately at anyone who stood in their way. A private citizen or a policeman had as much chance of being shot in the neck by a Communist assassin or mowed down by a rebel soldier, as shot at by a fleeing robber.

Much has also been accomplished,

We stopped talking and went back to fighting the Communist rebels. As expected, they fought back harder and brought the war to the cities. The truce, nonetheless, showed the true colors of the insurgency: as a movement dedicated not to peace and the general good, but to the enslavement by terror of our people. Our people now know the true face of the enemy.

The other enemy of democracy, the rightwing rebels, made an all-or-nothing attempt, a desperate stab at the heart of Philippine democracy. We blunted their attack and hunted them down successfully. The Armed Forces and the Police stood resolutely by democracy on that fateful day, and earned the deep respect and undying gratitude of the nation.

Last January, I pledged to work hard to improve the living conditions of the police. As you kept faith with democracy, so have I kept my pledge to you. A housing plan was prepared, approved and is being implemented by the National Housing Authority and other agencies of the government.

I want to improve on that pledge by announcing that no equity deposit shall be required to qualify under the NHA plan for police housing.

PC-INP Chief, General de Villa, has initiated a process for the automatic promotion of patrolmen to patrolmen first class after 10 years of service. He is directed to study the feasibility of extending this to progressively higher ranks and longer terms of service.

Likewise, I have told General de Villa to give first priority in promotions to the members of our police forces who distinguish themselves in exceptional deeds, such as the heroic actions that thwarted the August 28 Coup.

The character of a nation, and a government, it has been said, is shown by the decent, not to say noble, manner in which it honors its heroic dead, and cares for its wounded. To that end, I have directed the Acting Metro Manila Governor to set aside an area that will serve as a cemetery for the police dead.

The Department of Health is directed to formalize specific arrangements for government and private hospitals to fully treat wounded lawmen without requiring a deposit. All charges incurred for their full emergency care should be shouldered by the respective Police Districts. It is true that there are existing laws requiring emergency medical care for anyone in need, but the reality has been that only the most cursory treatment is given to our police who are brought in wounded. This shameful treatment of those who lay down their lives each day to protect our lives will end. Any hospital that fails to meet this obligation should be reported to my office.

At the convening of the first Congress, I said, Can we expect our men to fight if we will not give them the means to fight? I know that you continue to lack the necessary arms and equipment that will maximize your efficiency. Our enemies remain better armed than you, our protectors. I pledge here and now to redress the imbalance in firepower between crime and order. I expect a report from General de Villa on the logistical lack and requirements of our police forces. I don't want our men going out there with only a hope and a prayer. To the protection and compassion of Providence, let us not forget to add the stopping power of a. 38.

Let me end by congratulating you on another great year of notable service to our people and our democracy. In a week, local elections will be held. We are going to need every hand, and every brave heart, to make this a peaceful, honest and orderly election. I call on you, the men and women of the Western Police District, and on all police forces throughout the country, to do your part in assuring the success of the elections. Let us show the world again that we Filipinos know as much about working a democracy as winning it.

Congratulations again, and good day.

International Law Speech

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino

To the Fulbright Scholars Association and the Philippine Society of International Law

[Delivered at Malacañang, January 21, 1988]

A FORMIDABLE COMBINATION

President Aquino commends the officers and members of the two associations for their excellent work and contribution to the broadcasting and deepening of Philippine-American relations.

I am indeed deeply grateful to you all for this happy occasion.

For it is in a sense a double celebration, because of which I have the rare opportunity to address an association of scholars and a society of lawyers, a really formidable combination.

This is of course made possible by the accession of Justice Fernan to the Presidency of both distinguished entities.

I gather this is somewhat like a phenomenon in international law called a personal union, when two states have one person as their head.

Seriously, there is in that common choice and in this joint induction ceremonies an underlying significance: that scholarship and law go hand in hand and that this is brought about by the dedication of such men and women as you who are behind the excellent work of your association and society.

The Fulbright scholarship program is of course well-known and appreciated, and through the years it has contributed immensely to broadening and deepening Philippine-American relations.

The Philippine Society of International Law is equally renowned for its outstanding participation in international law activities, particularly its first-rate Philippine yearbook.

I can only commend your endeavors and wish you even more success and accomplishments in the years ahead.

Thank you.

President of the Philippines
At the PARC Meeting

[Released on January 22, 1988]

KEY TO LASTING PEACE

President Aquino waxes optimistic on the success of the agrarian reform program. She appeals to the landowners to view agrarian reform as an opportunity for the wider partnership of all our people towards progress and peace. She also reiterates her prior commitment to place Hacienda Luisita under the operation of the CARP.

Secretary Juico has reported on the accomplishments of the Department of Agrarian Reform and on the progress of the Program. I am pleased and very happy with what his Department has achieved six months after I signed the CARP. Clearly, the Executive is doing its part to make the dream of land, productivity, welfare and dignity for the tiller come true.

Much has been accomplished, when you consider the obstacles, but much remains to be done. And it will be done – by this Administration. Despite the doomsayers that Agrarian Reform will fail, that it will make things worse rather than better, that it is better deferred to another time – in the indefinite future.

We shall persevere and we shall succeed. For I remain firm in my conviction that Agrarian Reform is the key to lasting peace and certain progress in our country.

I am therefore appealing to all our countrymen to give the Program all their support and encouragement.

I am appealing to the landowners. Do not look at Agrarian Reform as a taking of your lands but as an opportunity for the wider partnership of all our people towards progress and peace.

I am told that the landowners are having some difficulty to register their lands before the deadline on February 8. This matter has been discussed extensively at the Presidential Agrarian Reform Council Meeting this morning and it was decided that to enable the landowners to meet the deadline, they will not be required at the present time to accomplish the entire form distributed by the DAR; the only information they will have to supply on or before February 8 are: 1) the area of the land and 2) the fair market value thereof. This will be deemed substantial compliance with the law and relieve the landowners of the consequence of having their lands acquired by the Government at their assessed, rather than their fair market value.

I am aware that people are saying, What about Hacienda Luisita. Have the Cojuangcos registered?

I will be the first to admit that my pronouncements on Agrarian Reform would sound hollow if I cannot get Luisita to come under the coverage of CARP. And so today I should like to reiterate that the Tarlac Development Corporation, the owner of Hacienda Luisita, expresses its readiness to place the Hacienda, which has a total area of 6,100 hectares and is under cultivation by about 7,000 farmworkers, under the operation of the CARP. Hacienda Luisita will, I repeat, comply with the requirements for registration of all agricultural lands pursuant to Executive Order No. 229.

The Department of Agrarian Reform has been given the facilities and the support for the great task that lies before us. We have increased its budget almost fourfold. We have increased its plantilla from 9,000 to 14,000. We have given the DAR its own quarters and increased its mobility.

For its part, the rest of the Cabinet will give DAR the fullest support and encouragement. We are a team. We will work as a team – for Agrarian Reform, for our people, and for our future.

Speech

To the Youth

[Delivered at Don Bosco, January 31, 1988]

YOUTH AS THE FUTURE

The President pays tribute to the youth, their idealism, and uncompromising attitudes on matters of right and commitment to the rebuilding of our nation.

The usual thing is to say that the youth are the future of the country.

That is true of course, because many of you will still be around when many of us will be gone.

But that saying makes it seem like the youth are important only tomorrow, when they are already adults. And not today while they are young.

Now that is not true.

It is not true because the youth constitute the bulk of the Filipino nation today.

It is not true because the youth, with their idealism and uncompromising attitudes on matters of right, made our new country what it is today.

It is not true because without the commitment of our youth to the rebuilding of our nation we shall have no tomorrow.

I am honored to be here for the centennial celebration of St. John Bosco's death: the friend and patron of youth. He was a man who felt that every young person was of infinite value and that no life should be wasted. The waste of a life through poverty, unemployment, and uselessness was, for him, a kind of sacrilege, a desecration of God. For he took literally what the Bible says, That each person is made in God's image.

I said that the youth are not only the future of our nation, but also that, without the commitment of our youth, we shall have no future. I believe this because only the youth can supply the energy, the time, the intelligence and the patriotism that are needed to make this country strong and progressive.

You are the future, indeed. You are our country, today and tomorrow.

As you will be what you make of yourselves, this country will be what you make of it.

I believe in you, as the saint we honor today believed in you. And I know that you will do us proud.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Garment Industry

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Garment Industry

[Delivered on February 3, 1988]

SHINING STAR OF THE INDUSTRY

The garments industry turned in a sterling performance in 1987. It has been tagged as the “shining star” of the industrial sector for achieving its target of P1 billion. President Aquino pledges the government’s wholehearted support to the garments industry. It will curb textile smuggling, train the necessary skilled workers for garment factories, provide the equipment and buildings for these trainings, and review garments and textile import/export policies. The government is also taking appropriate measures to make the industry more competitive by not raising taxes on garments.

I am very happy to be here today, speaking to a sector that turned in a sterling performance last year despite the troubles that the ambitious and misguided brought upon us. The garments industry delivered in 1987 and has been tagged as the “shining star” of the industrial sector for achieving its target of P1 Billion. The target next year is P1.3 Billion.

Government will do its best to help you meet that target. We are already implementing the Local Value Added scheme to reduce your dependence on imported fabrics, and to pave the way for the expansion of the Philippine textile industry. This is another goal to which we are deeply committed.

The Philippine textile industry, despite its serious efforts to improve quality and increase capacity, continues to reel from foreign textiles that continue to be dumped and smuggled into the country. From employing over 100,000 workers in 1979, the textile industry has declined to employing some 70,000 workers last year. Smuggling was a major factor in this decline. Smuggling has to stop. And it will.

I have instructed the Commissioner of Customs to increase the bounty for turning in textile smugglers to a level that is sure to kill the profitability of that illicit trade. I expect your cooperation in this campaign. The textile industry has just invested an additional P2 Billion in 65 projects to upgrade its mills. Government will give the textile industry the protection it deserves for the generous commitment it has made to national recovery. But there is more at stake here than investments. Over 70,000 workers depend on the textile industry for their livelihoods; counting their dependents, that could easily run to 300,000 men, women and children. So let me here serve warning on the textile smugglers: We are poised to strike, and we will make no exceptions.

The garment industry has its share of problems too: Lack of raw materials and shortage of accessories, shortage of skilled labor, unavailability of spare parts, quota restrictions, lack of suitable infrastructure, labor relations, and government regulations.

In response to your Association’s appeal for Government to address the shortage of skilled garment workers, I instructed the Labor Department to produce the needed 13,000 to 16,000 skilled workers every year. Government will provide facilities. We hope that the private sector will contribute its share. Right now, it seems that we shall have to import British trainers, since the local industry has said it cannot spare any of its own. That may be a good sign of heavy demand for your products. Perhaps, what industry can do is already plan for the absorption of the annual crop of graduates. The first batch should be graduating by March 30.

The Department of Trade and Industry has been directed to purchase the high-speed sewing machines, the knitting machines and whatever equipment is required to get the training going. Let me repeat that instruction with this emphasis: Do it fast, and do it straight. The Bureau of Customs is directed to facilitate the entry of these machineries, with due regard of course to the possibility of smuggling unauthorized items. You can never tell what people will do in the name of development. I likewise instruct the Department of Public Works to speed up the construction of the necessary buildings.

I also direct the CB, GTEB and Customs Interagency group to speed up the review of import/export procedures for garments.

The Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of Labor and Employment are directed to review the rules on subcontracting with a view to generating more employment without any loss in workers' protection. We have set employment generation as our highest priority this year.

These are just some of the measures we have taken to encourage the industry. You know what you have to contribute: quality and dependability. The textile and garments industries are among the most competitive and volatile businesses in the world. People expect the best and they will get it, if not from us then from the competition.

To that end, I have vetoed Congressional measures to raise the tariff on garments from 50 percent to 75 percent. The increase proposed is beyond the present maximum tariff rate of 50 percent ad valorem, and flies in the face of the cornerstone policy of this Government, which is to invite competition in order to bring out the best in the Filipino. I am not afraid of the competition, and neither are you.

We pin great hopes on the garments industry as one of the leaders of our economic recovery. I know we won't be disappointed.

The last political exercise was completed last month. Those who are entitled to it have each their share of democratic political power and office. The last excuse was played out for delaying a wholehearted commitment to national development. Now it is time to work – together – for the one and only country that is ours. Thank you and good day.

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Congratulating the Ten Outstanding Young Men Awardees of 1986

[Released on February 4, 1988]

REWARDING EXCELLENCE

The times and the pressing task at hand – national recovery – call for acts of patriotism from each and every Filipino. President Aquino congratulates the TOYM awardees for their achievements in their respective fields and for their contributions towards national recovery.

T-O-Y-M, 1986, I understand, scored many firsts. This is the first time TOYM has two women awardees in a single year, and it is the third year in a row when a woman is cited. I see the men have finally realized that the handwriting on the wall is a woman's.

It won't be long before you'll just have to call this award, T-O-Y-F, or Ten Outstanding Young Filipinos.

It won't be just to avoid being sexist.

Because the trend now, is to be Filipino – in your convictions and in your real commitments. Regardless of sex or age, the times and the pressing task at hand – national recovery – call for acts of patriotism from each and every Filipino.

The judges have chosen wisely because it appears that the awardees' respective spheres of excellence represent our highest priorities.

There is the area of law with Chavez, although he thinks that this principal asset is his unflagging fidelity to his wife, despite his uncanny resemblance to Richard Gere. But his real achievements, for which he is here honored, are his brave defense of human rights under the dictatorship, and his brilliant defense of constitutional principles under the democracy.

There is order with Colonel Coronel, the precondition of sustained development.

There is cultural understanding with Lopez-Gonzaga, the foundation of peace among the diverse cultures that make up our nation. There was no selection just to fill the space. You, who stand here represent the near unanimous choice of the judges. And those judges are some of the most notable men and women in our community. There was little argument, and a great deal of concurrence about your high and remarkably early achievements. I congratulate you on the honor and that has been conferred on you.

May I also express my sympathy for you. You have set the hardest standard to meet – that of your own early achievements was essentially yourselves: your dedication, the skills you developed, and the talents God graced you with at birth. You won't lose them so long as you remain true to yourselves.

I congratulate you again, and wish you all the best.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 86th Foundation Anniversary of the Bureau of Customs

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 86th Foundation Anniversary of the Bureau of Customs

[Delivered on February 5, 1988]

A CATALYST FOR REFORMS

As a public service agency and revenue collection arm of the government, the Bureau of Customs must be a model of efficiency, honesty and integrity. The Bureau must promote the growth of commerce and industry. It must enforce rules and regulations which protect the higher interest of the people and the government.

President Aquino lauds the meaningful reforms that the Bureau of Customs has undertaken. She commits the government's full support for the Bureau's plans to modernize its operations. She stresses the importance of reorientation of the values of the Bureau officials and employees so that meaningful reforms may be effected not only in management systems but in the lives of those in public service.

Congratulations on your 86th Foundation Anniversary, I did not realize that the Bureau of Customs is that old. Perhaps, the need to rejuvenate the Bureau is long overdue. It must undergo some face-lifting, including the removal of excess bureaucratic fat and worn-out nerves.

I am truly glad that a determined effort is being made to streamline the operations of the Bureau of Customs. As a public service agency and revenue collection arm of the government, this Bureau must be a model of efficiency, honesty and integrity.

You have my assurance that Commissioner Mison and the officials and employees of Customs will receive my full support and backing in this undertaking.

I welcome the creation of a Customs-Industry Consultative Council. The first responsibility of the Bureau is to serve the country's traders and to promote the growth and development of our industries. We cannot collect duties and taxes if the businessmen are not making profits. We cannot squeeze juice from a turnip.

I am sure our businessmen will be more than happy to pay their taxes to the government if they are making money.

The leaders of the business community should take an active interest in Custom affairs and conduct constant dialogue with its officials and employees. The Consultative Council can serve as a forum for this.

Our traders should formulate policies and recommend measures which will expedite their transactions with the Bureau. They have every right to demand prompt and efficient service from our Customs officials and employees. Afterall, they are the customers and they provide income to finance the operations of our government. The Bureau must promote rather than hamper the growth of commerce and industry. Regulations and rules are promulgated for the purpose of ensuring the orderly conduct of business and for reconciling the interest of all concerned. Protecting the higher interest of our people and the government is not a monopoly of those in public service. Most of the true patriots are in the private sector, not in government.

I am happy to note that the Bureau of Customs has exceeded its targeted revenues. I am confident that it will do better this year. I know that our businessmen will fully cooperate for as long as they have a genuine respect and confidence in the leadership of Customs.

I am prepared to support the modernization and professionalization of the customs' service. It is a shame that the Philippines is far behind other countries in terms of facilities and equipment in the processing of shipping documents; in the handling, warehousing, and monitoring of cargoes; and in the expeditious reception of incoming foreign guests and returning residents.

The computerization of the entire operations of the Bureau is a must in this day and age.

I was informed that the present administration of the Bureau is planning to set up modern cold-storage facilities for perishable goods and items sensitive to temperature changes. I was told that a plan to acquire the most sophisticated laboratory equipments and instruments is contemplated.

I give full support to these plans.

I issued Executive Order No. 127 to promote efficiency and effectiveness in the delivery of services in our revenue-collection agencies.

By this order, all positions in the Bureau of Customs are deemed vacant. The Commissioner of Customs has the authority to overhaul the entire organization in this agency. I understand Commissioner Mison has just completed the reorganization of the Customs service.

More important than the personnel changes and movement is the reorientation of values of our officials and employees. Meaningful reforms must be effected not only in management systems but in the lives of those who have embraced the public service.

1988 has been decreed as Public Service Year in this agency. I welcome this. Government officials and employees must never forget that their positions are not their private preserves.

I appeal to the leaders of the business community to match the initiatives of the new administration in the Customs service. Without the support and cooperation of the business community, no reforms in the Bureau will work or succeed.

I hope that the Customs-Industry Consultative Council will act as the catalyst in pushing through radical reforms and improvements in Customs service.

I need not stress the urgency of regaining the full trust and confidence of our people in the government.

You are all aware of the magnitude and complexity of our problems. We must address these critical areas of concern with resolute will.

Our people can no longer afford to wait. They have long suffered from government neglect. We must fulfill their expectations and help them realize their aspirations and their dreams.

If we can make the Bureau of Customs a model agency, there is no reason why we cannot improve the performance of other agencies of the government.

What we have initiated in this bureau is just the beginning.

Before I close, I want to bring us back to the Bureau's essential mission: and that is to collect tariffs and catch smugglers. Computerization is fine, but unless this essential mission is accomplished, all that computerization achieves is a detailed record of failure.

Last Wednesday, I directed the Customs Commissioner to put the heat on textile smugglers. I directed him to raise the bounty for turning in textile smugglers. I want the bounty and the heat raised to a pitch where smuggling will be a definite and imminent hazard to the health.

I don't want analysis at the end of this year. I want convictions. I want protection for the industries that are investing their all in the future of this nation. And I want absolute protection for the men and women, and their families, whose livelihoods are threatened by smuggling.

Thank you and good day.

Message of President Corazon Aquino on the Community Employment and Development Program

CEDP

February 15, 1988

TO GENERATE JOBS FAST

The eradication of poverty through the vast creation of jobs is the highest priority of President Aquino's administration. The Community Employment and Development Program (CEDP), launched in August 1986, is designed to generate jobs through numerous small-scale and labor-intensive projects in the countryside.

President Aquino reports on the progress of the CEDP implementation. In 1986 and 1987, the P8.7 billion appropriation for 53,842 projects generated more than one million new jobs. She stressed the need for the participation of the community and nongovernment organizations in the implementation of CEDP. Their participation will contribute towards achieving self-reliance and evolving a government that is truly sensitive and responsive to the people.

From the very start, this Administration set the immediate and vast creation of jobs as its highest priority. Poverty being a widespread and long-time problem, its eradication would require long-term solutions. But the sufferings that poverty inflicts — malnutrition, disease, pain, particularly on children — are always immediate, even as the wounds it leaves behind become permanent afflictions: mental retardation, weakness, and an abiding mistrust for the order of things. And so we set ourselves to implement a program that would create jobs and provide income quickly to as many of our poverty-stricken people as possible. This was the Community Employment & Development Program or CEDP.

The program, launched in August 1986, was designed to generate jobs fast through numerous small-scale and labor intensive projects in the countryside. Projects like barangay roads, water pumps and sewage, and school buildings. The program was also intended to serve as a pump priming measure. P3.9 billion was appropriated in the first year for 22,842 projects which generated 389,853 jobs that year. Purchasing power improved markedly. '86 was a good year for business, the first time in a long time.

For 1987, P4.8 billion was appropriated from the budgets of different line agencies for the implementation of 31,000 projects. A total of 650,000 new jobs were targeted. As of the first of this month, about 20,000 projects were completed, another 8,000 are ongoing — an implementation rate of 94.3 percent. Sixty percent of the targetted jobs had been achieved.

But CEDP had more in mind than just the alternate digging and filling of holes just to put money for the time being in the pockets of our people. The projects, numerous though they were, were carefully reviewed to see how they contributed to long-term improvement in the lives of our people, particularly on heightening a posture of self-reliance. The people were consulted on these projects. An axiom of our thinking is that the various communities know best the directions they should take and how best to get to their goals. Another, corollary to this, is that you have to listen to the people, because only the people collectively have the power to effect the improvements this country needs. We encouraged the participation of non-governmental organizations in the implementation of the Program. It was both a way of harnessing the energies of the people, and enlisting their vigilance against a recurrence of the corruption of government, especially local government. We drew in a host of civic organizations to help us: the Jaycees, Rotary, Namfrel, rural improvement clubs, Madre, and concerned citizens groups such as those in Abra, Benguet, Isabels Cebu and Zamboanga; religious groups such as the Knights of Columbus, parish pastoral councils, the United Methodist Church, the Catholic Women's League, veterans organizations, and others too many to mention here. The Namfrel, being the most experienced and battle-tested, topped them all in the wideness of its reach and the penetration of its vigilance. These organizations have tried to keep an eagle eye on our operations and rein in government corruption, waste, and incompetence. This is just the beginning. Much more needs to be done to check graft and foot-dragging in the government's implementation of projects. But the participation of those who have monitored the CEDP will go a long way towards evolving a government that is truly sensitive and responsive to the people. The progress of CEDP to date encourages us to believe that people power for development has come of age. It will prove as effective in bringing material and moral progress to our nation as it showed itself unbeatable in achieving and protecting our freedom. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 1987 Constitution

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon Aquino President of the Philippines On the 1987 Constitution

[Delivered at the PICC, February 18, 1988]

JUSTICE FOR EVERY FILIPINO

The 1987 Constitution gave the Judiciary the power and the responsibility to protect democracy by giving justice to every Filipino. President Aquino calls for a partnership with the Supreme Court in rebuilding the physical infrastructure of the justice system in the country. After having restored democracy, the government should now attend to the needs of improving the practical administration of justice so that the people can work in freedom for progress and with a reasonable expectation of a just and lasting peace.

When this conference ends, you will have said the last word in a long time on constitutionalism and justice.

I want to take this same occasion to say the first word on the practical administration of justice, to the improvement of which this Government now commits itself fully.

Justice, it has been written, is the first virtue of social institutions. Laws, however well drafted and well-meaning, are nothing unless they do justice to every man in the ordinary course of his life. That is my concern and my duty. For I am charged as President with the faithful execution of the laws so that every Filipino gets his due.

I stand here honored by the presence of outstanding men and women of the law, who contributed greatly to the understanding of the law. My own contributions to the field have been modest: 318 laws and the Constitution of the Republic of the Philippines, in the year and a half of my extraordinary powers. These laws range from the renovation of the apparatus of State to the rectification of old injustices – in general establishing the framework and climate wherein our people can work in freedom for progress, and with a reasonable expectation of a just and lasting peace.

But the promulgation of salutary laws alone establishes merely the standards of right and justice. It is men and institutions that must realize them. In that respect, we have also made some progress. But how much progress remains to be studied. We must measure our progress in the daily administration of ordinary justice both by the standards of a reborn Nation's high expectations, and by the sad conditions of the past from which we freed ourselves.

A year before the Revolution, a handful of brave and honest men prepared a study on the state of the justice system in the Philippines. Not just the system that legitimized an unconstitutional dictatorship, but the system that one expected to give justice, at least, to the ordinary man in his ordinary concerns as a trade-off for the liberty he had lost.

The group of Ricardo J. Romulo produced a White Paper outlining the faults of that system and proposing measures for its reform. It saw a system that was, in its words, "understaffed, underpaid, and under attack on grounds of lack of integrity, efficiency and competence." A system where appointments waited on corrupt loyalties and motivations, where merit took a back seat to connections. A judicial system at the mercy of the Purse and the Sword – of the Legislative power and the Executive power – united in one hand, for its subsistence. And finally a judicial system that I took on the moral tone of the society it served, a society that had lowered its moral standards to the level of its fears and its greed. Fear of the dictatorship, and greed for its favors.

“Once a judge bends the law to please those in positions of power, soon enough he will bend the law to suit himself or whomsoever he may wish to please.” The cure was clear, the same cure for the sickness of the nation: a sense of high purpose, a feeling of security to foster the habit of independence, and a sense of pride in the nobility of the calling, which is no less than the care and giving of justice to everyman.

The Revolution cleared the path to the reforms you sought. Men and women of honor were exalted in the Judiciary, and the corrupt were removed. Laws and practices that conferred privilege to a few, rather than parity on all, were abolished.

The Constitutional Commission I appointed took it from there, and laid the foundation for a system of justice that could do justice if it had the will.

The Commission came up with a constitution that established the independence of the Judiciary by securing the tenure of its judges and the certainty of its budget.

It protected its integrity by removing the selection of judges from the grip of politicians and by limiting the discretion of the appointing power.

It provided measures to assure the relevance of the Judiciary to the demands of Philippine justice by fixing deadlines for the resolution of cases even for the Supreme Court. For justice delayed, is not justice denied, but justice despised and finally despaired of — the germ of destruction of any government or order of society.

In a backhanded tribute to the tragic past when the Judiciary took refuge in dubious doctrine to escape its duty to protect democracy, the Constitution gave it the power — and therefore the responsibility — to call any branch of government to account for abuse of discretion.

Nearly everything that is required has been provided to give justice to everyman, given the will on the part of our judges.

My own responsibilities are not over. Justice in our country today, for all the infusion of new blood and integrity we have made, wears the sad aspect of its past neglect. Our courts are shanties, our law libraries are few and scanty, records are lost or improperly kept, and delay and ignorance still distinguish the Philippine brand of justice.

Here I offer a partnership with the Supreme Court in whom the administration of the courts is now lodged. We need a blueprint for rebuilding the physical infrastructure of the justice system in our country. The aspect of moral and intellectual improvement I leave to you. It would not be proper for the Executive to trench upon the authority to discipline and upgrade the courts. But the rest is our common duty.

I have instructed the Justice Secretary and the Secretary of the Budget to discuss with the Supreme Court the creation of a joint Executive-Judiciary Committee that will prepare an infrastructure plan for the courts. A plan that can fit in with the public works programs we are implementing to generate quick employment.

We have built democracy a worthy house. It is time we attended to the needs of justice.

The work of recovery will still be long and hard; the damage we inherited was that great. There can be no shortcuts. No instant solutions. No manna from heaven, no Marshall plan, mini or maxi. We shall rise only as high as our feet will take us up the steps that we must build with our own hands. Yet, we can make sure that tired as we shall be at the end of the day, no rankling sense of injustice will disturb the equanimity of our souls, the peace of our homes, and the tranquility of our society. It is for this peace that the Constitution would have us work for a just and humane society.

I wish you success in your conference. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the people of Tawi-Tawi, February 26, 1988

Tawi-Tawi
February 26, 1988

A JOURNEY TO PEACE

As the first Philippine President to visit Tawi-Tawi, President Aquino discusses what the government is doing to address the needs of the province. A service and action program, launched in January 1988, will give the people of Tawi-Tawi greater access to basic services such as water, electricity, health, education, agrarian reform, irrigation and infrastructure. The President urges the people to join the government in working out a genuine autonomy law for Mindanao. The country needs their ideas, their revolutionary zeal and energy so that Mindanao and the entire Philippines can be transformed into a land of peace and prosperity.

Assalamu aleikum.

It was not very easy to persuade the people responsible for my safety to permit me to come to Tawi-Tawi. But I am glad that I had this opportunity to visit your lovely island.

I have listened carefully to the concerns expressed by your local officials and sectoral representatives.

Let me say, first of all, that although this is my first trip to Tawi-Tawi, I have kept myself informed about the urgent needs of your province.

You are, perhaps, aware that I have been talking, over the last month, to community leaders from all over Regions 9 and 12. These were the candidates proposed for appointment to the Regional Consultative Commission, the body which shall help Congress formulate the organic act for autonomy in Mindanao. I must have met, by this time, with over 110 such community leaders.

At these meetings, I always tried to probe perceptions of community needs. I learned, for instance, about the pitiful lack of safe, drinking water in many places in Mindanao.

As a result of these meetings, we launched on January 15 a service and action program designed to give the people greater access to basic services.

I know that here in Tawi-Tawi the water district of Bongao can service the nearly 5000 households within its coverage for only one to two hours a day. I have directed the local water utilities administration to undertake the rehabilitation of Bongao's water system.

Since this project will take some time to complete, I have also directed the Department of Public Works and Highways to begin the construction of artesian wells.

I also asked for a report on the status of power service in Bongao. It might interest you to know that within a month of the launching of the service and action program, the National Electrification Administration was able to reach an additional 500 households. But right now you can get power for only four hours a day.

By the end of April, an additional 1000 households will benefit from electric service. And by this time, electricity will be available for 12 hours, from four to nine o'clock in the morning and from five o'clock in the evening to midnight.

Expanded water and power services provide only two examples of the projects currently underway in Tawi-Tawi today. The Department of Health is constructing main health centers in Sitangkai and Tandubas, repairing the Cagayan de Tawi-Tawi hospital and expanding the Languyan municipal hospital. It is also completing the construction of a kumpit clinic. By next month, this kumpit clinic will be sailing to the coastal communities of the province to provide basic health care services.

The Department of Agriculture will start construction work this month on a water impounding system for irrigation in Magsaggaw and Bato-Bato, Balimbing.

The Department of Education, Culture and Sports has enrolled in selected private high schools over 150 students who could not be accommodated in the public school system. As part of its outreach program, it will start next week the first of ten literacy classes it will conduct this year for 250 participants.

The Department of Environment and Natural Resources has prepared over 250 land patents for distribution in Bongao alone. It is also working on a coastal reforestation project covering 1200 hectares in Nipa-Bacauan.

The Department of Transportation and Communications has just completed work on the water system at the Sanga-Sanga airport. Arrangements are being made for the asphaltting of the runway at this airport, a project which will make air travel to the province less dependent on weather conditions.

I have mentioned here only those projects which have been completed, which are underway, or which will start within the next four weeks. Other projects are scheduled for start-up or completion within the current fiscal year.

All the frontline agencies of the government are involved in the service and action program. In addition, the Department of Budget and Management, the Commission on Audit, and the Department of National Defense have been instructed to give full support to the implementing agencies.

I trust that the projects we have started meet your needs. They are small projects, many of them, but they have been chosen because they can have an immediate impact on the life of the community. I offer them to you as concrete proof that Cory Aquino cares.

I understand that no Philippine President has ever visited Tawi-Tawi until today. I hope my presence here today sends a clear and unmistakeable message. Tawi-Tawi is part and parcel of the Philippines. Cory Aquino is as much the President of Tawi-Tawi as she is of Tarlac. And Cory Aquino will abide by her sworn duty to protect the territorial integrity, national sovereignty and democratic constitution of the Philippines.

But Cory Aquino and the government need your help. The line agencies have made many promises to implement projects in Tawi-Tawi. I intend to hold them to their promises. You must help me keep them on track.

We will let you know what projects have been planned and what funds have been budgeted for Tawi-Tawi. We expect you to let us know when performance falls short of promises.

But tell us also of the successes. The bureaucracy deserves your support and encouragement. And if we can pull together, we shall make a difference and help bring peace and prosperity to the Philippines, from Aparri to Tawi-Tawi.

Before I conclude my speech, I would like to address this message, in the name of God the most merciful, the most kind, to our brothers, especially those who are abroad working at cross-purposes with us. Come and join us at the drafting table. Let us work out a genuine autonomy law for Mindanao — one that steams from the wellsprings of our people and one that is not imposed upon them. We need your ideas, your revolutionary zeal and energy not only for Mindanao, but for our entire country as well, to transform the Philippines into a land of peace and prosperity where equality and justice can reign supreme.

And to the rest of our countrymen, I would like to reecho the words of the late Desdemona Tan Abubakar, wife of Chairman Nur Misuari before she passed away last year. She asked us to look beyond 1521 and rediscover our roots. There is so much we can learn from the rich heritage bequeathed to us by our Mindanao brothers including our other cultural communities who never gave in to Islam nor succumbed to western colonization. They have to this day remained true to their traditions – traditions that we as a nation should respect and be proud of. By so doing, we can discover that we are truly brothers and sisters sharing only one homeland: the Philippines.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 2nd anniversary of the PSG

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the 2nd anniversary of the PSG

[Delivered on March 1, 1988]

DEMOCRACY'S FRONTLINE FIGHTERS

On the 2nd anniversary of the PSG, President Aquino cites and thanks the men and women behind the PSG who have offered their services to protect her and the heart of the Republic. Truly, they deserve a lifelong gratitude.

On its first anniversary, I called the Presidential Security Group "the armor protecting the Heart of Republic." Some people said that I was overdoing it, and charged my zealotry to special friendship.

Not so. If I have any gift for survival, it is my ability to read the character of people. And I had read courage, steadfastness, and absolute loyalty and protectiveness towards me in the ranks of the Presidential Security. Even as I read preparedness, superb intelligence, and decisiveness, in their officers. I had every confidence that when the test came, the PSG would prove equal to the generous praise I had given.

The test came on August 28 last year. The enemy chose a moment of greatest vulnerability. I had scheduled a regional visit to Central Luzon for the following day. A sizable portion of the PSG had therefore to be deployed in the area beforehand.

At this time, the head of my security had already received intelligence of a massive strike by rebel troops against the seat of Government. Yet I was determined to go on with the regional visit.

Clearly, the PSG would have to make up for their lesser number with greater skill and daring. For the first would have to begin and end right here in Malacañang. I had no intention of leaving the field to my enemies.

In the event, the PSG fought like tigers, fell like heroes, and repelled the attack. The stand they made was so valiant, the rebels did not think of trying again.

This was where the coup began and effectively ended, for without taking my life there was no way for the coup to succeed.

My instincts were right in my selection of the men and women who would guard my person, who would shield the heart of the Republic from all its enemies.

On its second anniversary, the PSG is still a young force in terms of years, but in terms of experience, they are tried and tested troops. Few Palace guards anywhere can boast as many challenges as you have faced, nor as a great victory as you have won. Recent history is littered with murdered Presidents, with slain hopes of peace and democracy, and with the lame excuses of their security. But here you showed that soldiers know how to fight and die for their leader.

I thank you, for your sacrifices: for the long tedious hours of guarding and for the flashing acts of courage. I thank you for my life and for the life of our democracy. Congratulations to you all. For all my admiration and respect for your fighting qualities, I hope that this year you will not have to impress me again. Thank you and good day.

After my speech this morning, what can I add except to say that the PSG can walk on water?

Well, whether you can walk on water or not, it's been proved that you can watch like hawks and fight like tigers to protect me and my family, the Presidency and Philippine democracy.

My children and I are deeply grateful and appreciative of the protection you have given us, and take this opportunity to raise a toast, in which I ask everyone to join me:

To democracy's frontline fighters, the shield of the Presidency – the Presidential Security Group, and to Colonel Voltaire Gazmin – the smartest decision I ever made – my profound admiration and the nation's undying gratitude for your courage and loyalty, for the great deeds that you have done, for the care and protection you have given to me and my family.

Aquino, C. C. (1988). Speeches of President Corazon C. Aquino : 7 November 1987 – 30 May 1988. [Manila : Office of the President of the Philippines].

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the elected leaders of the Local Government

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the elected leaders of the Local Government

[Delivered at the Philippine International Convention Center, March 4, 1988]

A BLUEPRINT FOR ECONOMIC RECOVERY

President Aquino urges all the elected local leaders to work together to give peace and justice a chance to reign. She stresses the institution of the following reforms to help in the national and local government efforts: CORD system, restructuring the RDC, creation of the LDCs. The kind of government we give turns on the kind of people we are.

First, may I welcome you all as partners with me in the task of government. Your election completed the structure of democracy. Everything that needed to be done to bring government to the people, and people to the government has been done. Except for the barangays, we shall have no more elections until 1992.

Now, let's get down to business.

With the local elections, the national and local governments lost the last excuse for shortcomings and failures.

Now you have the mandate, now you have the authority, and you have my full backing. What you no longer have is any excuse for not delivering on the priorities that we have set:

The first and the most important, is law and order throughout the land. This calls for the curbing of criminality, and the destruction of the rightist and leftist elements in our society that are bent on the overthrow of our government and our democracy.

It means hunting down fascist killers and leftist terrorists, breaking up the gambling syndicates, and flushing out and shutting down the vice-dens.

It means a concerted and unrelenting military campaign against the fountainhead of Communist influence and power: the New People's Army.

It means, simultaneously, the prompt and efficient delivery of the basic services for which governments are constituted on this earth and from which they derive the only reason for their expensive existence.

It means securing the property of our people, their ways of livelihood, their enterprises, their savings, their investments in the future of their children.

Needless to say, it means securing their lives. It means dealing punishment, after due process, to those who harm them or threaten their democracy, even to those who did not give due process to their victims.

It means justice for all, whatever the cost. No one above the law. One law above all. No excuses and no delays. That is why a few weeks ago, I chose to pay tribute to Constitutionalism not by uttering generalities, but by modestly ordering the improvement of the facilities and personnel by which the Constitution does justice to the people.

That is our first priority. Order. Law. Justice. Order according to the laws, the laws enforced in the spirit of justice. And in the hope that the vision for which the best of our race had died in the dark years of the dictatorship will be realized in our lifetimes: a just and humane society.

The second priority is economic development. The national government's blueprint for recovery is being implemented. Its complete implementation, not to say success, depends on government's ability to reach all Filipinos and make a difference in their lives. Beyond a certain point, the national government must depend on local governments to supplement its reach and increase its effective assistance and support to the varied efforts of our people to improve the economy and well-being of their families and communities.

The excuse before was that the OICs were not elected, were therefore not believed, and, naturally, were not being followed. Yet Bitay Lacson showed that you need not wait for an election to show how good a local chief executive can be.

The priority of economic development means in the plainest terms: improving the climate so that business may thrive, rather than be stifled. It means taking up your share of governmental responsibility in caring for the poor and helpless, encouraging industry and commerce rather than shaking it down, and protecting property rather than depleting it by improvident measures of taxation and needless expense. It means giving the people the best and most immediate example of the selflessness and total dedication of the true public servant. Before the people see us, who are in the national government, they feel the impact of your actions, good or bad.

We set great store by the role of local governments for we have always said that only the people can show us the right path and the right pace to certain recovery. And no one is better placed than the local governments to directly tap the energy and commitment of the people. To that end, we have instituted the following reforms that should facilitate the coordination of national and local government efforts:

Realizing that each region, not to say each province, has problems and potentialities for success that are peculiar to itself, I have set up the CORD system, or Cabinet Officer for Regional Development. I have appointed one Cabinet member to represent me in each of the 14 regions.

We have restructured the Regional Development Councils, which is meant to be the primary organization for regional progress, to give a more prominent role to local government. And we have created the Local Development Councils over whose undertakings you shall preside.

With these structures in place, we should have a wide channel for two-way traffic in ideas and feedback, and thereby enabling us to refine our programs and implement them better.

Improving the medium of communication between people and government is just the first part. Equally important is the clarity of government programs and directives. Unless local governments know what the national government offers, the best use of government resources cannot be attained.

The draft of a new Local Government Code requires all our departments and agencies to work out with the local governments comprehensive and integrated standards and guidelines for regular and recurring transactions between the national and local governments. The Departments and Agencies must inform the local governments of the central funds and services available to them. Within the Executive Branch itself, arrangements have been made for greater coordination among the various departments in order to bring services and assistance more efficiently to local governments and communities.

We are working on decentralizing the authority and functions of the Executive Departments to parallel the move towards the general decentralization of government which seems to be the spirit of the new Constitution. Thus, Departmental field units are now run by Undersecretaries and Assistant Secretaries, who have greater discretion and fiscal autonomy than ever before. Leading the pack of decentralizing agencies is the Department of Agriculture.

The autonomy of local governments must equally be reinforced. In the plainest terms, that means money: more funds and other resources for local governments. The Departments of Budget and Management, Finance, and Local Governments, in coordination with the Civil Service Commission, have been instructed to rationalize the salaries of local government officials to raise morale and improve performance. At this time, I am directing the Department of Budget and Management and Local Governments to review and recommend more realistic compensation scales and allowances for local government officials.

We are likewise working on a scheme to enable you to tap national funds more easily for your own programs. I shall request the Congress to increase the amounts of national assistance to local government units that can be released directly to local governments from P50,000 currently to P200,000. We are working towards a more equitable sharing with local governments of the proceeds and benefits from the exploitation of natural resources in their vicinities.

We are preparing a scheme to increase internal revenue allotments for local governments, based on their performance, particularly with regard to the efficiency and honesty of their current tax collection efforts under existing laws. The theory is, if local tax collectors cannot collect the right taxes under the old laws, there is no reason to believe they will do better under new ones. The key in this area is honesty.

We aim to relax the statutory contributions of local governments to the various agencies and programs of the national government.

In the first and most important task of local government, which is peace and order, I have approved the reorganization and strengthening of the Peace and Order Councils from the national to the local level so that we can bring to bear on the problems of criminality and insurgency the combined power of government and people.

I take this aspect very seriously, and will regard as critical to continued cooperation between the national and local governments the spotlessness of the local officials' records, as well as their reputation for honesty and obedience to the laws of morals of our society. Without your good example, the fight against crime and insurgency will fail.

In areas of particular ethnic and cultural uniqueness, we have made great progress in laying the groundwork for their eventual genuine autonomy within the framework of the Constitution. The Regional Consultative Council members are being selected to help the Congress draft the organic acts giving and defining the autonomy of the Cordillera and Muslim regions.

These and other measures too many to detail here, will require legislation, such as a new Local Government Code, a new Local Tax Code, the organic laws of the autonomous regions, amendments to laws on revenue allotments and statutory contributions by local governments, and a law creating the Philippine National Police and defining the proper role of local executives in law enforcement.

Let me end on the dominant note of this address: in the end, the kind of government we give turns on the kind of people we are: if we are dishonest, it will be dishonest government. If incompetent, that will show in the economic and social regression of our communities and of our country as a whole. We rule effectively only by example.

The advice I give you is not a counsel of perfection. We are honored to have among us today former OICs who have shown that sincere and uncompromising public service need not spell electoral defeat. On the contrary. That this political pro: given the times, and the changes that have taken place in our people, the only way to re-election is not through empty image-making but through good government.

Let us work together. Not against each other. Our people deserve the best. Let us give them our best.

THE POWER OF ADVERTISING

President Aquino encourages the advertisers to use radio, print, and tv to bring the message of democracy to every household through jingles, plugs and subliminals.

First, I want to know how you spell “pray” – with an “e” or with an “a”?

Seriously, what we have here is the lifeblood of press freedom. If you believe in the advantages of a free press, then help the press – be prompt in paying for your ads.

The life and integrity of the press depend on it.

I congratulate the new members.

We have changed for the better and that is certainly good for our country. For better and not for worse we have to link hands in this transition period that demands the very best from all of us Filipinos.

For better and not for worse, you in advertising will expend the amount of P2 Billion in 1988. This is because the economy is expanding and all indicators point to what Filipino businessmen themselves are stating as a boom year. As the economy expands, so does advertising. The happy result is more goods, more services, and certainly more jobs to a deserving citizenry.

For better and certainly not for worse, you in advertising have an obligation to bring the message of democracy to every household. I do not ask you to wage frontal war on our common enemies on the left and right by name. But I do ask you to nudge democracy forward through your jingles, your plugs, your subliminals. For if our restored democracy does not succeed, all of us will go under.

You in advertising have unusual power. You have dominion in print, radio and tv. Use this dominion wisely. When the final word is written on EDS A and on my administration, let it be said that you in advertising delivered best what you deliver most – the goods.

Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the PMA Graduation

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the PMA Graduation

[Released on March 12, 1988]

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR FIGHTING

Go and live by your commitment: security for every man and the destruction of all who challenge the authority of the government, stability of our society, honor of our country. The supreme ability to lead your men and fight alongside them and the willing sacrifice of your lives in the pursuit of that aim. Nothing else is asked of you, nothing more can be asked of any man.

My message will be brief and clear.

You have been graduated to be officers of the Armed Forces of the Philippines. That is what you must be: officers – which is to say leaders of men, in the most ancient and honorable calling of soldiering.

Your profession is like no other. Its ethics is the most austere and demanding.

Its aim, the most exalted.

You are expected to do your duty, even unto death – acting always with honor, facing danger always with courage. That is not asked of any other profession or occupation in our society.

Your aims are twofold:

No less than the security of every man, woman and child who puts his or her person and human rights under the protection of our laws,

And the destruction of all who challenge the authority of our government, the stability of our society, and the honor of our country.

To achieve this aim, two things in turn are required of you:

The supreme ability to lead your men and fight alongside them;

And the willing sacrifice of your lives in the pursuit of that aim.

Nothing else is asked of you. Nothing more can be asked of any man.

Policy is the business of the civilian authority – the President and the Congress. Fighting the enemies marked out by that policy is your business. So long as that distinction is kept in mind, there will be no misunderstanding.

The civilian authority knows that the problems of right-wing terrorism and Communist insurgency stem both from ambition and the socio-economic conditions in our country today.

Insofar as the problems are rooted in the ambition of certain individuals or groups to dominate our society, the solution is simple to formulate: military action. I know that is easier said than done. But just the same, the only way to defeat ambition is to crush it. As we did, again and again with the criminal ambitions of the Right – and as we continue to do with the totalitarian ambitions of the Left.

Insofar as the problems arise or draw strength from socio-economic conditions, that is the exclusive concern of the civilian departments of government. Let us not confuse these roles, because then we cannot pin the proper blame for failure, or render due praise for success.

Let me stress again that your role is to fight, your duty to fight well.

Your four years at this Academy is supposed to have prepared you for this duty by giving you mastery of combat skills and the ability to lead your men in a fight. We accept you into the Officer Corps on the assumption that you have acquired that mastery and leadership, for on those two things alone shall you be judged – by the nation that supported your training for the past four years and by your Commander-in-Chief.

When you graduate, you will bear the rank of Second Lieutenant or Ensign. You will be the lowest officer in rank but the highest in importance. For it is you who will lead the squads and platoons in the small actions that add up to the real war.

The insurgency war will not be fought in the Cabinet, in the Congress or in GHQ, but in the field. And that is where it will be defeated militarily. The insurgency war cannot be fought by programs and speeches, nor by commissions and committees. It must be fought, and it will be won, only by you and the men you will lead. It is your numerous small victories in the field that will add up to a final victory in the war, even as our economic initiatives and social reforms should abolish its roots forever.

That is where the military burden of counter-insurgency will lie: on your personal valor and group leadership, and on the fighting qualities of the fire teams that you will lead.

We have forgotten that soldiering is about fighting, first and last. We intend to correct that oversight.

I direct the Secretary of Defense and the Chief of Staff to review the emphasis of the Academy and re-focus it on combat abilities and small-unit combat leadership. Staff work is all well and good, but by itself all it can achieve is the efficient administration of impotence and defeat. There is no substitute for fighting. I don't want soldiers pushing papers. I want them pushing the enemy around.

Henceforth, the first crack at military honors and promotions will go to officers and men with distinguished combat records based on the unassailable testimonies of their comrades or on the unimpeachable evidence of their wounds. Such decorations shall be worn on the left side, over hearts that do not faint at the sight of danger.

The change must start here, with this graduating class, whose idealism and valor cry out for testing in the field.

A noble example precedes you: young Lieutenant Felix Brawner III showed the way. I am told that he repeatedly asked for dangerous assignments, believing rightly, as a man trained to fight, that he must be where the fighting is.

I too have felt a death in the family. Let General Brawner, a fighting general, take comfort in the thought that the son was true to the father and to the ideals of the Officer Corps. Let me conclude with a few words of advice, from the leader of the nation to leaders of men:

You cannot order men to fight, you can only lead them into the fight.

Impose no hardships on your men, expose them to no dangers, that you will not share with them.

Put the honor of the Corps and allegiance to the Constitution above your deference to superiors or friendship for your peers. The dishonesty, disloyalty and cowardice of any officer diminish you all.

Do not allow your men to be misused by anyone, politicians or fellow officers. Soldiers will be put in your charge in order that you may fulfill together your common mission: to fight and win the wars of the Republic.

There are those who say the Filipino soldier cannot fight well. I know he can. Provided he has the right leadership, and sees in his officers the courage and daring that are equal to his own. Be worthy of your soldiers.

Thank you and good day.

UNITY THROUGH SPORTS

The national sports event, Palarong Pampaaralang Pambansa was revived through the initiatives of the DECS. President Aquino notes the theme: “Sports for National Unity, Peace and Progress.” She said that it is on such occasions that regional boundaries and ethnic differences are overcome. Sports events also serve as avenues for discovering the athletic talent that will put our country in the world map of sports.

I am very pleased to see this gathering of young athletes considered to be among the best in the country.

I also congratulate the Department of Education, Culture and Sports for its initiative in reviving, after five years, this national sports event, the Palarong Pampaaralang Pambansa.

I note with gratification that the 1988 Palarong Pampaaralang Pambansa has for its theme, “Sports for National Unity, Peace and Progress.” I can see the usefulness of athletic competitions as means by which the competitive spirit of man might be channeled towards useful ends. The coming together of young people, their coaches, national and local government officials from all regions of the country, should foster national unity. It is on such occasions that regional boundaries and ethnic differences are overcome as you wade into the main events of each day. The values that are engendered such as sportsmanship, fairplay, honesty, cooperation, punctuality, and concern for others are themselves basic ingredients of a higher value, that of respect for human dignity. It is this deep sense of respect that we need to develop and internalize if we hope to succeed in fostering the unity we seek – that sense of nationhood that is essential to peace, stability, and progress.

Athletics and sports serve another useful purpose – that of discovering the athletic talent that will put our country in the world map of sports. I have given due recognition to those who have brought honor to us in sports. I encourage you who are here to do even better. The honor you bring to yourselves and to our country will enhance goodwill and mutual respect in our relationships with other countries of the world.

It is with these thoughts and in the spirit they engender that I now formally declare the 1988 Palarong Pampaaralang Pambansa officially open.

KATUPARAN NG PANGARAP

Ang pangarap ng mga magsasaka sa bayan ng Jalajala, Rizal ay natupad na rin. Ipinamahagi na ng Meralco ang may 390 nilang lupa sa Jalajala sa mga magsasaka, kasabay ng iba't-ibang programang inilunsad na maaaring makatulong sa mga benepisyaryo.

Ang pagmamay-ari ng lupang sinasaka ay isang matagal nang pangarap na ipinanalangin at ipinaglalaman ng ating mga kababayang magsasaka. Para sa kanila, ito ang magdadala ng kaluwagan sa matagal ng hirap na kanilang dinaranas. At ito rin ang siyang susi na magbubukas ng pinto tungo sa kanilang pag-unlad.

Ang pangarap na ito ay nagkatotoo sa ilan sa ating mga kababayang magsasaka mula sa munting bayan ng Jalajala sa lalawigan ng Rizal. Kayo ngayon ay tumanggap na ng kani-kanilang mga emancipation patents na katibayan sa pagmamay-ari ng lupang inyong sinasaka.

Habang ang panukalang batas tungkol sa Comprehensive Agrarian Reform program ay tinatalakay ng ating mga mambabatas sa Kongreso at Senado, ang Meralco Foundation at ang Meralco, ay nagsasagawa ng kanilang sariling reporma sa lupa. Ipinamahagi na nito ang kanilang mahigit sa 390 lupa sa Jalajala sa mga magsasaka. At hindi lamang sila tumigil doon sa pagbigay ng lupa, sila din ngayon ay nagsasagawa ng iba't-ibang programa para sa kanilang mga benepisyaryo upang lalong mapaunlad ang kalagayan nila at matiyak ang kanilang kapakinabangan sa lupang kanilang natanggap.

Ang ating magsasaka ay nararapat po nating tulungang umangat ang buhay. Ang pakikiisa at pagtulong sa maliliit at mahihirap na tao ay hindi lamang tungkulin para sa inyong pamahalaan. Ito ay tungkulin din ng mga tao at mamamayan na masasabing may labis na sa kanilang mga pangangailangan. Ito ay isang tungkulin nating mga tao bilang isang mabuting mamamayan at responsableng tagakalinga sa ating mga kapwa. Marami sa mga problema natin bilang isang bayan ang mabibigyang lunas kung ang lahat ay magbibigyan at magkakatutungan.

Ang mga isinasagawang programa ng Meralco Foundation at ng iba pang kumpanya't mamamayan para makatulong sa mga magsasaka at iba pang taong naghihirap sa ating mga kanayunan ay sana magsilbing halimbawa sa iba pa para ating mapabilis ang pagiging maunlad ng ating bayan.

TRIBUTE TO A GREAT MUSLIM

A great Filipino and a great Muslim, Senator Ahmad D. Alonto was awarded the prestigious King Faisal International Prize for his tremendous services to Islam in the Philippines. This man symbolizes the wisdom of Islam and brotherhood among Filipinos.

We are privileged to honor today a great Filipino and a great Muslim, Senator Ahmad D. Alonto, who received the prestigious King Faisal International Prize for his tremendous services to Islam in the Philippines. As many of you know, Senator Alonto was one of those I wanted to appoint to the Regional Consultative Commission. But he declined most humbly, citing his age. I was sorry for it was the wisdom of his experience I wanted to tap in the Commission.

For over 30 years, Senator Alonto served our country. He was at the forefront of efforts to promote Islamic education, religion and culture and to advance the political and economic development of the Muslim Filipinos. His most recent service was as a member of the Constitutional Commission, where he worked hard for the recognition of Muslim regional autonomy.

The award conferred upon Senator Alonto establishes the common ground upon which the two great cultures of our country, the Christian and the Muslim, can unite: the ground of excellence in the pursuit of the progress and well-being of all Filipinos.

But, in preparing for these remarks, I learned from the words of King Faisal how much Muslims and Christians have in common, for he said:

“What does man aspire to? The good. That is in the Islamic Shariah.

“He wants justice. That is in the Islamic Shariah.

“He wants security. It is there also.

“He wants freedom. It is there.

“He wants progress. It is there.

“He wants remedies. They are there.

“He wants science. It is there.

“Everything is there, inscribed in the Islamic Shariah.”

Although I do not know Arabic, I can conclude that the meaning of the Islamic Shariah is the heart of man, for all the things that are there are in our hearts.

Today we are pleased indeed to honor a man who brings us all closer to the wisdom of Islam and the brotherhood of all Filipinos, Senator Ahmad Domocao Alonto.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the National Federation of Sugar Planters

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the National Federation of Sugar Planters

[Released on March 21, 1988]

THE FILIPINO CONSUMER: A SOURCE OF STRENGTH

President Aquino reads the handwriting on the wall for the sugar industry which dictates long-run economic policies. She admonishes the sugar cane planters to look inwards for a stable source of renewed strength for the sugar industry. That strength is the Filipino consumer.

I am honored to address this Convention. As you know, our family has been engaged in sugar for many decades, and so the problems and opportunities of the industry are not unfamiliar to me.

The theme you have chosen is indeed appropriate: "Philippine Agriculture at the Crossroads: Challenge and Response." It shows your full awareness of the real state of the industry, and more importantly, of its realistic prospects.

Those prospects have markedly improved, largely as a result of the problems that have been solved. We dismantled the monopolies in both sugar and coconut, injected the spirit of enterprise and innovation into these industries, and radically improved the purchasing power of the countryside.

Consider that on the eve of EDSA, domestic sugar production was 1.5 million metric tons; consumption was 800,000 metric tons. Today, production is 1.2 million metric tons, but consumption has skyrocketed to 1.3 million metric tons, a shortfall of 100,000 metric tons. Which is the reason for the importation I have authorized.

The price of sugar on the eve of the Revolution was P200.00 per picul, today it is P550.00.

While the increase is reason for your rejoicing, it is also ground for caution. We may price sugar out of the domestic market, unless the price is stabilized at an acceptable level. Industrial users may be forced to switch to corn sweeteners or other artificial substitutes. This is already the trend abroad. And once the switch is made, a reversion is near to impossible. Beyond that, we have a responsibility to protect the Filipino household consumer. For these reasons, we have imported sugar.

The importation shall be done by the government, to assure that the consumers are protected. Such profits as may accrue from the transactions shall be channeled back to the industry, for the benefit both of the producers and workers.

Many of the industry's ills have been addressed. Certain fundamental problems remain.

In the U.S., per capita demand for natural sugar has declined from 90 lbs. per person in 1975 to 60 lbs. in 1985. The U.S. market has turned increasingly to "caloric sweeteners."

Not only are we taking a beating from the competition, the competition has decided to make it hard for us to even enter their markets. The developed countries continue to subsidize their sugar producers and build protectionist walls around them. They then dump their excess production, in the world market. The blow is felt hardest by the Philippines, Brazil and the Caribbean countries, whose exports have been thus undercut by this combination of subsidy, exclusion and dumping.

We in the Philippines had to turn to the U.S. quota with its preferential prices.

The U.S. has been, historically, the most important market for Philippine sugar, but even that market has contracted radically. The quota for 1982, for example, was 1.2 million tons. In 1987, it was 106,000 tons.

We have worked hard to increase our share of the U.S. quota. Our friends in Washington have been helpful. But we realize that such help as we have gotten is temporary, that the handwriting on the wall is writ in stone. There is only so much that friendship can do; economic realities will dictate the long-run policies.

These externalities have forced us to look inwards for a stable source of renewed strength for the sugar industry. And we have found it. That strength, it is clear to us all, is the Filipino consumer. It is a source we have overlooked in the past. The Philippines, despite being a major sugar producing country, has one of the lowest per capital consumption of sugar.

Whatever the critics say, the country is experiencing a marked increase in purchasing power, especially in the countryside. Soft drinks, fruit juices, and other heavily sugar-based products have been selling very well. It appears that any measure that serves to increase rural purchasing power can only redound to the tremendous profit of the sugar and other industries.

Yet the industry remains essentially what it has long been: moribund – heavily in debt, direly in need of new capital, and the most prominent target for social criticism because of the abject poverty of its workers – largely the result of the refusal of many planters to pay just, not to say, legal wages. Meanwhile, there are signs that the former profligacy that characterized the planters is creeping back. Justly or unjustly, I will not say, but those are the facts.

While the industry has undoubtedly experienced “a rebirth”, there is no question either that there must be an end to sugar as we have known it.

The glory days of a special U.S. market for Philippine sugar are over. The U.S. will increasingly scale down its quota system, until it finally does away with it, and opens its market to free world competition. While the gradual elimination of the quota is a threat, equally its substitution with an open market is the opportunity we have long needed. But we must prepare for it.

Philippine sugar, as it is today, is in no position to exploit that opportunity when it strikes. The costs of our inefficiencies will simply price us out of the contest. The sugar boom we have been experiencing may be our last chance to prepare ourselves for the coming challenge.

Several steps must be taken.

The first, there must be a renewed and greater effort at diversification. This must start now, for the process of shifting crops will stabilize only three to four years from the time it is started. The abnormal rise in sugar prices may tempt you to delay diversification indefinitely. Let us not repeat our mistakes.

The main effort of diversification must be yours, the private sector's. Government's role can only be supportive through research, credit and infrastructure.

The modernization of the industry must be undertaken immediately, both in its industrial and agricultural components. On the industrial side, we shall need more efficient and cost-effective milling methods and technologies. Thailand and Australia may serve as models. On the agricultural side, we should turn to higher-yielding varieties suitable to local conditions, more rational land-use, and more rational methods of harvesting in order to increase yield per hectare. We are all familiar with this, and know that the secret is better wages and better working conditions for the sugar worker for them to adopt the more productive system. Workers need not burn the cane crops in order to increase their tonnage, and thereby increase their wages. They can be motivated to gather the trash as fuel for the mill's boilers. These methods will increase yields and lower the cost of milling.

I realize that there is yet another disturbing issue confronting the sugar industry today. And that is agrarian reform.

I can understand your unhappiness with the very idea of agrarian reform. The mere thought of giving up land that generations of your families have worked is a painful experience. More so now when prices are the highest ever in history, since the War. There is nothing more wrenching than nostalgia and profits.

But it is not just parting with the land you have grown to love but of bidding farewell to a way of life. But the nation's circumstances dictate that we look beyond self-interest to national preservation. There are 58 million Filipinos, most of whom are desperately poor and have no means to improve themselves or secure a better life for their children. We have one of the highest population densities in the world: 193 persons per square kilometer of land. Each day that passes increases the general misery and air of hopelessness of the vast majority of our countrymen.

The answer, I have said, is higher incomes through higher productivity. This can also come from the dispersed ownership of land. For what is needed to exploit the full potential of agriculture is the motivation to work better, to plan longer and wiser, and to produce more – things one cannot expect from a mere transient on the land.

The people want land, so they can stand with dignity and work with the assurance that the sweat of their brows and the labor of their hands will enure chiefly to themselves and their children.

The passing of the large estates is long overdue. Size as a precondition of wealth is an idea that belongs to an age long dead. The modern age demands efficiency instead. We have barely tapped its potential for generating greater wealth for the old entrepreneurs of sugar, and of other industries that equally demand modernization. We can get more and better out of less, given an openness to science and a spirit of cooperation with government. More importantly, it is time the planters moved on to more profitable and more challenging ventures.

I have viewed the deliberations in Congress on the CARP with mixed reactions. I know that agrarian reform must be well thought out, so that we do not accomplish a mere subdivision of the present miseries on the land. Undoubtedly, a gradual and phased implementation of agrarian reform would be ideal, in order to accomplish its aims without its pitfalls. Yet what is at stake here is not just an economic program, but an article of faith in the responsiveness of democracy to the wants of the people. Circumspection is needed, but so is speed.

Let me say also, that whatever law finally issues from this long drawn-out process, it shall be the law. And I, as President, shall enforce it – to the letter and in the spirit of sharing the fruits of progress with all our people.

And yet we need not wait on the law to do our part. Voluntary land reform, for which the law provides, will underscore the basic commitment to country that we all share, farmers, planters and government. The opportunity beckons to preempt history and make it ourselves by implementing reforms attuned both to reality and to the demands of justice.

I want you to join me in making this program a success. I need you for that, you have the experience and the love of country for it. I know you will be with me and with all our people to make it work. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on AFP Day

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On AFP Day

[Delivered at Camp Aguinaldo, March 22, 1988]

THE BEST PROPAGANDA

Local government officials should serve as examples of integrity, competence, and wholehearted devotion to public service and the public good. The best propaganda is that of actual deeds, of tangible achievements, of a real and caring government presence everywhere in our country. Where there is effective government, there can be no viable insurgency. She stresses the duties of the different powers against terrorism: power of military, power of the police, power of the local government and power of the state.

I have, laid the foundations of our strategy:

A double strike against the insurgency by demonstrating, with one hand, what government can do for the people,

And showing with the other, what government will do to those who challenge its authority and threaten the life of democracy.

At the PICC, early this month, I told the governors and mayors what the nation expects from them:

Security for all our people, encouragement to business and labor, and the prudent use of the increased resources will be given to them.

I said I expected them to care for the poor and the helpless in their communities, to encourage the thrift and industry of the farmer, the laborer and the businessmen, and to help government in the delivery of the basic services of health, education and infrastructure.

Above all, I expected them to lead by example; by the example of integrity, competence, and wholehearted devotion to public service and the public good. The renewed faith in government since the Revolution must be kept alive, and only leadership by the example will do it.

This is the best propaganda. The propaganda of actual deeds, of tangible achievements, of a real and caring government presence everywhere in our country.

Where there is effective government, there can be no viable insurgency. Acts of injustice and economic backwardness can give rise to insurgency but cannot sustain it over the long run. What keeps an insurgency alive and makes it grow is the absence of effective government – keeping order, doing justice, and taking care of the basic needs of its citizens.

Two weeks ago, I addressed the new crop of AFP officers graduating from the PMA. I made it as clear to the cadets as I did to the local executives what I and the nation expect from them: no more and no less than the unrelenting pursuit and destruction of fascist terrorists and Communist guerrillas in the cities and in the countryside, so we can end all credible threats to democracy by the end of my term.

Every one to his proper station, I said. The civilian departments shall help build a new country of progress, justice and prosperity on the land that the Armed Forces and police must clear of all elements that are hostile to that vision.

I want a clear-cut division of labor: civilian departments to civilian reconstruction, the military arm to military action.

Let there be no confusion of roles so there can be the strictest accountability for failure, as there will be due recognition of genuine achievement. I do not want one arm pointing at the other as the excuse for its failure.

Within the civilian side itself, responsibilities have been clearly defined and roles delineated. In the frontline of the civilian counter-insurgency campaign are health, social services, education, agriculture and public works. The entire civilian side of government is committed, but these are on the line.

The Armed Forces is being primed for the task assigned to it.

At the PMA, I laid down the essential spirit of the military effort we must mount: the spirit of the offensive, carried out with the skill and bravery we expect of Filipino officers and men. A spirit that seeks no substitute for engaging an armed enemy in combat.

I want the fat trimmed off the military. I want more men behind guns, less than behind desks.

I want the ratio of support to combat units reduced, given the basic character of our logistic support system anyway.

I have long noted the disturbing ratio of patrols to contact, a ratio that shows the urgent need to upgrade tactical intelligence capabilities.

I want the officers out in the field with their men, leading them into the fight – on foot and less vulnerable to mines and ambushes.

I believe that only those who are actually out there know what is needed and what must be done. The Chief of Staff, General Rene de Villa shall therefore prepare for the abolition of the Regional Unified Command system, and of any other unnecessary intervening headquarters. He shall decentralize and devolve operational control of the Armed Forces to the tactical commanders in the field.

Fiscal authority and control shall be likewise decentralized to speed up the release of funds to commanders in charge of military operations.

We have taken two years to consolidate democracy in this country – after 15 years of dictatorship. That is no small achievement. At the same time that is no excuse for further delay.

Poverty, underdevelopment, and unjust social structures are the roots of insurgency and are a challenge to our conscience and our duties as government.

Regular company-size rebel units, united front organizations, infiltrated barrios, assassination squads, on the other hand, are the instrumentalities of insurgency, and as such are challenges to our power.

The indifference and ignorance of government and society feed the roots, but it is the absence of governmental power that gives range and effectiveness to the instruments of insurgency. It is that power we will now supply throughout the length and breadth of our land:

The power of an efficient military presence to face down the military challenge of the New People's Army in field, forest, and city street where the Communist terror strikes.

The power of the police to secure our communities against anarchy and crime, and against the influence of Communist terrorism.

The power of local governments to meet the immediate needs and articulate the basic aspirations of their communities, and to serve as the link between the people and the national government. We hope to make it increasingly the main implementing arm of basic services to the people.

And first and last, the power of the State to guarantee the democratic character of government in this country for all time and in all seasons. In the season of hardship, and in the season of prosperity to come. In a time of troubles, as in the time of the just and lasting peace that we have vowed to give our people.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the significance of the NFA's Food Development Center

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the significance of the NFA's Food Development Center

[Delivered at the FTI Complex, Taguig, March 25, 1988]

THE FOOD DEVELOPMENT CENTER

President Corazon C. Aquino cites the significance of the contribution of the FDC to our economic activity. She thanks the people and the government of Japan for their continued support for the center. She also congratulates the men and women behind the FDC for a job that has merited recognition and honor for the country.

The FDC started as an adjunct research laboratory and quality control body in 1968. By 1985, this department of the National Food Authority was providing quality control services and setting international standards that would open world markets to our export food products.

The Philippines is an agricultural country. The blessings of nature and the talents of our people all incline this country towards agriculture as its principal livelihood and economic activity. It stands to reason that we must devote our main efforts to the improvement of agriculture and its products. The FDC is one of those efforts. And its achievements have received wide recognition and support, even from our friends abroad.

FDC has received a grant-in-aid of P327 million from the government of Japan through the Japan International Cooperation Agency for the construction of a new Center upon this ground that we are breaking today.

I want to thank the Government and people of Japan for their generous assistance. I wish also to thank the project consultants and contractors from Japan for their work on this project. And I would like to congratulate the men and women of the FDC on the great work that they have done which has merited such high recognition both here and abroad.

Arigato Gozaimasu!

Good afternoon.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the National Prosecutors League

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the National Prosecutors League

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, March 25, 1988]

A GROUP OF ACHIEVERS

Justice is the heart and soul of democracy. The local Prosecutors has dedicated themselves to their mission thus speeding up the flow of justice in our country. In the affair, President Aquino has directed the Secretary of Justice to submit recommendations regarding the measures to equalize retirement and other benefits and the establishment of a Prosecutorial Academy to train lawyers in the special acts of Prosecutors. President Aquino also reiterates a study to be prepared for a massive courthouse building program to give justices worthy houses throughout the land.

Here, finally, is an audience I am not going to upbraid, and, so far as I know, here is an audience that has nothing or little to criticize me for. Usually, in preparing for a speech before an agency of government, I get a long list of requirements and complaints. Not from Justice.

The national prosecutors already enjoy the respectable increase in salaries that I mandated to improve morale and performance in government.

We shall study measures to equalize your retirement and other benefits with those enjoyed by the judiciary. I direct the Secretary of Justice to submit his recommendations to me as soon as possible.

What pleases me, as I said, earlier is that I am before achievers, before a self-disciplined organization that has put itself into trim fighting form. You have purged your ranks of the unfit, and, by dedicating yourselves single-mindedly to your mission have greatly speeded up the disposition of the cases brought before you.

I congratulate you.

Reforms in the bureaucracy have reduced your jurisdiction somewhat. The various agencies with special jurisdictions, like the military courts, the Tanodbayan, the PCGG, have removed your former jurisdiction over abusive military and police, crooked public officials, and cronies. What has been left to you, however, is far from modest. For what remains for you to do is protect and vindicate the rights of a little less than the 58 million Filipinos who are honest and law-abiding.

This may not seem as glamorous as what the others are doing, but it is more important, as I had occasion to point out at last month's convention on Constitutionalism. There I said that my first concern and duty is to do justice to the ordinary citizen. I said that if we failed in this, if justice fails for the vast majority of Filipinos, then we can expect the end of order and society as we cherish it.

We can fail in almost anything — in the economy, in health, in education — but we cannot fail to do justice to everyman.

A man who is poor might blame his own lack of diligence or his hard luck for his hardship. A man who is ill might accept that the human body is not perfect. And a man who is ignorant may not know better.

But a man who is abused in his inalienable rights, a man who is maltreated by another, who is hurt or robbed will demand justice, and if he is killed, his blood will cry out for it — whether he is poor or sick or ignorant. For the sense of justice is implanted by God in all of us. It is this sense of justice and its embodiment in the laws of the land that fall under the protecting hand of the prosecutor.

I promised the judges to do all I can to assist them in their tasks. I now extend the same promise to you.

I ordered a study to be prepared for a massive courthouse building program to give Justice worthy houses throughout our land. Buildings that will improve efficiency in the administration and lend that noble aspect of dignity it deserves. I now extend this program to include facilities for the prosecutorial arm of government.

I should make myself clear on this matter. The budget for this building program is not meant to come from the budget of the Justice Department. That is why I instructed the Secretary of the Budget to sit with the Secretary of Justice to discuss with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court the creation of a joint Executive-Judiciary Committee that will oversee the program.

I am still waiting for a response to that directive.

We take note also of a suggestion to establish a Prosecutorial Academy to train lawyers in the special arts of prosecutors and ask the Secretary of Justice to prepare a recommendation on the matter.

May I congratulate you again on your performance. Much remains to be done, of course. Please apprise me of all your requirements. Your accomplishments thus far, despite limited resources, encourages government to extend to you every help it can. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on RCC Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On RCC

[Delivered in Cotabato City, March 26, 1988]

A COMMITMENT TO SERVE

President Aquino is very much aware of the rigorous screening the Commissioners had to go through. Many people will surely envy those who were chosen but for as long as they remain true to their commitment, President Aquino assures them of giving her support the best she can.

It is graduation time. All over the country, colleges and universities are holding graduation ceremonies. This is perhaps the reason why I feel that I am in a graduation ceremony this morning. For in a sense this is a commencement exercise – a graduation of sorts from a rigorous process of selection and the start of a new kind of political involvement.

I followed very carefully the testing and trial of the RCC nominees all the way up to their appointment. No other group of public officials has had so rigorous a screening as these commissioners.

The first step was their endorsement by sectoral groups for appointment to the RCC. The five candidates thus chosen were individually interviewed by a committee composed of the Peace Commission and the Mindanao Consensus-Building Panel. This was the second step, which reduced the number of candidates from five to three for each district. Their names were then published in national and local newspapers. This gave the public at large a chance to give feedback on the candidates.

At the third step, I stepped in. I studied the files on the candidates and then interviewed them myself. I met and talked with all three candidates from each district. Only after I had done so did I make my selection.

The last step was Congress. The Commission on Appointments passed carefully upon the qualifications of all the nominees. I understand that the commissioners-designate acquitted themselves impressively before the Commission.

I have reviewed the search and selection process for the RCC members in some detail and would like to underscore two key points:

First, the process followed the guidelines laid down by the Constitution; and Second, the process reflects our commitment to the principle of popular consultation.

Elections are indeed the sacred route to power in a democracy. Yet the present-day practices of democracy have not always guaranteed respect for all the values that democracy seeks to advance and preserve.

The first and highest value that democracy protects is the people's free choice. Yet democracy in a poor land has sometimes failed to give the people the widest choice of the best who could be their leaders. Wisely, our Constitution has sought to remedy this temporary shortcoming by the process that I have outlined. Its products stand proudly here before us.

But the real value of the process is the way it engaged the energies of communities on issues that required them to divide, discuss, and finally converge upon a common choice – all in the spirit of mutual tolerance, respect for divergent opinion, and country above self.

People at the grass-roots had to come together to form a consensus on who should represent their interests. They had to listen to different, sometimes disagreeable points of view, and resolve their differences. In brief, the process provoked the kind of active participation in decision-making without which elections are a sham and democracy an illusion.

I have made a great personal investment in this experiment. It is a source of pleasure and pride for me to be able to say that I have met and talked with each and everyone of the commissioners. Let me address my final remarks to them.

You face a difficult and thankless task. Nobody paid much attention to the RCC when it was being organized and needed attention and encouragement. Yet now, after the careful and time-consuming work we have done, those who ignored it now attack it as a threat to the old ways of power to which they have become accustomed and at which they are experts.

Let me reassure you. You stand upon the rock of the Constitution; your existence and important role are clearly mandated by it.

As with all honest public service, the material reward is small. If it isn't, you are doing something wrong.

No one who joins government should expect to have it easy. Especially, when the country is one that has suffered so much as ours. Even now, the forces that nearly destroyed our country, continue to harass our efforts to rebuild the country and give it peace. You are joining me in that struggle.

It is expected that you have many different ideas among you. But it is also expected that in the end you shall come together in one united effort to achieve our common goal of progress and peace, much as your respective sectors and communities came together to select you.

I sense in all of you a common concern for the protection of human rights, a commitment to the peaceful resolution of conflict, and a common compassion for the disadvantaged among our people.

You will be the objects of close and critical scrutiny. You will find that you have indeed enemies among those you expect will be your enemies, but you, will find them also among those you help. That is part of public service.

Many will want you to fail, but if you are firmly grounded in high principle and remain deeply rooted in your communities, you will prevail.

This I promise you. For as long as you are true to the people, I shall be constantly beside you, giving you all the support I can.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the 40th Anniversary of the World Health Organization

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the 40th Anniversary of the World Health Organization

[Released on April 7, 1988]

A COLLECTIVE VOICE FOR HEALTH

The President congratulates the staff of W.H.O., globally, and in particular the Regional Office which considers the Philippines as its home. The Philippines celebrates the anniversary of this organization and takes pride in its successes.

I am honored to have been invited here today to participate in the celebration of the 40th anniversary of the World Health Organization. I am especially pleased to note that, for thirty-eight of those forty years, Manila has been home to W.H.O.'s Western Pacific Regional Office, handling the affairs of the largest and the most diverse of the organization's six regions.

As the world's collective voice for health, W.H.Q. has contributed substantially to the well-being of many of the world's peoples. Through its programs, it has led the fight against many endemic diseases which afflict particularly the poorest of the world's population. With its vast network of consultants as well as its own expert staff, the organization is able to generate expert opinions and timely technical advice to guide the health policies.

W.H.O. had consistently stressed the principles of self-reliance and social equity in helping member states confront and solve their problems. The objective of health for all by the year 2000 through the primary health care approach is an outstanding goal to which the Philippines is firmly committed.

Our National Drug Policy, which I initiated -a year ago, consisting of safe and effective medicines, rational use of pharmaceuticals and the development of our capability for basic manufacturing translate into reality many of W.H.O. s pharmaceutical concepts, such as the essential drugs concept and generic labels. I am indeed confident that with the full support of the World Health Organization in technical, material and moral terms — we shall persevere and succeed in fully implementing this policy which can only result in better health care for the Filipino people.

There are good reasons indeed for this organization to celebrate its 40th anniversary. Its past accomplishments justify it, its future contributions will confirm its merits even more. As one of the member states of W.H.O., the Philippines celebrates the history of our organization. As host of the Western Pacific Regional Office, the Philippines takes pride in W.H.O.'s successes.

Of particular note to this region is the information recently given to me that our distinguished Regional Director, Dr. Hiroshi Nakajima, has recently been nominated to the post of Director-General of W.H.O. in Geneva This news gives us greater reason to celebrate today's happy event.

And so, I would now like to offer congratulations on behalf of the Philippines, its government and its people, to W.H.O. and its staff, globally, and, in particular to this Regional office, its staff and its Regional Director, Dr. Nakajima.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Ateneo Law Commencement Rites

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Ateneo Law Commencement Rites

[Released on April 8, 1988]

THE PRESSING ISSUE OF LAW

In the commencement rites of Ateneo's College of Law, the President talks about freedom of the press and its limitations. She also congratulates the graduates and expresses confidence that the graduates will apply what they have learned in the practice of their profession: justice for all.

As the date of this occasion approached, I was wondering what I could tell you that was new. But somehow I had the feeling that something would turn up. Something unfortunately did.

I would not have minded, even if you did, to have just stood here and shaken hands with each of you, giving no speech except for some brief congratulatory remarks. Things had settled down quite a bit. Everyone was saying that the economy was taking off. Developments were speaking more eloquently than I could about our country. This buoyant feeling increased when the military captured the top leadership of the Communist insurgency. But, as always, it was "win some, lose some." Never a perfect week.

A well-known — I prefer to call him a "notorious" — prisoner escaped. His first act upon unlawfully regaining his illegal freedom was to impose upon the constitutional guarantee of free speech. This gives you a fair idea of how he understands freedom of speech, as a weapon rather than as a forum. He gave a radio interview the very day of his escape.

The Secretary of Justice warned that radio franchises may be cancelled if such interviews were aired. The interview was not aired. Since then, the government has received a great deal of criticism for the chilling of the Justice Secretary's warning on free expression.

The question was asked: Is there really an emergency so grave as to justify a curtailment of speech, given that the government, from the start of the incident, had repeatedly assured the public that everything was under control? Wasn't that a contradiction?

Let me deal with that apparent contradiction. Government had everything under control because we had decided to take full and complete control of the situation. We had resolved to isolate the rebel escapee so he could not repeat the damage he had done nor the murder and mayhem he had wrought on August 28 last year. By instituting checkpoints, a manhunt, and issuing a warning about aiding and abetting the fugitive, we had sharply curtailed his capability to increase the number of his confederates. So it is true that we were in control, and it is also true that we had to take emergency measures to achieve this control. There was no contradiction. We were in complete control of the situation because nothing and no one would be allowed to stand in our way.

That warning was issued about the dire consequences of airing the Honasan interview because coup-by-mouth and instability by public alarm had become this man's chief stock-in-trade. We had to isolate the incident, clearly identify the perpetrators, and get a true estimate of the extent of the danger they posed to the public. In that man's hands, media was not a means for the communication of ideas or the expression of feelings but a weapon of destabilization aimed at the institutions that protect the fundamental rights that give life to media and democracy. Had he gone on the air and falsely claimed that a large segment of the military itself had sprung him from imprisonment, the country would have been thrown into a panic. It would have been, indeed, like falsely shouting “Fire” in a crowded theater. As it was, for all the control we had achieved and the isolation we had succeeded in imposing upon him, the stock market was adversely affected.

With his right to speak and seek an audience, we have no quarrel. But we continue to reserve the right to punish those who allow themselves to be used as instruments of his evil purposes. This is a free country. You are free to say what you please, air what you want, but within the limits of the rights of others to their privacy and honor, of our democratic institutions to self-preservation.

There has been a complaint that the warning was ambiguous or too broad. Let me clarify it. My instructions to Commissioner Alcuaz are not to prevent any radio or TV interview from being aired, on the one hand, and not to give clearance for the airing of any interview, on the other. But all media are forewarned that there are consequences they must be prepared to face, including the cancellation of franchises if, in our opinion, they have overstepped the line of public safety.

My first duty is to protect the state, and, yes, to protect democracy, even from those who would abuse its highest guarantees in order to destroy it. We have been accused of fostering Freedom of the Press. Let me tell you, I haven’t the slightest interest in being praised by the press, for I take satisfaction only in doing what my conscience and my duty tell me is right. Our people and I have come this far by ourselves, building patiently and tirelessly from the “ruin we inherited. Sadly, we have had to see others destroy immediately what we had just built up.

I have neither time nor interest in praises from any but the people to whose progress, well-being, prosperity and enduring freedom alone I am dedicated.

I am pleased and honored to have been invited here to address this next generation of Ateneo lawyers. I spared you a lengthy and rhetorical speech and went straight instead to a pressing issue of law because that is how I hope you will apply yourselves in the practice of your profession. With unshakeable resolve to do quickly, unhesitatingly what is right, whatever the price. Only God and history in the long run know what is absolutely right. We are only human’ with only the single light of Christian conscience to guide us on the path of duty.

Congratulations on your graduation. God go with you and may success attend all your virtuous endeavors. Thank you.

Departure Message of President Corazon Aquino on Visiting China

Departure Message of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On Visiting China

[Released on April 13, 1988]

A REAFFIRMATION OF FRIENDSHIP

President Aquino states her reasons for visiting China.

I am leaving for a two day visit to the People's Republic of China. Aside from members of the Executive Branch, a representative each of the Senate and the House of Representatives will be accompanying me.

A state visit to the premier Asian power by the new leader of an Asian state explains and justifies itself. Face-to-face meetings of the highest leaders have been the most effective and ancient form of diplomacy, even when they involve democracies.

Leaders have visited one another to strike up new, or strengthen old friendships; to acquire a deeper understanding of each other's thinking and intentions; and to promote beneficial relations between their peoples. These meetings between heads of states set the tone of their relationships, or at least reflect what the two leaders hope will be the relations between their countries.

This search for understanding extends beyond the character of states, and their official attitudes and policies. The greatest benefit of such visits may well be the first-hand knowledge and understanding that each leader acquires of another. For in the last analysis, it is not historic trends or impersonal forces that shape events but peoples as represented by their leaders. Modern communications technology has not diminished in any way the irreplaceability and importance of these personal encounters.

Given its size and power, its destiny as the pivot of the most important developments in Asia, its racial affinity with the Filipino nation, and its territorial proximity to us, a visit to China indeed explains and justifies itself. Beyond such obvious considerations, there is the fact that China is a leading trade partner of the Philippines. During our visit, we expect to conclude a trade protocol setting targets in, and further diversifying our bilateral trade. We hope to conclude agreements for scientific and technological exchange, and to widen our cultural contacts with the Chinese people.

The visit will also give me the opportunity to sound out China's views on the geopolitical situation of our part of the world. And this seems the best time for it, for the National People's Congress has just ended its current session. The directions of China's political and economic policies have been further clarified. And a new president, Yang Shangkun has been elected. I shall be paying a call, the first by any head of state, on the new Chinese president, as well on other Chinese leaders.

The visit will provide an opportunity for a reaffirmation of friendship, a renewal of our mutual commitment to the principle of non-interference in each other's internal affairs, and a reaffirmation of a common resolve to settle and encourage the settlement of international disputes through law and reason, and in peace.

China too is eager for this visit. It was one of the first countries to invite me.

In sum, I visit China to enhance our national security, expand our trade, promote cultural and scientific exchanges, achieve a better understanding of this pivotal state and its leadership, and reaffirm the ancient ties of friendship between our two countries.

The prudence of this visit, at this time, after a recent incident, has been questioned. On the contrary, its cancellation would be the greatest folly. For our visit to China will show our great neighbor that we have at least achieved the internal political stability and maturity to play the responsible and important role that is expected of us in Asian Affairs

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on her official visit in Hong Jian Village

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On her official visit in Hong Jian Village

[Released on April 13, 1988]

A NECESSARY STOP

President Aquino retraces her steps and goes back to the land of her ancestors. Though her ancestral beginnings come from this land, the President belongs to the Philippines where she is the leader.

I came to China for reasons of state and for reasons personal to me, for I am both head of state of my country and, in a way, a daughter of this village. My first stop on this official visit to China has been here, at Hong Jian, the village where my family came from. The first steps in my own family's history, as well as in the histories of many Filipinos, were taken here in this village.

Da-thia too shuo, wo tse jee lu-xhing de moo-di, sherh fan-xiang she-te wo-way sherh wei-la wo-deh jia-ting, ye-sherh weila, shu-do wa huayi te Filiping-kung ming, teh huai-lien han, liao-jie ta-men-teh tse zien she tung yang yung chin-lao han chuang-shing de tching-zhen dao high-way kerh-kerh-di chu kai-chuang tah-men de shing sheng-huo.

The end of travelling, we are told, is to return. I have returned for my family, and for other Filipinos of Chinese descent, to retrace their steps and attain some understanding of the industry and creativity that lead them forth to new beginnings in other lands.

I am proud to discover that our ancient lines can still be traced, that certain valuable traditions and memorials of the family have lived on in the very place where they started from. But I am most happy that I am making these discoveries in a new country and a new village – a new China, and a new Hong Jian. Here are still the same kind of people, even the same families, with the same warmth and goodness, but free now of feudal injustices.

The end of my travelling is not here, of course, because, although my family came from this village many, many years ago, my home is the Philippines of which I am the leader. And I have so far still to take my countrymen to the “home” we wish to have — a country where peace and justice and progress reign.

Yet this has been a worthwhile and necessary stop in my travels. Being here, among the good people of Hong Jian, among my relatives has given me a deeper sense of my own history. More importantly, it has impressed upon me this truth: that, for all the many different countries that have sprung up in the world, all good people everywhere are the same. And wherever they establish themselves and make a community, there a visitor will feel as though returning to her home.

I wish to thank my “uncle” Mr. Xu Yuanxing for his warm welcome of his wandering relatives, and the people of Hong Jian for their hospitality. As is customary among Chinese and the Filipinos, a returning relative must bring presents. I have brought a few gifts to celebrate this homecoming.

Wo pen ren, wo de nu-er Pinky han Kris, hai yo wo deh tong shing manh, tsai ee tse, gan sye ni-manh, dway women leh liyeh deh chow tai, sherh women tsong shen lan wang. Siye-siye!

My daughters, Pinky and Kris, and I, and our companions once more thank you deeply for this memorable occasion.

Banquet Speech of President Corazon Aquino in Beijing

Banquet Speech of Her Excellency Corazon Aquino President of the Philippines In Beijing

[Delivered on April 15, 1988]

A TRULY INDEPENDENT CHINA

The affiliation of the Chinese and the Filipinos goes back to the times of our ancestors. Through the years, we have managed to keep the spirit of friendship burning and in this another milestone, the President expresses her hope that this may be another ace in the relationship.

We are honored and grateful for this invitation to visit the People's Republic of China, more so at such an auspicious time. It is indeed a privilege to be the first foreign head of government to visit China after the milestone First Session of the 7th National People's Congress, where China's new course is being set by her great people and wise leaders. I take this occasion also to congratulate the new President on his election.

My party and I have received a most warm welcome from the Chinese people. The hospitality we have enjoyed rightly symbolizes the cordiality and strong friendship that have long existed between our two peoples. As head of a new government of a country that is trying to remold itself in the image of justice and progress, it is fitting that we visit here at this juncture in China's history when a reaffirmation of its own vision of justice and progress is being made.

A strong, proud and truly independent China emerged from her great revolutionary struggle against oppression. National strength, pride and independence were also our goals when we made a revolution two years ago. The scale of China's struggle, given her circumstances, obviously far exceeds my people's own struggle for those same goals of genuine independence through national strength. But the elements of courage and persevering faith are the same for our two peoples.

So too have been the problems that beset our respective courses: a severely damaged economy and political system, and, in the midst of a national resolve to overcome seemingly insurmountable obstacles to material progress and social justice, the presence of recalcitrant elements that seek to return us to the injustices, the weakness, and the humiliations of the past. China is well on the road to that strength that will assure the permanence of its vision. We have only started. And we look to China to give us the moral support to achieve our own special aims, in our own unique way.

We look confidently to China for such encouragement because of the ancient ties between our two peoples. While colonialism and the Cold War had strained and severed those ties, yet the centuries of cultural exchange, trade relations and racial mixture must obliterate that tragic period from our hearts, more especially now that we have reaffirmed and broadened those ties by wider trade relations and diplomatic exchanges.

The new course of greater economic progress and political reforms that China and the Philippines have set themselves these recent years promises even greater harmony and more meaningful cooperation between them. This is especially true of our common efforts to achieve stability, peace and progress in the world. On many of the great issues of international politics and economics, China and the Philippines stand on common ground.

We seek true independence through national strength but in a world of mutual trust and assistance. And we hope that every nation, super or small, shall respect in others the same desire for national independence and security that it seeks for itself.

We seek justice in the economic relations of rich and poor countries and share the same faith that the progress of each nation need not be purchased with the impoverishment of others.

We accept that there will always be differences between nations, yet continue to hope and work that these divisions shall not be covered over by the rubble of war, or obliterated along with the human race in a nuclear war. We are impatient in our hope and oftentimes disappointed in our labors to achieve peace and understanding in the world, yet accept that the work must proceed slowly, in step with all other nations, for peace and understanding cannot be imposed. In the way of lasting friendships, it must grow from within each of us by the habit of mutual respect. In that regard, the Asia of today has shown the way.

There is the friendship among the ASEAN states, and the amicable relations of those states with the premier Asian state of China. Those relations are marked by the greatest mutual respect for each other's sovereignty, territorial integrity, and way of life, and by the determination, when differences arise on these matters, to resolve them always with justice and reason and unwavering commitment to keep the peace.

From this, in my country's particular regard, has flowed our One-China policy, recognizing the Government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government of China and denying itself any pretention to influence the final configuration of China's geographical identity. That policy is not only a counsel of respect, but an admission that no force external to China can influence the destiny of a people whose struggle for national liberation shook the world.

From this also has flowed the Chinese assurance that, for all of China's size and power, it will not interfere in the internal affairs of her neighbors. And from that resolve to do justice, to act with reason, and to keep the peace among us has come the commitment we share to encourage the same justice, reason and the ways of peace in the settlement of disputes in the rest of the world. And so we stand together in seeking an end to conflict and insecurity in Kampuchea, in Afghanistan, and in South Africa, even as we look with hope to the measures, recently adopted by the Soviet Union and the United States, to reduce the threat of world destruction by nuclear war.

In talks earlier in the day with the President, and in discussions with Premier Li Peng, we reviewed our bilateral relations and agreed to strengthen those relations in ways that will contribute significantly to the economic upliftment of our two peoples. For only upon the material foundation of their common progress can one hope to set their long-lasting friendship. Here, in Beijing, the center of the Chinese universe, from where the Lord of Ten Thousand Years maintained the equilibrium, prosperity and harmony of the realm, a start has been made in that direction by China and the Philippines.

I thank you again, on behalf of all Filipinos, for the noble reception and warm hospitality you have given their government and for the honor you have done to my country.

Tsu-shi, tsong-li, keh-wei, tong-tse ni-sheh-men wo ching ta tsiya sien-tsai tong wo chan-chi-lai (stand up), tsu fu di chi-chieh ren-tai-huway deh chung-kong, tsu-fu chong-kwoh ren-ming, tsi-shi-fa-iyang kwang ta tsu-fu ling taw chong kwoh, Jo-xiang xian-tai-hua deh wei-ta ling-shou-men kan tsu-fu women Chung-Fei liang-kwo yong-djo de yo-ee tsai women kong tang tsu-pay siye-siye keh huway! Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Bilateral Relations with China

of
Her Excellency Corazon Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Bilateral Relations with China

[Delivered in Beijing, April 15, 1988]

MUTUAL RESPECT FOR SOVEREIGNTY

The relationship of China and the Philippines is more than diplomatic. It goes back to centuries. President Aquino takes note of the various contributions China is extending to the Philippines and is grateful for all these. She invites China to come and visit the Philippines to further endure the friendship of the two countries.

First of all, may I express my gratitude and that of my party for the warm and generous hospitality which the Chinese government and people have extended to us. I wish to thank you and your government for your gracious invitation. It was one of the first to be received by the new democratic government of the Philippines. The gesture is deeply appreciated by me and the Filipino people.

I have, however, two regrets. The first is that the pressure of duties kept me from accepting your government's invitation until this time. Yet, it may all be for the best. For this is a good time to be here, in the Beijing spring; a time also of renewed political and economic vitality for the Chinese nation after the successful first session of the Seventh National People's Congress. I feel, of course, specially honored to be the first head of state to visit with you after your election as Premier of the State Council.

My second regret is that this visit has to be much too brief. Equally pressing duties again demand my early return to my country. But, in the brief period I shall be here, much will be accomplished.

Ancient ties Our ties are ancient, spanning culture, trade and race. Yesterday, we paid a brief visit and a heartfelt tribute to our common heritage in the village of my ancestors where so many other Filipinos trace their ancestry.

Our friendship is virtually an unbroken line going back centuries. It has been sustained by our respect for each other's sovereignty despite the proximity of our two countries, and by a mutual refusal to interfere in each other's internal affairs.

Non-support of insurgents/One China Policy This has been repeatedly shown by China's unbending rule not to offer any support whatsoever to groups seeking the overthrow of the Philippine Government, as well as by the Philippine's One China policy recognizing the People's Republic of China as the sole legitimate government of China. Our mutual respect for each other's sovereignty is further strengthened by a common commitment to the rule of reason and law in the settlement of international disputes. Certainly, with regard to possible conflicting claims on the part of our two countries over certain islands and reefs in the South China Sea, that respect and lawful regard have been consistently maintained.

Common positions Conflicts external to our ancient friendship kept us apart for a brief period. But in 1975 we reestablished diplomatic ties with China. This was well and good for our two nations have pivotal roles in maintaining the balance of power and the peace in East and Southeast Asia. China of course is Asia's greatest state, and one of the great nations of history and of the contemporary world. On many issues, China and the Philippines stand on common ground, especially on the issues of decolonization, racism, and nuclear disarmament.

*Trade Trade between our two countries has flourished and continues steadily to grow. One wishes, of course, that this growth shall keep in step with the expansion of our respective economies.

A more diversified and balanced trade between our two nations will make our diplomatic relations more meaningful and valuable to our two peoples.

*Oil In this respect, we hope that China would consider providing the Philippines once more with crude oil at friendship prices. This would be deeply appreciated, as it was in the past.

*Scientific & Cultural Exchanges Both Our peoples place a great value on learning, particularly scientific learning which is the key to modernization, power, and true sovereignty. We look forward to more exchanges of knowledge and technique between our countries. But the thirst for learning extends as well to each other's arts and culture. Exchanges in this area are already extensive. Still, one hopes there will be more of them.

*Release of Seamen Since 1978, the flow of visitors between our two countries has increased many times, proving, I believe a natural and unbreakable friendship. In this regard, I would like to express my appreciation for the act of compassion shown by your government towards the Filipino seamen who had been detained in Xiamen. I would hope the same compassion will be shown to the ship captain, who remains detained.

*Invitation to visit Philippines There have been also many official visits between our two countries. I hope this visit of mine will be reciprocated by your excellency's visit to my country, further underscoring the deep and enduring friendship of our two peoples. I thank you again for your hospitality.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the HB Trade Development Council

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the HB Trade Development Council

[Released on April 16, 1988]

SO SMALL YET SO RICH

The President candidly states that she expects to learn a lot from Hongkong's experience, the tiny area regarded as one of the most successful economies in the world. She invites the investors to come to the Philippines and judge for themselves what the country can offer in terms of business opportunities.

Some of the shrewdest and most successful businessmen in the world are here in Hong Kong. Hong Kong itself is widely regarded as one of the most successful economies in the world. As the leader of a country taking its first steps on the road to economic recovery, I expect to learn a lot from the experience of coming to Hong Kong and talking to its business leaders. I want to know how something so small, could become so rich and strong. Because Hong Kong is strong — strong enough to have its tiny voice listened to with respect in the determination of the future of all China. How could something so small make such a difference?

Not too long ago, Hong Kong was written off. Only to be written back again as one of the world's most promising areas of growth. This write-off/write-on phenomenon recurs with the regularity of a ritual. I know Filipinos and Filipino companies that sold out their real estate holdings here during one of the "scares" about Hong Kong's future. They must be banging their heads against the wall now.

Not too long ago, the Philippines was the darling of international opinion. This was immediately after the Four Day Revolution. It was widely said that thenceforth everything would go well for us. About a month later, a negative image of the Philippines began to take shape in newspapers and television screens throughout the world.

The image was that of a country whose newly-born freedom and constitutionalism served merely as shield for anarchy and violence, and a standing excuse for impotence. It was that of a government committed to civil peace, and therefore foredoomed to ceaseless turmoil and defeat. The image was also that of a government run by a woman and therefore weak and indecisive, and certain to fall before the importunities of military adventurers and canny politicians. That image has scarcely been revised, despite the following developments:

On October 20 last year, I lowered the boom on a too-exuberant labor movement whose extreme militancy was shrinking the very pie of which it kept demanding a greater share. I made clear my resolve to enforce the letter of the labor laws which, for your information, protect both management and labor. Cases of illegal strikes, illegal barricades and open defiance of return-to-work orders drop to almost zero.

From a high figure of 147 work stoppages during the first quarter of 1987, the figure dropped drastically to only 44 — a decrease of 70 percent.

I felt that the nation had had enough of exuberance and it was time for work. My honeymoon with the media was over, so why should everyone's holiday from a sense of responsibility to the nation not likewise be terminated?

But we are not a strike-free country. I hope we never become one. The only countries that are strike-free are those that are candidates for violent social revolutions. We prefer long-term stability purchased with occasional turmoil, to the slow, silent buildup of a head of steam that will one day burst all valves of social and political control.

The return of democracy and an initial offer to negotiate an end to the insurgency seemed to have been interpreted by the insurgent leadership as an admission of weakness and a preparation for political surrender. We swiftly corrected this misimpression by a combination of military offensives and police operations, the latest of which bagged the top Communist leadership.

The extreme right in the military began to believe its own lies about the weakness of this housewife's government. Last August, it launched its boldest and bloodiest attempt to seize the government. The attempt certainly blackened the Philippine image further, but the outcome definitively established the permanence of democracy, and of my government — only for the duration of my term, of course.

Where there's smoke, there's fire. I admit that. Certain initiatives have failed, others were choked in the red tape and narrow self-interest we are trying to prune away. But what I am saying is that there's been altogether too much smoke for the small fires that I have put out. There are some large burning issues admittedly, but there have been adequate and sincere attempts to address them.

And there are things we have outright achieved, such as everything the nation set out to do when it mobilized to expel the dictatorship. We elected and seated a duly elected President. We restored integrity and independence to the courts, and, by electing a Congress, reestablished the threefold separation of powers that is the sheet anchor of democracy.

We restored the Armed Forces to the trust and respect of the people by reorienting it to its proper role — that of fighting and winning the wars of the Republic, no more, no less; leaving policymaking where it rightfully belongs — to the elected leadership of the nation.

Simultaneously, we laid down the framework for the reconstruction and progress of our pillaged economy. I speak carefully of the “framework” of reconstruction and progress, not of a detailed scheme of business. For a detailed economic program that entails the unilateral direction and pervasive presence of government in the private sector has worked out, in our sad experience, like the written instructions of a gunman to a bank teller.

These developments may be discerned in the country's growing mood of confidence and in certain economic indicators. 1986, for example, arrested a two-year decline in GNP and posted a growth of 1.5 percent. In 1987, GNP growth was 5.6 percent. Much of this growth was generated by the industrial sector which grew by 8.2 percent in 1987, largely as a result of Government's unwavering resolve to privatize the economy the dictatorship had virtually usurped. I announced that everything would go on the auction block, in open and transparent biddings that should forestall any doubt about the integrity of the proceedings. In our own way, we are trying to replicate the lesson of Hong Kong: Government should be nowhere in business.

Despite certain externalities and an economy still healing, we maintained the stability of the peso and held down inflation to 3.8 percent last year. Three years ago, inflation was galloping at 40 to 50 percent.

After two consecutive years of decline, investments last year reached US$420 million, the highest level registered by our Board of Investments in 20 years.

In short, inspite of the negative image we have had, we have achieved a great deal. There is a growing sense that the country is finally on the move, as there is increasing impatience with those fitful attempts you read about here to derail it

Like Hong Kong, we have been written off time and again. The mistake is to believe it, and to be left out of what one might reasonably expect will be the next miracle in Asia.

But even before the miracle, there are enough opportunities worth exploring. Consider, for example, that next year Hong Kong can no longer avail of duty free treatment under the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences. The Philippines will continue to enjoy this advantage and therefore offers the opportunity to manufacture GSP-eligible items in the Philippines for export to the U.S. market.

I will not presume to give this audience specific investment advice. That's your forte. I invite you to come to the Philippines and see for yourselves whether on the whole the confidence in the country that I have tried to impart to you has a reasonable basis. I invite you to see and judge for yourselves whether or not I am right in asserting that there is a great future in the Philippines of which you can be a part. Thank you for this opportunity to talk to you.

Address of President Corazon Aquino to the Filipinas working in Hong Kong

To the Filipinas working in Hong Kong

[Released on April 17, 1988]

A TRIBUTE TO HARDWORK AND SACRIFICE

President Aquino addresses the Filipinas working in Hong Kong — the nation's living manifestation of hardwork and sacrifice. The President urges the Filipinas to continue the good work they're doing which garners honor for the country. She also tells the women not to forget their culture and promises that the Philippines will be worth their sacrifice.

Mga minamahal kong kababayan, isang malaking kasiyahan sa akin ang makasama kayo sa araw na ito – kayo na kinikilala kong bayani ng ekonomiya ng ating bansa.

Kayo na mga manggagawang Pilipino sa ibang bansa na nagtiis ng lungkot at nagsakripisyo na malayo sa inyong mga mahal sa buhay ang siyang tumulong ng malaki upang buhayin at ibangon ang ating bansa noong tayo ay nasa ilalim pa ng diktador. Sa ngayon, ang sakripisyong ito ay patuloy pa rin sa pagtatayo muli ng ating bansa.

Tulad ng marami sa inyo, ako rin po ay isang maybahay at isang ina, at alam ko rin na mas nais ninyo, kung maari lamang, na lagi sana kayo sa tabi ng inyong pamilya. Alam ko rin, at naranasan ko, ang sakit ng mawalay sa sariling bayan.

2.5 million Filipinos are unemployed. Had you not taken the hard decision to leave our homeland, you could have been a part of that statistic.

Napakadali ang magsalita at magmagaling tungkol sa dangal, kapurihan, karangalan ng ating bansa, subalit ang katotohanan ay dapat nating harapin na kailangan nating mabuhay sa paraan na kaya natin.

Bilang inyong Pangulo, hayaan ninyong sabihin kong muli sa inyo: nasa inyo ang lahat ng dahilan upang taas-noo ninyong ipagmalaki ang inyong gawain. Ano man ang inyong gawain, gaano man ito kahamak sa paningin ng iba, tandaan lamang ninyo na dakila ang lahat ng hanapbuhay. Tandaan din ninyo na hindi lamang ang inyong mga kabiyak, mga anak at mga kamag-anak ang magpapasalamat sa sakripisyo na inyong dinaranas, kundi ang buong sambayanang Pilipino.

Kayo ay makasisiguro na ang inyong pamahalaan ay ga-gawin ang lahat para sa inyong ikabubuti. Ito ang dahilan kung bakit natin pansamantalang itinigil ang pagpapadala ng mga domestic helpers sa ibang bansa — ito ay para pag-aralan ang mga hakbang na makabubuti at mangangalaga sa inyo. Nais kong ipaalam sa inyo na ang pagbabawal sa pagpapalabas ng mga domestic helpers sa Hongkong ay ibinaba na, gayundin sa Canada, matapos ng maayos na pakikipag-usap sa mga labor officials ng dalawang bansa. Marahil iba sa inyo, tulad ng iba sa ating mga kababayan, ay hindi sang-ayon sa desisyon ng pagtigil ng pagpapadala ng domestic helpers sa ibang bansa. Subalit tungkulin ko ang pangalagaan ang bawa't Pilipino.

Sa inyo, isang bagay lamang ang aking hinihiling: gawin ninyo ng buong husay at katapatan ang inyong gawain. Ang kahusayan at kasipagan ng mga Pilipino ay kinikilala sa buong mundo – panindigan ninyo itong reputasyon.

Habang malayo kayo sa inyong bayan, sana'y huwag ninyong kalimutan ang ating mga magagandang kaugalian at tradisyong Pilipino.

Ipinangangako ko sa inyong lahat ang isang Pilipinas na mapagmamalaki ninyo.

Maraming salamat

Arrival Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the results of her visit in China

Arrival Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the results of her visit in China

[Released on April 17, 1988]

A DEEPER MUTUAL UNDERSTANDING

President Aquino reports on the results of her visit of China. The visit netted an agreement and a protocol whereby China and the Philippines undertake to increase trade between them this year from 293 million dollars to $450 million.

I am happy to be home. I see that things were handled well while I was away. No one can say now that political stability in the Philippines is a daily battle that must be waged by the President herself. In Hong Kong, the headline about the capture of Honasan's guards underscored my message that the conditions for Philippine progress are nearly all in place.

Materially, the visit netted us an agreement and a protocol whereby China and the Philippines undertake to increase trade between them this year from $293 million to $450 million – and over 5 years to $600 to $800 million. In addition, China has promised to help us achieve a true balance of trade with the Philippines.

In return for my modest gift of some playthings (donated by some businessmen) for the school yard in Hong Jian, China donated $3 million of rice, to help us make up for the drop in production as a result of the drought.

On the intangible but far from unimportant side, a truer and deeper mutual understanding has been achieved by the leaders of China and the Philippines, and with that understanding has come, apparently, an appreciation on China's part for what we are trying to achieve here.

Deng Xiaoping expressed the support of the Chinese Communist Party for our government and our aims to achieve economic progress.

I was heartened to note that we share the same conviction that peace within our respective countries, and harmony with our neighbors are essential conditions for the economic development and material upliftment we seek for our peoples.

With this deep understanding should come more meaningful cooperation between China and the Philippines.

I think we have done our country proud during this trip, more particularly the Filipino people who have shown once and for all, that freedom and stability are not weak and fragile achievements but the permanent condition in the Philippines.

It is good indeed to be home again.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to Chief Justice Claudio Teehankee

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To Chief Justice Claudio Teehankee

[Released on April 21, 1988]

A SELF MADE MAN

President Aquino pays tribute and offers a toast to Chief Justice Teehankee as one of the few justices who has managed to keep his integrity and dignity intact amidst these confusing moments.

I feel a certain political affinity with Justice Teehankee. For in a sense, both of us created our offices. He was there with me at the restoration of Philippine democracy, administering to me the President's oath of office, in the glare of the kleig lights and bursting flashbulbs. Had things turned out differently, the occasion would have been the most photographed and documented act of rebellion in history.

Both the dictator and I took our oaths of office on the same day, yet mine stuck while the dictator's just peeled off. The future was with me. Yet even at that moment, I and many others felt that my oath was the real one. The dictator's was just a sham. We felt this because the man before me on that historic morning, robed in black, stood for all that was still honorable and true in the State.

In qualifying me to the power and authority of the Presidency, Justice Teehankee, of course, created the power and authority that would appoint him Chief Justice of the Philippines. He is what you call a self-made man.

By being there, at grave risk to his life, and certainly at the price of ending his judicial career, Justice Teehankee did one thing even more important. He demonstrated by historic fact, and not just by constitutional logic, that the Supreme Court should be an independent and co-equal branch of government. By this signal act of courage, by his indispensable role at the creation, the Supreme Court can truly say that its independence, honor and co-equality are not gifts but the hard-won triumph of its most illustrious son.

By a clever maneuver, Chief Justice Marshall established the principle of judicial review. By a greater act of courage, Chief Justice Teehankee reestablished the Supreme Court upon a footing of equality with the two other branches of government, and in the highest esteem of the Filipino people.

Ladies and gentlemen, fellow Filipinos, join me now in a toast: To Chief Justice Claudio Teehankee — for want of a greater word, a Filipino patriot.

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 21st Annual Meeting of ADB

[Released on April 28, 1988]

BANKER TO HALF THE WORLD

The President lauds the Bank's mission of helping a nation achieve a sustainable level of progress by whatever reasonable means regardless of political ideology a sovereign nation has adopted. She stresses that ADB has been extremely generous in its support to the Philippines.

The last time I stood before you, I spoke of faith, of the faith that gave us the courage to stand our ground, and of the freedom that courage enabled us to achieve. I spoke of the new and promising directions that our newly won freedom would allow us to take.

I spoke of Providence. For it seemed, so soon after the February Revolution, that only the hand of Providence could have snatched my country from the worst oppression and set it safely down in freedom. Indeed, it seemed not inappropriate then to talk only about my country before this international forum, for what had just happened had attracted the deepest sympathy and attention of the world.

But that time has passed. What we have since done with our newly won freedom and the opportunities it created is a matter of record. We have had gains, I will insist on that, but on balance they have been modest. So much more remains to be done.

I spoke of miracles then.

Miracles are still needed, but one hesitates to speak of miracles now. The last miracle was when God put back into the hands of the Filipino people the fate of the Filipino nation. The next miracles must be the work of those hands.

It is a happy accident that my country has been the site of the headquarters of the Asian Development Bank. But this fortuitous honor does not diminish the pan-Asian character of this great institution. That character is as evident in its aim, which is the material upliftment of all Asian countries to the levels achieved by their most developed partners, as in the Asian style that increasingly marks its work.

Speaking from the Philippine experience, the ADB has been extremely generous in its support. Allow me again this opportunity to intrude a purely national matter by thanking the Asian Development Bank for the generous support it has given the Philippines, and for the profound understanding and sympathy it has shown for the country's particular plight. I am a little embarrassed to say this, but, while we certainly need more help than you have offered, there was a time when you offered more help than we were prepared to handle. Yet, in the distinctive way of the ADB, you offered to help us improve our capability to fully utilize the support that the Bank would like to give the Philippine economic recovery effort.

This is distinctively Asian and it has worked. It has made us a very satisfied client of the Bank, as it has made many other satisfied clients.

That satisfaction is derived from the manner in which the Bank has extended assistance to the developing countries of Asia. This assistance is usually extended with a modest assessment by the Bank of its prescriptive capabilities regarding the problems of developing nations.

This modesty is Asian; but the wisdom it reflects is universal.

This modesty, again, is articulated in the preferred manner of ADB decision-making, which is by consensus rather than confrontation. For every hand is needed in the enormous tasks before it. No one presumes he can force through a successful solution simply by the strength of the blind conviction that he is right.

We see this modesty again in the Bank's view of its role as essentially a bundle of responsibilities towards its constituents. The Bank does not see its mission as one of vindicating a particular economic philosophy regardless of the political cost, but one of helping a nation achieve a sustainable level of progress by whatever reasonably acceptable means lie at hand, regardless of the political ideology a sovereign nation has adopted.

For policy deliberations on structural reform and short-run stabilization can no longer ignore the socio-political consequences of these prescriptions on the target nations. I know that politics cannot be measured and can find no place in the parsimony of economic models. But politics is real, and, at the risk of irrelevance and surprise, it must be accommodated, at least by a substantial flexibility, in policy dialogues with the developing nations.

This is the Asian way, the ADB way. And the success of the Bank argues strongly for its universal imitation.

Among the developed countries there is a growing sense of crisis, a vague but deeply felt conviction that something is terribly wrong with the way things have been run. There is a sense of a terrifying complexity beyond the power of man to understand and control.

In sharp contrast, the newly developed countries of Asia achieved a measure of coherence and progress through policies that violated the conventional wisdom at the time. Perhaps it is time for those of us who once aspired to follow in the footsteps of the developed world to come upon our own age of reason.

Bigness and complexity, and the tremendous power they generate, demand collective leadership and extensive consultation. Increasingly, this is the nature of the ADB organization – banker to half the world, and the issues of net resource transfer and poverty alleviation confronting it. The dominant culture must allow, even promote, wider consultation among its member-clients. It must encourage the formulation of appropriate conditionalities. It must continue to have patience in its endeavors. It must continue to view banking, especially development banking, as a relationship rather than a transaction (as wind upon wanting sails rather than a yoke upon the buffalo). It must, in short, continue to be Asian in the way of its leadership and must look from within Asia to the rest of the world.

A Chinese philosopher described a good leader as one who talks little. When his work is done, his task fulfilled, the people say, "We did this ourselves." As a result, the accomplishments endure; the people continue to build on it. Therein lies the best prospect of the greater success of the Bank and the progress of the countries it serves.

I wish you every success on your 21st annual meeting. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Labor Day

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On Labor Day

[Delivered in Diliman, May 1, 1988]

FREEDOM AND EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY

Addressing the country's powerful labor force, President Aquino points out that the unemployment problem is staggering; that labor-intensive techniques and an emergency employment program have barely made a dent on the problem. She directs DOLE to monitor the different agencies engaged in various employment programs.

She announces price rollbacks of petroleum products emphasizing that she is doing this to reduce the cost of living and not to create windfall profits for business.

There is a widespread notion that Labor Day is the one day of the year when Government pays attention to labor. It is regarded as the day of the laborers, as opposed to the 364 days of the capitalists and managers. That was true under the dictatorship; it is not true in this democracy. For me, every day is labor day, because it is the daily labor of the workman that sustains our economy and society, and brings us closer to the national strength and prosperity we seek.

On this day, the nation pays tribute to the power that daily propels our economy, the force without which we can never rebuild from the economic destruction of the past to the progressive economy and equitable society we have promised to all our people.

It is also the day when we reaffirm the overriding labor policy of our government, and for that matter of any real democracy. That policy seeks to achieve for the Filipino workingman the greatest freedom and equality of opportunity possible. It does not seek to cradle labor in a state of dependency on the state, but to encourage its development to the greatest independence, self-reliance and well-being. That policy explicitly recognizes that the workingman is not just the means of development. The improvement of his well-being is the end of development itself.

The means to this end is the generation of well-paid and sustainable employment. Those with the means to adequately support themselves and their families, have the means to assert their freedom and their dignity.

This aim requires the partnership of labor and management in sincere efforts to get the economy moving. It also requires time – time in which the basic needs of labor, that is to say, of the vast majority of our people, must be attended to. This is where the state comes in – to fill the gap between the prosperity we aim for, and the present condition of labor that only a vibrant economy can overcome.

In the meantime, Government must fill the gap between basic needs today and the hoped-for progress of our economy.

I see this gap being filled by well-thought out policies rather than by dramatic ad hoc pronouncements designed to catch headlines; by the provision of social services to meet labor's essential requirements for health, housing and education; and by the building of infrastructure to make labor more productive and better paying.

The gap is wide; the needs to be met are many; the unemployment problem is staggering. Despite the sincere attempts to at least control the problem, such as the government's preference for labor-intensive techniques and an emergency employment program, we have barely made a dent on the problem. The unemployment rate dropped from 11.8 percent to 11.3, and dropped further to 9.2 as of January 1988.

I again called the attention of the Department of Public Works and Highways and the other infrastructure agencies to the role they are expected to play in soaking up some of the unemployment by emphasizing labor-intensive methods in its infrastructure program.

I hereby direct the Department of Labor to monitor the various employment programs and, with DTI and NEDA render periodic reports to the Cabinet.

It seems also that our youth are not being given the right education for the jobs that are or will be available. There is an urgent need to trim the irrelevance from our elementary and high school curricula and to put all the emphasis on the core subjects – literacy, math, and science – that have been responsible for the remarkable productivity and inventiveness of Japanese, Korean and Taiwanese labor. I expect the Department of Education and Culture to come up with immediate proposals in this direction.

Likewise, the National Manpower and Youth Councils should have all three regional training centers in Cagayan de Oro, Tacloban and Zamboanga operational by the end of the year.

And of course we have to assure that our population growth does not outstrip our other resources and annul what gains we make every year.

The Population Commission assures me that its program will be ready in six months.

These and other measures look to the long term, but there are basic needs that must be met now.

Last year, I said that I don't need Labor Day to remind me of the needs of the working people, that I would give a wage increase regardless of the time, if conditions permitted it. Last December, I signed into law Republic Act 6640 increasing the minimum wages for non-agricultural workers inside Metro Manila and outside Metro Manila by P10.00 and P11.00 a day.

Organized labor has asked for a further increase to mark this day. It is ill-advised at the moment. Wage increases are not the only means to improve workers' incomes, which can also be achieved by reducing the prices of commodities, and increasing social services. I recommended to the Energy Regulatory Board the reduction of the prices of petroleum products, if possible and warranted to pre-August 1987 levels, to stimulate economic activity and, more importantly, reduce the cost of living.

The ERB has acted favorably on my recommendation and has ordered price rollbacks of petroleum products as follows:

A fifty centavo rollback for Premium gasoline to P7.00 per liter.

A fifty centavo rollback for Regular gasoline to P6.65 per liter.

A twenty-five centavo rollback for diesel to P5.00 per liter. And a thirty centavo rollback for kerosene to P5.00 per liter.

These will take effect on May 3.

These rollbacks, as I said, are intended to reduce the cost of living. Of course, they may not. Business establishments may not reduce their prices correspondingly. Still, we can hope and pray – and we can tax. I am not reducing petroleum prices to create windfall profits for business. I am doing it for the people, even at this time, in the midst of roller coasting, volatile crude oil prices. This week, members and non-members of OPEC are meeting to adjust crude prices upwards. Our Oil Price Stabilization Fund, which is meant to buffer the country against a sudden oil price increase, is still in the negative by P500 million as of March 31, 1988. But the people need some relief. I cannot promise it can last. But I have said that whenever an opportunity presents itself, I will seize it to make life better for all our people.

I have also directed the NPC and the NEA to impose a ceiling of P2.50 per kilowatt hour throughout the country.

And I have asked the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of Finance to look into additional tax and other incentives to enterprises that adopt production gain-sharing schemes similar to that provided in the CARP Executive Order.

Government is providing technical and financial assistance, including training in self-employment and specific skills, to help augment incomes. I commend the worker's organizations that have gone into such projects and appeal to others to do likewise.

Government has increased expenditures for public health and nutrition from P3.6 billion to P4.95 billion. Education and manpower development increased from P15 billion to P18 billion. Starting June this year, free secondary education will be available. This is an investment in the future.

Another example of which is the Centre we inaugurate today for the safety and protection of workers against the dangers posed by working conditions. Suffering is not a necessary cost of industrialization.

Housing is both one of our highest social concerns and one of the best means of stimulating further economic activity through the multiplier effect of construction.

To that end, we have increased total funding for economic housing to P4.4 billion in 1988 for 32,800 housing units. We are aiming for 40,600 units.

Effective May 1, the interest rate on new NHA mortgages will be 9 percent, down from the present 12 to 14 percent. This should reduce monthly amortizations by 25 percent for the new beneficiaries.

Starting May 16, the Home Development Mutual Fund will make P500 million available for appliance and furniture loans to its members.

I take this occasion to remind our social security institutions, the SSS and the GSIS, of the singularly social purpose of both bodies. The reasons for their existence first and last is to help the common people who are their members.

The SSS is particularly well-placed to help finance housing. We commend its long-standing policy of fiscal prudence but it must be satisfied with the minimum actuarial rate of return plus a fair margin of safety. Over and above that, its resources should be devoted to its social aim through liberal terms for housing, education, salary and other loans and benefits. The interest it charges must reflect this social purpose.

While I have expressed that the freedom, autonomy, and well-being of the worker in a progressive economy, is the aim of our labor policy, we have paid equal attention to strengthen the legal protection of labor.

I have resisted all proposals for a strike ban on a national or even area-specific basis. As I told the Hong Kong businessmen, we are not and never will be, while we are a democracy, a strike free country. A strike-free country is asking for a revolution.

I am heartened to note the response of my earlier appeals to both labor and management to cooperate with each other more, so we can get this economy back in shape faster. Relative industrial peace was achieved by the end of 1987.

In the area of government unionism, I directed the heads of all government agencies and corporations not to discourage their employees from organizing and to respect their rights to organize. In June last year, I issued Executive Order 180 to accelerate unionism in government.

A comprehensive review of labor legislation has been undertaken by the Tripartite Review Committee. I have certified to the Senate the draft bill amending portions of the Labor Code. I have asked the Committee to continue wages and incomes, and to report its conclusions to me as soon as possible.

I was here last year at the ground-breaking of this Centre, which is a gift of the people and government of Japan to Philippine labor. Japan has proved to be one of the most sympathetic and dependable friends of the Philippines in this critical stage of its economic recovery. I would like to thank the people of Japan on behalf of all Filipinos for their generous assistance.

It is good to have friends, especially friends like the Japanese. But the main burden of recovery will be borne by the Filipino people alone. We have a huge debt to service and pay; tremendous mistakes to rectify; and a long road still to be travelled to the security and well-being we desire.

Ako po ay umaasa na ang lahat ng sektor ng ating lipunan – namumuhunan at manggagawa, pamahalaan at mamamayan – ay magpapatuloy na magtutulongan at magkakaisa tulad ng ating ginagawa mula pa ng EDSA.

Napakarami pa ang kinakailangan nating gawin, kaya hindi natin dapat aksayahin ang ating panahon sa ibat-ibang magkakatanggaling direksyon.

Malaki ang aking paniwala na magiging mas matibay ang ating pagkakaisa kung matanto natin na iisa lamang ang maaari nating ituring na tahanan – maging namumuhunan o manggagawa – at ito ay ang ating bayang minamahal.

Tulad ng aking panimulang salita, bawat araw ay araw ng manggagawa sapagka't ang ating hinahangad na kasaganaan ay makakamtan lamang sa pamamagitan ng walang humpay na pagbubuhos ng lakas at paninindigan ng lahat ng manggagawa.

Maraming salamat po at magandang umaga sa inyong lahat.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 52nd Anniversary of the Philippine Air Force

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 52nd Anniversary of the Philippine Air Force

[Released on May 2, 1988]

COURAGE AND LOYALTY

On the 52nd anniversary of the Philippine Air Force, the President recalls how in February 1986, the air force did the extraordinary by heeding the call of the country and people against the insistent orders of a corrupt and illegitimate government to destroy them. She orders the decentralization of the armed forces by abolishing the Regional Unified Commands. She intones that adequate resources should be available whenever the need for them is most pressing. She lauds the PAF's eagerness to fight for honor, duty and country.

Today marks the 52nd anniversary of Lt. William L. Lee's test flight on the first aircraft to bear the insignia of the air arm of the Philippine Armed Forces. This was the birth of the Philippine Air Force. The plane was a basic trainer, a rudimentary aircraft. The event was symbolic because, in its subsequent history, the Philippine Air Force would always be short on equipment, but long on courage and loyalty.

When the Japanese Air Force struck in 1941, the first thing the PAF pilots and cadets reached for were – not planes but rifles. Kulanganamansamakina, ngunitsobrasakatapangan. Nevertheless, the PAF got six planes off the ground and went into hot pursuit of the enemy that outnumbered them 3 to 1. In this hopeless dogfight, one of our pilots, Lt. Gozar, got his machinegun jammed. As usual, defective equipment. In that situation, the ordinary fighter pilot just heads back for home. Not the Filipino. Instead Lt. Gozar tried to ram a Japanese fighter with his plane. The Japanese, who belonged to the bravest breed of warrior in the history, fled from the scene of combat. Probably not out of fear, but surprise.

Two days later, another Philippine hero, Lt. Cesar Basa, although low on fuel, joined a dogfight on the way back from a reconnaissance mission. He had no duty to be there, but then the Filipino airman has often performed over and above the call of duty and the adequacy of logistics.

In February, 1986, the air force did the extraordinary again by heeding the call of country and people against the insistent orders of a corrupt and illegitimate government to destroy them. In the succeeding two years, the Air Force, resisted the call of a misguided camaraderie and stood by its historic decision to stand by the people and democracy. In that time of deep uncertainty and confusion of loyalties, I was at least certain that our forces on the ground would always be safe from any threats from above.

This brief history of the Philippine Air Force shows its basic belief that what a soldier needs and must always have to get his job done, are courage and loyalty. Superior equipment has sometimes decided the outcome of a battle, but only the courage and loyalty to commit will decide whether the battle will take place at all.

“Making do” has always distinguished the PAF, coming into a fight on a wing and a prayer has often been its lot, but the country can always depend on the Air Force to give everything it's got in the wars the country calls them out to fight

It is time to arm that courage and skill with equipment and firepower that will do them justice. In last year's State of the Nation Message I asked the Congress whether it is fair to expect men to fight without giving them the means to do it well I underlined the essential unfairness of sending our boys to battle without providing the Medevac to get the wounded out to safety. The budget that was submitted by the Department of Defense, I was assured, incorporated these concerns. In reviewing the Defense Budget for the next year, I shall look very closely to see how well the higher defense budget has been utilized to improve the condition and fighting capability of our soldiers, and shall take into serious consideration what else may be needed.

With regard to the utilization of resources, I ordered the decentralization of the Armed Forces by abolishing the Regional Unified Commands. It is my hope that adequate resources will always be available wherever the need for them is most pressing. I want the generals to make their presence felt among the troops who are fighting. I don't want any bottlenecks in the bureaucracy. The age of pencil pushing and paper filing in the AFP is over. The premium now is on combat. Recognition and rewards will be given strictly on that basis.

The new spirit of the AFP expressed by me at the PMA and on AFP day has already achieved notable successes. The capture of the top leadership of the Communist insurgency is one. The complete neutralization of the rebels in the military is another.

That spirit should be familiar to the Philippine Air Force because it is the unbroken thread that runs along its entire history: the eagerness to fight for honor, duty and country.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 35th National Convention of the Rural Bankers Association of the Philippines

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the 35th National Convention of the Rural Bankers Association of the Philippines

[Delivered in Iloilo City, May 5, 1988]

THE RURAL BANKS: UP AND ALIVE

Very noticeable during the past year was the improved profitability of the rural banks. President Aquino notes this is another healthy indicator of recovery in the Rural Banking System, which is closely tied to the emerging effects of our government program of financial reforms. The President also outlines important measures which will serve as strategic interventions and innovations in the financial sector during the transition process.

First, let me congratulate you for holding your national convention near the countryside, in the fair and progressive City of Iloilo. Rural banks, by definition, know the rural areas. It is thus fitting that your annual gathering is held outside Metropolitan Manila and closer to the rural community served by your members. This reinforces your convention theme: “Rural Banks: Catalysts of Agricultural Productivity and Countryside Development.” The city and province of Iloilo, and in fact the entire island of Panay, are models of rural entrepreneurship and agricultural productivity that we can all be proud of. I am told that Iloilo and Panay Island have become one of the most productive agricultural areas of our country, particularly in the production of rice and in aquaculture which is now earning a substantial proportion of our foreign exchange. I therefore commend the people of Panay and Iloilo, and your leaders and officials. You are setting an example worthy of emulation for the entire country in rural and agricultural development.

I am pleased to be with you again. Last year, when you honored me as your guest at your 34th National Convention in Manila, I pledged to keep a close watch on the rural banks. I have been observing the developments in rural banking over the past year with great interest. In the past year, the growth in capital base, total assets and particularly loan portfolio of the rural banks has been faster than that of most other types of banks. The acceleration in the lending activities of the rural banks is all the more remarkable, at a time when the number of operating rural banks decreased. The financial reports of the rural banks also show that the past year has improved in profitability. These developments are in sharp contrast to the trends for the rural banks up until 1986. At that time the performance of the rural banks was less impressive than that of the other types of banks. The relatively greater growth in rural bank lending and profitability in the recent period therefore is another healthy indicator of recovery in the rural banking system which, I believe, is closely tied to the emerging effects of our government’s program of financial reforms, in combination with increasing productive activities in our rural and agricultural sector.

While encouraged by the improving performance of the rural banks over the past year, more still needs to be done to accelerate development in our rural and agricultural sector along with the rural financial system. I note that as many as 500 rural banks have applied to participate in the rehabilitation program for rural banks now being implemented by the Central Bank of the Philippines. These applicants include many of the 350 or so banks that had been classified as being in poor financial health. The fact that only about one-half have been approved, raises concern about the slow processing of the applications. Undue delay in the rehabilitation program, I am afraid, may lead to more failures among the rural banks than desirable. I therefore strongly encourage the Central Bank and the Rural Bankers Association to work, independently or together, to implement measures to streamline and speed up the processing of applications for participation in the rehabilitation program.

I understand that there have been comments made describing the rehabilitation program as being overly restrictive and having conditions difficult to comply with. I believe that the program is more accurately described as selective, in that the only rural banks which will be able to participate are those with reasonable prospects for viability, independent of continuing subsidies. A program which is easily entered into and whose conditions are easily fulfilled is probably not a rehabilitation program at all, since the fundamental reasons for non-viability would not have been faced squarely and dealt with.

However, given the government's objective of implementing a rehabilitation program that is selective and long-lasting, there have already been at least three stages wherein the selectivity of the program has been liberalized: first, as a result of the dialogues and discussions between your RBAP officers and the Rural Bank Review and Rationalization Committee and the Central Bank; second, in the issuance of CB Circular 1158 which amended CB Circular 1143, the original circular on the rehabilitation program; and finally, in late March this year, in issuing CB Circular 1172, the Central Bank further liberalized the program in response to your recommendations and the intercession of the Congressional Committee on Banks and Financial Institutions chaired by Representative Isidro Real of Zamboanga.

The liberalizing changes that have been introduced into the rehabilitation process underlines our understanding that the rehabilitation of rural banks is a dynamic process. It is also an effort that focuses not only on the rural banks but involves the entire rural financial market, and all the economic agents in the rural sector as well. It is clear that the rehabilitation program for the rural banks will be an exercise in futility if the rural economy is not also revitalized. We have already learned from painful and costly experience that credit programs are wasted when borrower's capacity to repay are not enhanced by support for production. Thus credit programs have to be preceded and complemented by savings mobilization, investment into physical and social infrastructure, and improvements in agricultural productivity and rural enterprises.

It is this vision of a dynamic and complex rural economy that leads us to view the development of the countryside and of our entire nation as the task of creating an atmosphere within which the private sector can freely respond to productive opportunities with a minimum of intervention by the government. The responsibility of government in this context is to be supportive of the efforts of the private sector. The government must thus focus its limited resources on providing the goods and services which the private sector cannot; public goods like roads, bridges, ports, irrigation, research, information, electrification, price stabilization and extension. At the same time the government must act as the custodian of public welfare, by promoting social justice and equity, safeguarding food security and health, and maintaining peace and order.

In short, both the government and the private sector have roles to play in rural development. These roles are equally important and critical. The partnership is necessary, but neither is self-sufficient. Both have to be present, and one without the other will not be adequate for the task. Thus the banks must mobilize savings and provide loans, and the government must act to ensure that savings are indeed available and that borrowers develop credit worthiness.

I realize that the task of accelerating development is a long, drawn-out process, and that our nation is still at the beginning stages of the journey. Along this road, the government must also implement certain measures which serve as strategic interventions and innovations which will help bridge any gaps in the transition process. In the financial sector our government has already undertaken a number of measures, including:

1. The enlargement of the guarantee capacity and operations of the Quedan Guarantee Fund Board, the Guarantee Fund for Small and Medium Enterprises and the Philippine Crop Insurance Corporation. From the resources of the CALF, the Department of Agriculture has allocated a total of three hundred million pesos to these agencies, so that they may encourage private banks to lend to agri-based projects on a collateral-short or even collateral-free basis. I am told that in the few months that these guarantee facilities have been available, a total of about P29.6 million in loans for about 1,531 beneficiaries have been guaranteed or programmed for guarantee. Furthermore, at least 114 rural banks and cooperative rural banks are already accredited to participate in these guarantee programs.

2. The continued implementation of the Agricultural Loan Fund by the Central Bank of the Philippines, the total size of which is about P3 billion. A grand cumulative total of P1.434 billion has been provided by the ALF. Currently some 41 rural banks are participants in the ALF program.
3. The continued implementation of the Cooperative Marketing Program, which provides loans through cooperative rural banks for coop-based projects. The CMP has a fund of about P88 million.
4. The provision of rediscounting facilities for qualified rural banks by the Land Bank of the Philippines, in addition to rediscounting from the Central Bank that has always been available to qualified rural banks.
5. A number of rural banks have also been regular participants in the Industrial Guarantee and Loan Fund, which is also administered by the CB. The IGLF is a longstanding program which has provided significant support for rural industrialization. Qualified rural banks may participate in the IGLF.
6. The continued implementation of the Agro-Industrial Technology Transfer Program, which has supported pioneering ventures in agribusiness, especially aquaculture. The AITTP is run by the Technology and Livelihood Resource Center, and has a fund totalling P590 million. Again, qualified rural banks may participate in the AITTP program.

Finally, the most recent measure which our government has taken to provide liquidity and support for the rural banks is the continuation and expansion of the Integrated Rural Financing (IRF) Program. The IRF is one of the more successful financing programs of the government, having maintained very high repayment rates on both the borrower-to-bank and bank-to-Central Bank levels. The IRF program provides special time deposits from the CALF into qualified rural banks, and the rural banks then relend the funds to agri-based projects. Under the IRF, there are no restrictions on the types and combinations of agricultural commodities that may be financed. The STDs are treated like credit lines. In addition, the IRF program provides intensive training in project management for both borrowers and bank staff. The IRF therefore provides maximum flexibility and support for the participating rural banks. The Department of Agriculture has expanded the funds available to the IRF program from P100-P300 million, effective immediately.

In closing, let me emphasize that the programs of the government in support of the lending activities of the rural banks are merely instruments of the transition process. Wide spread development and revitalization can only take place with the effectivity of reforms which spread wealth and income among most of our countrymen, and allow them to make full use of productive opportunities. Therefore, agrarian reform must be a key element of our development efforts. The effective delivery of basic services in agriculture and rural development provides additional necessary elements. Finally, for effective and efficient financial intermediation, the maintenance of a policy atmosphere which encourages freedom and flexibility is another critical element. All these factors, working together, provide the fertile ground for recovery, growth and development.

I recognize that the rural banks have the potential for playing the critical role of countryside development, specially in support of the poor. This is specially true of the sound rural banks, those that have survived the years when government subsidies for rural banking could no longer be maintained. These rural banks have learned how to mobilize the small deposits of the rural savers. The good rural bankers have also developed the practical expertise in lending to small, often uncollateralized farmers and rural entrepreneurs. This expertise is the unique comparative advantage of the rural banks. It is also the basic rationale for their rehabilitation, and in your much-needed efforts to assume your rightful place as key catalysts of agricultural productivity and countryside development.

Thank you and good day!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade Consultative Meeting

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade Consultative Meeting

[Delivered at the Philippine Plaza, May 10, 1988]

NGOs AS WILLING PARTNERS

The shortage of safe water sources has caused the spread of water-borne diseases. Further, only 69 per cent of total households are provided with sanitary toilet facilities. Given the primitive or non-existent state of toilet facilities, the President responds to the challenge and announces the launching of the nation's first comprehensive Water Supply, Sewerage and Sanitation Master Plan. The Plan aims to eliminate the huge backlog in the delivery of basic water supply services by 1991 and would rely heavily on certain non-government organizations for help in shouldering the cost of implementing the Plan.

The Eighties have been declared by the United Nations as the International Drinking Water and Sanitation Decade. In 1981, the Philippines initially responded to this call to divert more attention and resources towards the provision of safe water and proper sanitation to larger segments of the population. In the next seven years, some eleven (11) billion pesos were funnelled into the effort.

Despite the inroads made, facilities remain primitive or are nonexistent for a large number of communities throughout the country. To date, only 63 percent of all Filipinos have access to safe water. Service coverage is broken down into 86 percent for Metro Manila and its adjoining areas, 55 percent for other urban centers and 62 percent for the rural areas. The shortage of safe water sources has caused the spread of water-borne diseases. Further, only 69 percent of total households in the nation are provided with sanitary toilet facilities; 15 percent are equipped with crude and unsanitary toilets and 16 percent have no facilities at all.

Because of the prohibitive cost of materials and installation, provisions for sewerage are even more scanty. Only limited areas of Manila, Baguio, Zamboanga and Cebu City are serviced by a sewerage system.

Through the past years, the Philippine effort for the Decade moved in fits and starts. But at last, this year, we have completed and are launching the nation's first comprehensive Water Supply, Sewerage and Sanitation Master Plan. One of its general goals is to eliminate the huge backlog in the delivery of basic water supply services by 1991. It also includes the first long-term approach for provision of sewerage facilities. The specific policies and strategies involved in the Plan include a delineation of the responsibilities and contribution of pertinent government agencies like the Department of Public Works and Highways, the LWUA, the Metro Manila Waterworks and Sewerage System and the Department of Health. The plan also defines the methods for provision of cost-sharing and cost-recovery mechanisms and the extent of participation of beneficiary communities. For instance, one approach is to harness the support of rural womenfolk in fostering water conservation consciousness among their families and the community as a whole. The rationale is that it is the women who normally operate hand-pumps and fetch water for their washing and cooking chores, and who can be tapped as systems managers in Water Districts and Rural Waterworks and Sanitation Associations.

Though the Plan will be activated and operable, government concedes that its resources are scarce and thinly spread out among other pressing projects and programs for development. We will therefore be relying on certain non-government organizations for help in shouldering the effort and cost of implementing the Plan. Those who have already put in their time and resources are the Tulungan sa Tubigan Foundation, the Philippine Business for Social Progress and other civic organizations. The UNICEF deserves special mention for its efforts in this endeavour.

The type of services usually rendered by these groups are project identification, subsidy in construction cost, assistance in operations, and maintenance, and administration in training programs. An additional service we look forward to receiving from private groups is the documentation of success stories and the development of implementation models. This is to promote water sanitation awareness at all levels. Meanwhile, let me state that the efforts of nongovernment groups have been highly appreciated and we hope they will be sustained.

May I think all the individuals, organizations and agencies who have already contributed or who have pledged their support in helping Filipinos help themselves in improving the quality of their lives. Even as the decade nears to a close, we already see brighter prospects ahead in the next one.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Capital Markets Development Conference

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Capital Markets Development Conference

[Delivered on May 25, 1988]

TIME FOR BUSINESS TO DO ITS PART

The President reiterates call for the immediate privatization of government-owned or controlled private corporations and assets to preclude competition between government corporations and private enterprise.

The issue of economic growth being fueled by investments of Filipino capital becomes particularly urgent. There is a need to generate more capital to respond to the dramatic increase in demand.

The day before Labor Day I told an audience composed of capitalists and managers that the people and their leadership had fulfilled almost all the conditions of the full revival of the economy.

There is political stability and constitutional order.

All the political institutions critical to a healthy investment climate have been put in place. The democratic process was tested repeatedly – against corruption, fraud, terrorism, and, even against the bane of Western democracies, the indifference of electorates. Each test has proved the durability of the social and political order and the-strength of the popular commitment to this government and the principles of democracy.

All the enemies of freedom and progress have been put to flight. The rightwing is on the run, and the leftwing has been clipped – most recently by the capture of its top leadership.

There is, by and large, honest government. Such corruption as exists does not interfere with business transactions and relationships. There are no cronies forcing anyone to sell out or buy into a business. There is only the minimum of economic regulation. And I have, time and again, with increasing impatience, called for the immediate privatization of government-owned or controlled private corporations and assets, so there will be no competition between government corporations and private enterprise which supports these companies, one way or another, through taxes.

It is now the turn of business to do its part.

Business and I pledged to the people during the SNAP election that we would never again ask government to bankroll private enterprise and private fortunes. There would be no more of those public loans that lined private pockets, both here and abroad, which account for almost our entire foreign debt.

What this means, however, is that further economic growth must be fueled by investments of Filipino capital. This issue has become particularly urgent. The revival of the economy is consumer-led. The dramatic increase in demand is putting, however, a strain on existing productive capacity. To sustain the present growth, we must generate more capital.

I am painfully aware of the history of our domestic capital markets. Unscrupulous practices in the management of companies and in the trading of shares has made the public wary of investing in industry. And yet we have the infrastructure to improve our capital markets – the banks, the financial intermediaries, and the stock exchanges. But these institutions have not been fully or properly utilized. There has been, for instance, too great an emphasis on short term capital, which prevents long range business planning and creates instability in interest rates.

An analysis of commercial bank loans for the third quarter of 1987 shows that 73 percent of all loans were demand or short term loans, reinforcing the observation that commercial banks have not been a major source of long term capital.

Neither has there been a development of our equities market. We have two exchanges, one of them is the oldest in Southeast Asia, and yet our market capitalization is P61 Billion, which is the lowest in the region. Together, the exchanges have a combined listing of only 130 companies, of which only 20 are actually traded. Of the top 1,000 corporations, only 61 are listed.

We do not have active secondary markets for commercial papers, bonds, debentures or even government securities. And yet, it is the secondary markets that will allow our industries to confidently source their long term capital needs and, at the same time, provide the investor the mechanism for liquidity.

This situation should not continue. We must reorder our priorities in this field. We need long term capital. We need new instruments in the financial markets. We need liquidity for investors. We need stable interest rates. We must make the development of our domestic capital markets a national priority.

Thank you and Good Day.

President of the Philippines
On the 71st anniversary of the Department of Agriculture and Food

[Released on May 27, 1988]

BALIK-YAMAN SA SAKAHAN

The choice of the theme: “Balikyaman sa Sakahan” is very timely. The threat to the country’s natural resources is ever growing and it is more discernible in agriculture. In addressing the poverty of our farm, we must also address the long-term viability of our finite resources. The President advocates a full partnership with the Department of Environment and Natural Resources.

Ikinalulugod kong batiin ang pamunuan at mga kawani ng Kagawaran ng Agrikultura sa inyong ika-pitumpu’t isang anibersaryo. Nagagalak din akong batiin ang mga outstanding awardees. Higit sa lahat, binabati ko ang mga kababayan nating magsasaka at mangingisda na kasama natin ngayong umaga sa ating pagtitipon.

It has been two years now since the Filipino people gave me the mandate to lead this country. Over these two years, I have endeavored to govern with this basic parameter: The well-being of the majority especially the disadvantaged.

The Department of Agriculture has capsulized this parameter explicitly in your primary objective: that of increasing incomes for farmers and fishermen and improving the quality of their lives. You have set to achieve this by encouraging the initiative of and enabling the agricultural worker to produce profitably.

Your objective has led you, unavoidably, to the issue of our diminishing resources. And so it encourages me that you have chosen for your theme this year, “Balik-Yaman Sa Sakahan”. Your choice is very timely.

For the threat to our Natural Resources is ever growing, it is also marked and conspicuous in Agriculture. We can easily cite our denuded forests, erosion and loss of fertility of our soils, the continuing destruction of our coral reefs and mangroves.

Therefore, in addressing the poverty of our farm and fishing communities, we must also address the long-term viability of our finite resources. In improving the productivity of our farmers and fishermen, we must do so in a way that will not unduly tax the production base. In this way, and only thus, can we ensure renewability of our resources, guarantee sustainability of agricultural yields and realize increased farm incomes.

As you work to achieve these objectives, I urge you to be full partners with the Department of Environment and Natural Resources. DENR supplements and complements your Department, and we expect you to work together in close coordination; where one leads in protecting the production base, and the other in cultivating it.

I also urge you to intensify your work in communities. Resource renewal and sustainability is not exclusively our concern. It is theirs as well, and very much so. Let us learn from the people and work most closely with them. I think you know very well, how, for instance, in fishing communities, it is the poor fisherfolk who really understand the need for environmental protection. More than anybody else, they know too well how greed has caused the wanton destruction of our fishery resources. Community involvement, I believe, will spell the difference between the success and failure of our initiatives.

Our thrust in rationalizing the management of our Agri-Ecosystem entails determining appropriate methods suited to the local climate, culture, and economy. Your emphasis on locality – specific technologies applies very well. I am pleased to know how seriously you are re-learning from our time-tested, locally-suited indigenous practices.

It is therefore commendable that you have included in your plan of action the resource base as one of your major sectoral concerns. I wish to encourage you as you strive toward regenerative, rather than exploitative agriculture – agriculture that ensures productivity and income not only for the present but also for the future.

To concretize this commitment, we are launching today the livelihood enhancement for Agricultural Development Program or LEAD.

LEAD is an assistance program for organized rural communities to engage in Agro and Fishery based enterprises. As such, it shall generate rural employment and develop the entrepreneurial skills of our farmers and fishermen. Through LEAD, we shall be able to move agricultural workers from their present subsistence production to a level where they can run business enterprises on their own.

I am happy to inform you that we have initial funding in the amount of 256 million pesos. This grant, courtesy of the RP-Japan food production program, will provide start-up capital for water-impounding projects, the construction of artificial reefs, the establishment of nurseries, the provision of post-harvest facilities like solar dryers which can even alternate as a recreation facility, and the like.

The local Councils, the Municipal, Provincial and Regional Agricultural and Fishery Councils, mostly made up of farmers, have identified and will continue to identify specific projects that address their needs.

To complement the extended capitalization, the farmers will put in equity, such as land and labor.

An interesting feature of the program is that payments are not required to be given back to the source. Instead, these will go to the next-in-line beneficiary who will use these in another project. Such roll-over scheme is really an ingenious way of ensuring that limited funds can be extended to as many beneficiaries as possible.

In the packaging of projects, the Department of Agriculture and the non-government organizations involved in the respective project areas will provide assistance.

Marketing linkages have been established involving the Department of Agriculture, Department of Trade and Industry, the members of the Management Association of the Philippines Foundation, the non-government organizations, as well as private companies.

Financing, besides what we now have, will come from other banks with guarantees from the comprehensive Agricultural Loan Fund supporting guarantee organizations.

In a capsule, the LEAD program exhibits how the principal actors in the agricultural sector can work together in profitable enterprises that strictly take into account the needs of the beneficiaries who determine these themselves; locally-developed or developing technology; and certainly, the critical environmental factors.

Moreover, I wish to reiterate that we have in the LEAD a program whose avowed commitment to the farmer we can trust. This is because it aims to develop the farmer from a mere producer to a full-fledged entrepreneur by training him to identify a project, to package it, to source funds for it, and to manage it well. All these in consideration of the need, on the other hand to provide an immediate and reliable source of livelihood for the farm family and community; and on the other, to enhance the life support systems of the surrounding environment.

When we speak of the farmer, surely we also mean the farm youth — a farmer in his own right. We deem him eligible, therefore, to participate in the LEAD program, provided he is between 15 to 25 years old, belongs to a family whose basic occupation is farming and fishing, and is a member of the 4-H club as validated by the local Councils. Under the provision of our technicians, model farm youths will be trained to prepare and manage their own projects which will serve as models to inspire their peers.

To sum up, let me point out that what you will be fulfilling in all of these efforts do not merely spring from an economic imperative. The call for farming profitability hand in hand with agricultural sustainability is a moral obligation.

We in government, with the distinct task to lead, cannot shirk from this responsibility. The Department of Agriculture can do no less. I assure you that you have the full support of the Office of the President.

For when man and woman were created, God commanded them to rule and subdue the earth. We have inherited that task. We are to bring order, to control, to cultivate. Created in the creator's image, we are to maintain the creation process, to re-create, not to destroy.

For it is the earth that nourishes us. Let us nourish it in turn, that it shall ensure life for us, for our children's children.

Like you have said in your slogan, "Alaga Ka Ng Lupa; Alagaan Mo Rin."

Binabati ko kayong lahat Mabuhay ang Kagawaran Ng Magsasaka! Mabuhay ang ating mga magsasaka!

[Delivered on May 30, 1988]

CHALLENGE AGRICULTURAL SECTOR

The President underscores one of the overriding concerns of her administration – employment. The general focus of the effort centers on the reform of agricultural policies so as to improve the delivery of basic services and make farming a more profitable enterprise. The Livelihood Enhancement for Agricultural Development Program (LEA) therefore intends to move farmers from their present subsistence level to a stage where they can sustain business enterprises on their own.

During my first meeting with the Cabinet this year, I underscored one of the overriding concerns of all our endeavors – employment. When I said this however, I did not mean we were to do it all by ourselves.

The agricultural sector in particular, with its huge, underutilized and undercompensated labor force, poses a challenge that requires more than all the efforts, expertise and resources the government can provide. This sector, as you know, comprises almost seventy percent of our country's population. Its contribution to our economy constitutes a third of our gross national product. And yet it is this sector that remains mired in the lowest stages of underdevelopment. Rural families account for about 80 percent of the poorest 30 percent of our total households. Furthermore, the disparity between urban and rural incomes has widened steadily over the past years. The average farm family income is only 40 percent of the urban income, down from 75 percent in 1975. Such economic and social inequities have served to fan the flames of insurgency in the rural areas over the past decade.

At the start of my administration, I had already identified the rehabilitation and development of the countryside as a priority thrust of the new government. As a start, we moved to abolish agricultural monopolies that has stunted the growth of small, independent farming enterprises. We also lifted the burden of export taxes, eliminated or reduced tariffs on farm inputs and initiated reforms inputs and cultural credit system. We also disengaged ourselves from the trading of agricultural products and inputs to allow the free and more energetic interplay of market forces. The general focus of our efforts was on the reform of agricultural policies so as to improve the delivery of basic services and make farming a more profitable enterprise.

While we continue to remove the stumbling blocks and impediments in the way of agricultural growth, we have also become increasingly aware of other needs and difficulties that prevent farmers from taking full advantage of the freedom and space provided for such growth. While many farmers' associations would like to embark on specific livelihood projects, they are unable to secure financing from commercial banks for several reasons. These include a lack of know-how in project packaging, no track record in running such projects and enterprises, no known linkages with existing commercial banks and lack of collateral and equity.

It is precisely for the purpose of meeting these needs that the Department of Agriculture recently launched the Livelihood Enhancement for Agricultural Development Program or LEAD. As Secretary Dominguez has already explained to you, the LEAD intends to move farmers from their present subsistence level to a stage where they can sustain business enterprises on their own. This involves assistance in setting up business enterprises, the provisions of mechanisms to move foreign grants and other funds to the countryside efficiently, and the implementation of these through private-sector led local agriculture and fishery councils. The envisioned effect is the raising of farmers' incomes from the present P1,330 and below a month to at least P2,000 a month. And while the LEAD, as it is aptly named, has taken the initiative in this direction, it has called on the private sector to help in fleshing out the major thrusts of the program. These are the provisions of management skills and market orientation and link-ups for the farming sector. And it is to this call that the Management Association of the Philippines has so quickly and generously responded.

Since government initiated the launch of a Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program, it has been observed that the sharing of resources must go beyond the mere reallocation of such a basic commodity as farmland. The agreements that have been made between the Department of Agriculture and the Management Association of the Philippines addresses this issue squarely by redistributing one of the most vital and valuable resources of all – the brains and expertise of big business. The profits of such a partnership, I am sure, will go beyond the normal expectations of any public or private enterprise. The yield is a better climate for peace and prosperity, and the knowledge that where it counts, business and the bureaucracy can indeed walk in step and in the same direction.

I hope that like all the best partnerships, yours will be sustained, harmonious and productive way beyond the honeymoon stage. In behalf of all the families and individuals your combined endeavors will benefit, I thank you and wish you all success.

Message of President Corazon Aquino before the Federation of Filipino Drug Industries

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the Federation of Filipino Drug Industries

[Delivered on June 1, 1988]

INSURING SAFE AND AFFORDABLE DRUGS

There is a pressing need for safe and affordable drugs. The National Drug Policy aims to solve this problem. President Aquino congratulates the officers and members of the Federation of Filipino Drug Industries and the Association of Drug Industries of the Philippines for their much valued support to the National Drug Policy.

I would like to congratulate the officers and members of the Federation of Filipino Drug Industries and the Association of Drug Industries of the Philippines for their resounding support for the National Drug Policy. The recent public debates on this issue underlined the fact that we Filipinos need to stand up to uphold our own interests. We have no one to rely on except ourselves to assure for our nation safe, efficacious and affordable drugs.

On this occasion, I wish to re-affirm the key goals of our National Drug Policy. The policy contemplates nothing less than the systematic recasting of the rules under which our people obtain the drugs and medicines they need to preserve their health.

First, government is committed to insure that the Filipino consumer gains full and convenient access to information about drugs. Our support for extensive use of generic names in all aspects of pharmaceutical marketing, prescribing and dispensing comes from their commitment. The Filipino consumers must be given the means to recognize different products for the same uses. Generic names are the technically accepted means available.

Second, government is committed to serve as the effective and reliable guarantor of safety and efficacy of drugs and medicines. Through our regulatory authorities, the safety and efficacy of drugs allowed to be sold and used shall not be compromised. While there are many opportunities for dialogue and debate, we shall condemn any attempt to use technicalities and maneuverings to preserve pharmaceutical profit despite disturbing questions about safety and efficacy. No one must be allowed to profit from drug of doubtful safety or doubtful efficacy. Those responsible members of the drug industry who have responded to the call of the Department of Health to voluntarily withdraw questionable drugs should be extolled. Those others who remain adamantly wedded to their profits despite questions raised on the sources of such profits will have to learn. This government will have to teach them.

I am glad that the Filipino entrepreneurs involved in the drug industry are supportive of the policies which I enunciated last year. We really have no one to rely on except ourselves. You are part of what is now an infant local pharmaceutical industry but with due care, support and attention, I have no doubt that we can have a fully grown industry that will be a true resources for self-reliance. Our national masterplan for pharmaceutical development is presently being formulated. I look forward to your continuing support and participation.

In sum, the National Drug Policy is promotive, not restrictive. It is not anti-foreign or anti-business; it is pro-Filipino and pro-people. Huwag nating kalimutan kailanman: ang mag-aalaga at makapagtatanggol sa Pilipino ay kapwa Pilipino din.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 40th anniversary of the Far East Broadcasting Company

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 40th anniversary of the Far East Broadcasting Company

[Held at the Kalayaan Hall, June 3, 1988]

A COMMITMENT TO RECONCILIATION

The President appreciates the partnership of Christian Organizations like the Far East Broadcasting Company in the promotion of peace, understanding and true spirituality. She states that its emphasis on reconciliation with God and men is vital in bringing about peace and stability in the country.

I wish, at the outset, to congratulate Far East Broadcasting Company on its 40th year of broadcasting the Good News of Jesus Christ all over Asia in more than 70 languages.

I am happy to note that the theme of your celebration is “Committed to the Ministry of Reconciliation.” When Ninoy decided to come back to the Philippines, he was committed to make peace, to do the work of reconciliation. I believe that reconciliation between man and man can best be effected if there is first reconciliation between God and man.

The Filipino people are grateful to the men and women of Far East Broadcasting Company for their holistic approach to radio programming in that they try to meet, not only the physical and social needs of men, but also their spiritual needs. We are also appreciative of the partnership of Christian organizations like Far East Broadcasting Company in the promotion of peace, understanding and true spirituality. Your emphasis on reconciliation with God and among men is vital in promoting international understanding and in bringing about internal peace and stability in our nation.

I have been told that during the EDSA revolution, FEBC used all its domestic and international facilities to broadcast the events as they happened to keep the nation and the world informed of what was going on. But more importantly, you used your facilities to mobilize people to pray so that the conflict could be resolved peacefully and with a minimum of bloodshed. As we all know, the Lord answered our prayers.

Because of the immense reservoir of faith and peace that FEBC is generating, I am convinced that gospel broadcasting should be encouraged by the government. Accordingly, I have issued Proclamation No. 262 declaring the first week of June of every year as National Gospel Broadcast Week, to be celebrated under the auspices of FEBC and other cooperating agencies.

May God continue to bless Far East Broadcasting Company as it pursues its unique ministry through gospel broadcasting.

Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the opening ceremonies of the International Conference of Newly Restored Democracies

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the opening ceremonies of the International Conference of Newly Restored Democracies

[Delivered on June 3, 1988]

A NEW SYNONYM FOR DEMOCRACY: PEOPLE POWER

Soon the world learned of a dramatic new synonym for democracy: people power. The Philippines joins the restored democracies of the world in proclaiming freedom and proudly declares that in this capital city, there has begun to take shape today a non-violent challenge to tyranny in the world.

I am told that the title of this celebration, The International Conference of Newly Restored Democracies, was carefully crafted a few months ago, in a meeting of diplomatic representatives of some of the participating countries here today. I congratulate them for the choice of title.

For, indeed, democracy can only be restored. It cannot be invented; it cannot be transplanted. As freedom is the natural state of man, so is democracy the natural shelter of freedom. Democracy's forms and shapes may be passed from one nation to another. But its substance is always native, is ever original in every culture, since the freedom that makes it possible is truly the people's own.

As G.K. Chesterton reminds us, it was freedom, not bondage, that gave rise to the first communities on earth, with "peasants tilling patches of their own land in a rough equality, and meeting to vote directly under a village tree, . . . the most truly self-governing of men."

It was for that simple dignity of human freedom and not for some complex, perhaps borrowed, parliamentary or presidential form that, I am sure, these nations in conference here today brought down their dictatorships and returned to constitutional pluralism.

The word democracy is Greek in its origin, and we salute the delegation from Greece here today for the historic contribution of Hellas to the perfection of both form and substance of rule by the people. There is added reason to salute them for I understand that within the fifteen year period of returning democracies celebrated in this reunion, it was Greece, in 1973, that first unseated its dictator and unleashed the modern wave of returning democracies.

After Greece, it was Portugal that, ending the longest of dictatorship among those present, regained freedom. At the center of that transition was a determined democrat named Mario Soares and he is here today as our most distinguished guest, the President of a free, prosperous and gallant Portuguese Republic. The dictatorship in Spain fell in 1975 and, thence, the democratic wave rolled the Atlantic to Latin America where one after another dictatorships fell in impressive sequence – Ecuador, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Honduras, Peru, Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Uruguay, El Salvador, Guatemala.

Soon it was the Filipino's turn and the world learned of a dramatic new synonym for democracy – people power – a mass of humanity confronting tanks with religious statues, military commands with prayers, and a dictator's last political gasps with militant but peaceful yells of "Laban" – the fighting cry of a people impatient for the resurgence of their liberties. Let me point out that the four days of that revolution were the culmination and final vindication of the struggle of many from the first day of martial law in September 1972.

In Asia we are joined by South Korea where its revitalized democracy has permitted the opposition to control a free parliament

Which direction shall democracy's wave take? Will it retain its driving power? Part of the answer to these questions will depend on what we do here in the next few days. We are here to share experiences, problems, solutions, mistakes, agonies and triumphs. The eyes of the world are upon this gathering and we are honored that it is happening here in this city, in this country which, like yours, can be united, can flourish, indeed, can survive only if it remains in the original free state of humankind.

As our national hero, Dr. Jose Rizal, once said: "There are no tyrants where there are no slaves." We, the restored democracies of the world, join the long standing democracies of the Americas, Europe, Asia and Africa, in proclaiming freedom. Let the universe take note that in this capital city honored by your coming, there has begun to take shape today a new non-violent challenge to tyranny in the world.

The Philippines is proud to be one of the bearers of that challenge. The Philippines is proud to host you, our fellow newly restored democrats of the world.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 14th anniversary of the DENR

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 14th anniversary of the DENR

[Delivered at the EDSA Heroes Park, Quezon City, June 5, 1988]

A TIME TO MAKE AMENDS WITH NATURE

The President laments the way we have utilized and neglected our forest resources. For many years there was wanton destruction and today we reckon with reality – we have felled most of our trees. She exhorts the Filipinos to plant trees with the same vigor and interest they had when they cut them down.

As a nation, some twenty-eight months ago, we displayed a heroism with few parallels in history. In those glorious days of February, we regained the freedoms we cherished as a people. That singular display of heroism has come to be known as the EDSA Revolution. And we celebrate that experience each day that we enjoy our freedom.

Thus, we are here today to proclaim this site as EDSA Heroes Park. We shall here enshrine that unique achievement, and look to this Park as a symbol of our deep gratitude to all those who made our break from tyranny possible.

But even as we do this, there are developments that continue to threaten our freedom, and in fact, our very existence. This threat affects us more profoundly than any political, economic or social displacement thinkable. It can in fact spell the fall of our nation and the misery of future generations.

I speak of the continued destruction of the elements that make up our environment.

This is a concern that I would like to impress upon all as we mark, also today, World Environment Day. The United Nations has declared every 5th of June as such, to focus attention on the worsening condition of the environment around the world. And here in our country, we have for the same reason declared the month of June as environment month.

The threat to the environment must be faced conceitedly and no time must be lost in addressing it. Such urgency demands from each and every Filipino a new heroism not unlike the one shown at EDSA.

But unlike EDSA, we are not rallying against a single force, for environmental destruction is not something that only one person, or a small group of people, is responsible for. In one way or another, we have all caused this peril to fall on us. So, too, we must all get together to banish it.

Neglect of the environment is most apparent in the way we have utilized, and neglected our forest resources. For many years, we lived off our forests as if there were no tomorrow. We cut trees whenever we saw them, as if it were a natural, reflex action. It did not matter whether these trees were in one's backyard, on the steepest of mountain slopes, or in the deepest of rainforests. All that mattered then was that every tree cut meant profit or gain. It did not bother us then to think that, without equivalent efforts at replanting, one tree cut was one tree forever gone.

And thus, today, we must reckon with reality. We have felled most of our trees. But along with our trees, we have also thrown away the environmental security they had afforded. In exchange for the millions of trees we have cut, we must now content with nature run amok. This means ravaging floods, drought, destruction of crops, and hunger. To compromise any further would mean surrendering our future.

Already we are experiencing the effects of a timber famine, and this nation, once a mighty producer of wood, is now a humbled importer of logs. Frankly, this is not a good way to begin an economic recovery and development program. We need our trees, not only for ecological reasons, but also because they can provide us with a stable, and renewable, source of income and livelihood.

So much has already been given up. Now is the time to make amends with nature. We must plant trees with the same vigor and interest we had when we cut them down. This will be a huge task, with considerable demands on all of us for a major shift in human values. We must learn to match human needs with nature's elements. A new ethic in the use of material resources is required. For permanence is incompatible with predatory attitudes. A new heroism is therefore expected of us.

At this very moment, in various parts of the country, tree planting activities are simultaneously going on. I must say that there could be no more appropriate occasion than World Environment Day to give this national reforestation effort an auspicious beginning. It is my hope that reforestation will continue after today, and that this focus of interest will remain in the months and years to come, until we shall have accomplished our goal.

As we have painfully learned, heroism does not thrive amidst shortage of interest or will. Let us therefore put our minds and hearts to the cause of our most precious resources so that we will fully learn of their value, and restore them to the abundance and the majesty that they rightfully deserve.

Therefore, in the name of our new heroes, the rest of the Filipino people, and the memory of EDSA, I hereby dedicate this portion of the Ninoy Aquino Parks and Wildlife Nature Center as the EDSA Heroes Park. May this new park serve as a living reminder of our glorious past, and inspire us to even greater heroism, as we steer our nation through the present, and prepare it for the future.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the DAP Graduation

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the DAP Graduation

[Delivered at DAP Tagaytay, June 9, 1988]

SERVANTS OF THE PEOPLE

The reorganization was meant to promote performance, not to create anxieties. Those who remain shall constitute the face and substance of this government. We must serve with all dedication the Filipino people – our master.

According to the Bible, two are better than one, but a multitude is not necessarily the best. Since then government has been a search for ways to resolve the tension between the efficiency of less and the necessity for more to cover all the work of government. Is the bureaucracy bloated? Or is the size appropriate to the government of one of the most populous countries in the world – a country with tremendous problems and tasks? Is the bureaucracy in fact one of the principal reasons for the many problems we face? Is its reform one of the most important tasks we must set ourselves? This government's reorganization policy is the first sincere effort to resolve that tension since the birth of the Republic.

We are called civil servants. "Civil" to denote the public character of our duties and "servants" to underscore the master we must serve, with all civility and dedication: the Filipino people. And, as with servants and other wage workers, we are entitled, as the parable says, to no more than the just wage of the worker in the vineyard, with no right to complain of the amount or the justice of its distribution. In the last analysis, our reward is the conviction, which not all may share, that we have served our country well.

When I took power two years ago, I knew of course that government is not a one-woman affair, and that its success would turn on the competence, dedication and cooperation of the government bureaucracy that would translate my policies into operational realities. I discovered quickly enough that there is never any lack of ideas, only of honest and capable men and women with the pragmatism to know what needs to be done, what can be done, and the competence and dedication to do them, and do them well.

I have found many such men and women in our civil service. I found also how poorly they were regarded by the past government they had served. I immediately ordered salary increases in order to keep and properly recompense their invaluable services. In addition, I instructed the Cabinet Committee for Energizing the Bureaucracy to prepare, together with the Civil Service Commission, an integrated program of rewards and incentives. A full report on the status of this program is expected by September of this year.

Respecting as we all should, the contributions of the civil service, I insisted that it be accorded the rights that workers in the private sector have long enjoyed. I enjoined the heads of offices to encourage their personnel to exercise the constitutional right to organize. Further to that, I signed Executive Order 180 into law. A year has passed and yet the Public Sector Labor Management Council which I created under that Order has not issued its implementing guidelines. It is against such inaction and complacency that I have again and again issued calls for greater energy in government. I view the organization of government workers as a further demonstration of this government's preference for consultation and transparency, and as an added mechanism for uncovering corruption and incompetence in the public service. The CSC will soon begin a nation-wide education program on the rights and responsibilities of government workers. I urge everyone concerned to avail of it.

The first training and development program for government managers, called "Managing the Bureaucracy for Results," ends today. We shall start another session next month. This signals the revival of the program for government career executives. I am announcing also the reactivation of the Career Executive Service Board whose members I shall soon appoint.

Finally, let me say that reorganization, as one of the first acts of this government, was meant to promote performance, not to create anxieties. I am confident that the value of that exercise – the reform of institutions to conform to need and the matching of jobs with the right people – will eventually be evident. But I don't want to prolong the agony. I am giving all reorganizing offices 30 days from today to end the process. Those civil servants who should go, must be notified within that time. Phased-out government workers may register with an inter-agency committee that will train them for work in the private sector, as well as provide soft loans for their transition to private life. When that is done, let us close ranks and get on with the task of government.

Those who remain shall constitute the face and substance of this government. Let us hope the new face we present will not be just a leaner visage of incompetence and delay. To avoid this result we must truly energize the bureaucracy. The question is how to do it.

For a start, let us look at the most efficient private firms and model our expectations after their operations. There are similarities and differences, of course. The bottom line of the private firm is profits for the stockholders. For the public institution, the bottomline is service to the people who support it with their taxes. The first is driven by the profit motive, the second by civic virtue. This is the fundamental difference that accounts for the disparity in their performances. That difference can be eliminated by instilling in the bureaucracy both a new spirit of public service and a just apprehension that they will be fired if they fall short of the public expectation. The bottomlines, however, are essentially the same: an advantage to the stockholder or the taxpayer – cash or stock for the former; public services, security, and national honor for the latter. I want the public income statement to show a profit, a just return on the tremendous investments in taxpayers' money that is being made.

Next, let us focus on our activities. Each department should focus on its mandate. Between now and year's end, I want each department to review its mandate and channel its energy and resources exclusively to that. If its mandate is agriculture or natural resources, then clearly it should involve itself with nothing more than promoting agricultural productivity or conserving the national patrimony. I am asking the Department Secretaries to submit a list to me of the things that their Departments should stop doing, continue doing, or go into – in line with their respective mandates. We shall judge their performance against it, which is fair. I expect that list a month before I deliver my next State of the Nation message. I want you to clarify your mandate, define your appropriate functions and thereby justify your continued incumbency.

Third, let us make it easy for our clients to avail of our services. Graft and corruption grows with discretion and regulatory functions. I support the initiative to Do Away With Red Tape, in which the public will be asked to rank each department according to the complexity and length of their procedures, and its insistence on regulating the private economy. The most complex will be the first to be trimmed on the chopping block.

Finally, let us take accountability seriously, because I am. I represent the people you are obligated to serve. Fail the people, disappoint their expectations, and you fail me. I need not say more.

I close my speech with the expressed hope that you will meet my high expectations of your improved competence in public service and your heightened sense of patriotic duty. Congratulations on your graduation and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino upon the bill signing of the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program (CARP)

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Upon the bill signing of the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program (CARP)

[Held at the Malacañang, June 10, 1988]

THE UPLIFTMENT OF THE FILIPINO MASSES

CARP is viewed as a way of liberating the hitherto suppressed energies and creativity of the nation for the material upliftment of the many and the prosperity of all.

I have just signed into law the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program. This act, I hope, will end all the acrimony and misgivings of the contending parties to the Program, and unite the nation behind the effort to make agrarian reform a success in our country. Every side has been respectfully heard; few measures have been as rigorously scrutinized and discussed as this Program has been by representatives of the people and by the people themselves.

It was my intention from the start to assign the substantive portions of the Program to those who would be most affected and therefore most informed about them – the people themselves through their elected representatives. I should hope that, now, the various interests in the land will be able to work together to achieve the twin goals of the Program: a radical leap in agricultural productivity and therefore a significant contribution by the agricultural sector to Philippine progress, and the upliftment of the Filipino masses from their ancient poverty.

Let us see the Program not as a taking of property from some and a giving of it to others, but as a way of liberating the hitherto suppressed energies and creativity of the nation for the material upliftment of the many and the prosperity of all.

The division of lands that the Program will gradually implement merely sets the stage for the more important task ahead: turning the land to its most productive use achieving, as a first objective at least, a permanent self-sufficiency in food for our country.

The stewardship of the land that the landlords were said to have neglected shall now pass as the law is implemented to the tillers. The stewardship should weigh as heavily on the many as it did on the few. The same bottomline applies to them: the wisest use of the land for the greatest generation of wealth for themselves and for the entire nation.

The main responsibility for the implementation of the Program lies with the Department of Agrarian Reform but I expect all the other departments, the entire apparatus of government, civil and military, be as deeply involved and as committed to its success. I will not tolerate disputes over jurisdiction, jealousy over turf, to derail this Program. Agrarian Reform is now a legal reality and it will be around as a compelling obligation long after I have changed those who fail to do their part.

The law itself, in the equal emphasis it puts on support services for the success of the Program, underscores the necessity of cooperation on the part of all departments.

Agrarian Reform Secretary Juico is hereby instructed to prepare his department, and to advise all the other departments to prepare themselves, for the meeting of the PARC which I shall convene upon my return.

I would like to express my congratulations to the Congress for the work it has done. The task of course is far from complete. This is only the beginning, and the greater part that remains requires the cooperation of the President and the Congress.

Let me end with a reiteration of what I have always believed was the basic justification for agrarian reform: beyond the justice of giving land to the landless tiller, this is the means by which we shall truly achieve the independence that we will celebrate on Sunday. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the National Artists Awards

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the National Artists Awards

[Delivered at the Ceremonial Hall, June 11, 1988]

THE RIGHT TO CULTURE

The President honors the Filipino Artist and its artistic expression in music and dance during the inauguration of the UN Decade for Cultural Development. She confers the National Artist Award to Col. Antonio R. Buena Ventura and Ms. Lucrecia Reyes-Urtula who are the finest embodiments of the Filipino soul.

We are here today to recognize and honor the Filipino spirit and its artistic expression in music and dance. The conferment of these honors is most appropriate at this time, for this year the Philippines, together with the United Nations, inaugurates the World Decade for Cultural Development. By a happy coincidence, we too are inaugurating the commemorative decade for the centennial of Filipino nationalism which culminates in 1998.

The World Decade for Cultural Development was proclaimed by the UN General Assembly, upon recommendation of the UNESCO, during its 100th plenary meeting on December 8, 1986. The objectives of the Decade are: (1) recognizing the cultural dimension of development; (2) affirming and enriching cultural identities; (3) broadening participation in culture; and (4) promoting international cultural cooperation.

In the rush of nations to achieve material progress, to create jobs for the multitude of unemployed, and to produce more to alleviate mass hunger in many parts of the world, culture has frequently been forgotten or given a low priority. The Decade seeks to correct this oversight, by emphasizing that development is not merely a matter of raising the GNP, but equally of promoting that for which GNPs are raised, the development of the total person through the improvement of the material and spiritual quality of life.

That quality is not a matter merely of better food and housing, better health, and adequate clothing for everybody. It means, also the opportunity to express the human condition in art, and support the talents that make that possible.

The UN recognizes the right of peoples to their culture; and a great part of colonial injustice lay in the Western attempt to eradicate native cultures. The affirmation of this right to one's native culture, and the right to national self-determination, have been the vital principle of nationalism for a century in our country, since the first Philippine Revolution.

In that period of self-affirmation and self-definition, it was in the arts that the Filipino first began to speak with a distinctive voice. In 1885, Pedro Paterno wrote his novel Ninay, filled with local color. The implied message was that the Filipino need not apologize for his country. In 1887, Jose Rizal published his novel Noli Me Tangere. He was saying, not only that his country deserved respect, but it was an outrage not to give it that respect for we are all equal under our skins. In 1889, our patriots in Europe put out the La Solidaridad to spread that message abroad. To prove that equality – if proof was needed – there were the artists Juan Luna and Felix Resurreccion Hidalgo. Their artistic victories in Spain expressed the proposition best – we can all be equal in excellence.

Our own recent liberation from two decades of tyranny was aided by the commitment of some artists to the cause of liberation. In fiction, essay, and poetry some of our writers attacked the dictatorship. Our singers sang against the oppression. Our painters drew the faces of violence against the body and spirit of our people. And a handful of journalists went to jail, but remained steadfast in the cause of liberty.

In the spirit of the UN Decade for Cultural Development and the Decade of Filipino nationalism, we wish to publicly recognize and honor the Filipino Artist. And we honor them without exception. As a tangible expression of this recognition we confer and award the National Artist Award to two noble spirits whose art is as ancient as our country – Music and Dance. Four hundred years ago when the European first set foot in our country, they noted the dance and music traditions of our forefathers. These traditions still live. The honorees with us today Col. Antonio R. Buenaventura and Ms. Lucrecia Reyes-Urtula stand in the proud line of Filipinos who are the finest embodiments of the Filipino soul. We congratulate them, and ask all our people to feel honored with them. For what they have achieved is not only theirs to glory in; it is also the glory of their country.

Revised Vin D'honneur Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the value of nationalism

Revised Vin D'honneur Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the value of nationalism

[Released on June 12, 1988]

THE VALUE OF NATIONALISM

Today's celebration marks the start of a 10-year effort to inculcate in our people the primary value of nationalism. It is a nationalism that looks to the progress we must attain because we trusted others to do that which we alone will do: take care of our country.

Today we celebrate the 90th anniversary of the declaration of Philippine independence. This year we begin the decade of nationalism in hopes that we may celebrate June 12, 1998, the centennial, truly free at last.

We thus inaugurate today a 10-year effort to inculcate in our people the primary value of nationalism.

By nationalism we mean thinking directed to the growth of national power, to the enhancement of this nation's ability to control its fate in the world, and to be respected as an equal by any foreign power that seeks its friendship and cooperation or dares its enmity.

We shall foster national pride only after, not before, we build for our people a country they can be proud of because it takes care of them, because it can help them realize their full potential as human beings, and a country respected abroad.

The February Revolution was a good start. No other people won their freedom by the individual courage of a mass. Every man, woman and child made a personal decision to stand their ground for freedom. In that stirring event, no one helped the Filipino who stood alone until it was clear he had won.

This is the nationalism we mean. A nationalism not of bitter recriminations and fault-finding but of a forward ambition to be strong. A nationalism that looks to the progress we must attain, and not to the backwardness and abuses we have suffered because we allowed ourselves to be weak, because we trusted others to do that which we alone will do: take care of our country.

Let us make a start in true nationalism. I ask this Government and our people to join us in this long-delayed task of finally creating a genuinely independent Filipino nation by the progress of its economy, the justice of its laws, the well-being and prosperity of its people, the effectiveness of its arms, and the independence and wisdom of its policies.

Ladies and gentlemen, please join me now in a toast:

To the next ten years, and the Filipinos' shared and unflagging commitment to build a strong and therefore truly independent Philippines;

To the peace and mutual respect among the nations of the world.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Independence Day

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On Independence Day

[Delivered on June 12, 1988]

NO EASY ROAD TO DEMOCRACY

As we celebrate this momentous event, we also recall those who sacrificed to help us find our way and acknowledge with gratitude their valuable contribution to the country and people. The President hopes that as we begin our ten-year march to nationhood, we will be guided by the fixed star of nationalism.

We first took the road to nationhood and democracy 90 years ago. It did not take long for us to lose our way. Those who tried to pick up the trail of true nationhood again, found only martyrdom.

There is no easy road to nationhood and enduring democracy. And the road signs have been erased or confused by those who do not want us to complete the journey.

Today, we recall those who sacrificed to help us find our way and rededicate ourselves to continue their search and undertake their sacrifices. We cherish their memory and acknowledge with gratitude the sacrifices they made on the altar of country and democracy.

This year, we begin the decade of nationalism, in hopes that we may celebrate June 12, 1998, the Centennial of Independence, as a nation fully free at last. Free from the threat of renewed tyranny, free from poverty, disease, ignorance, homelessness, and conflict.

We got rid of the first.

We applaud the initiative towards peace abroad taken by the superpowers, and towards peace at home taken by your government.

Congress is about to pass a Bill mandating generic labelling of drugs, making them more accessible to our people.

On Monday next week, 11 million children will enter our public school system, the largest number in our history, and, for the first time, all public high schools will be free.

Last Friday, I signed into law the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program. Now the stage is set for a revolution in agricultural productivity and greater social justice for our people in the countryside. More wealth and a fairer distribution of that wealth are the twin goals of the Program.

Today I am announcing the reduction of interest rates for housing loans of P60,000 and below. Interest rates are reduced from 9% to 6%; for new loans of P90,000 and below, from 12% to 9%. One Billion Pesos has been allocated for this program.

As we begin our 10 year march to full nationhood, let our steps be guided by the fixed star of nationalism, and our bodies and souls be emboldened by the spirit that moved our forebears in their noble sacrifices.

We cannot pause to rest; we cannot flag in our efforts. The goal is distant and recedes with every lessening of our resolve and our exertions. There are forces at home and abroad that seek to keep us weak, poor and subservient. If they succeed, the fault will not be theirs but ours. Nasa atin ang katuparan ng tunay na kalayaan.

Ang dekada na ating hinaharap ay masasabi nating pinakamakasaysayan sa ating bansa. Tayo ay nahaharap sa maraming pagsubok at tayo rin ang kakatawan at gagawa ng susunod pang kasaysayan. Kayo ay aking hinahamon na makibahagi sa natatanging kasaysayan na magaganap.

Noong Hunyo ng taong 1898, ay nagsimula ang paglalakbay nating mga Filipino tungo sa isang-daang taon ng kalayaan at pagkakaisa. At ang pagtatapos ng mahabang paglalakbay ay nalalapit na. Ito ay ating sasalubungin ng taas noo upang ang pinaglaban ng ating mga bayani at ninuno ay hindi masayang. Ngunit ang kalayaan na kanilang inasam at atin ngayong tinatamasa ay kailangan nating pangalagaan.

Mayroon na lamang tayong isang dekada upang tapusin, ipagpatuloy at alagaan ang mga simulain ng ating mga dakila, at maging ang ating mga di-kilalang bayani. Kailangan nating magpatuloy. Hindi natin matatanggap ang pagkatalo. Magsimula tayo sa huling yugto, na ang hangganan ay ang tunay na kasarinlan na ating mithiin.

Revised Speech of President Corazon Aquino on ILO Revised Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On ILO

[Held at Geneva, June 14, 1988]

LIBERTY IS NON-NEGOTIABLE

The conference themes on human rights, labor relations and debt make this an appropriate forum to convey the message of the Filipino people. The Philippine revolution reaffirmed the principle that the protection of human rights is the first duty of government Liberty cannot be traded for progress and social justice.

C'est avec grande satisfaction que J'ai reçu l'invitation qui m'a été faite de prendre la parole devant la conférence annuelle de L'Organisation Internationale du Travail.

En premier lieu parce qu'elle porte sur les droits de l'homme. Mais également en raison de l'attitude généreuse qui a été celle de L'Europe lors de la lutte historique pour les droits de l'homme que présente la Révolution de Février aux Philippines.

Les ambassadeurs Européens ont été les premiers à reconnaître, d'abord tacitement, puis ouvertement mon droit à assumer la Présidence, après que le peuple Philippin fut abusé sur ma victoire électorale.

D'autres gouvernements ont, eux attendus de savoir si le droit allait l'emporter sur les forces du mal et n'ont modifié leur attitude qu'après qu'il fut clair qu'aucun gouvernement autre que le mien ne serait autorisé par les masses Philippines en ébullition à assumer la direction du pays.

Les Européens ont tranché avec leur conscience. Sans doute deux millénaires d'après conflits autour de visées égoïstes avaient quelque peu émoussé les aspirations idéalistes de l'Europe. Mais il en a été différemment avec le combat de libération des Philippines. La Vieille Europe, qui en avait tant vu, retrouvant alors son idéalisme, a prêté son concours à la renaissance de la liberté aux Philippines.

I want to thank Director Blanchard for inviting me to address the 75th sitting of the International Labor Conference here in Geneva, and for the opportunity to express my people's appreciation of the support that Europe gave to their struggle.

The various themes of the Conference: human rights, labor relations, and debt: make this a very appropriate forum to convey their message. After all, our nonviolent Revolution was one of the most celebrated victories of human rights in one country and a triumph for its cause throughout the world. While the burden of debt weighs so heavily on the developing nations that it threatens to end all prospect of their recovery and growth, and equally threatens to create the anarchy and despotism where human rights are the first victims.

The Revolution reaffirmed the principle that the protection of human rights is the first duty of government, and that the deliberate and systematic violation of those rights by their governments imposes on the people the sacred obligation to overthrow them. Equally, the Revolution revealed new depths of faith and courage, and a new strategy and hope for democratic victories.

It is that hope for oppressed peoples everywhere that I must defend against the criticism that the heroism of the people came to nothing in the Philippines.

The Revolution was the work of people of the ordinary men and women of the working classes: priests and nuns who work with their hands to care for the poor, clerks, factory workers, school teachers, secretaries, managers, professionals, and their families. The involvement of the rich in the Revolution was widely noted, not because they were many but because it was unexpected that many would appear.

The Revolution offers hope, the national experience that provoked it taught a bitter lesson: liberty is non-negotiable, it cannot be traded for progress or social justice.

This truth is self-evident to men and women who respect themselves as persons. Yet many still ignored it only to learn too late that foregoing freedom for progress or social justice merely added torture and indignities to worsening poverty and underdevelopment.

It is a strange but incontestable fact that countries regarded as too poor to afford the luxury of democracy are precisely the countries that cannot do without it. The reason is this: nothing can resist the greed of the few except the power of the people freely exercising their rights and liberties. "Poverty increases insofar as freedom retreats throughout the world," Camus observed. "If this cruel century has taught us anything at all, it has taught that the economic revolution must be free just as liberation must include the economic."

As the Revolution was their work, it was only right that the order it established should express, in its laws, institutions, policies and leadership, a preferential option for the people — a bias towards their immediate relief and economic improvement, without exacting the price of their virtual slavery in the workplace.

The policies of the government which the Revolution brought to power have consistently expressed that option and bias.

Thus, immediately after the flight of the dictator, we moved to heal the divisions of our society and establish the framework, institutions and laws essential to the security of their rights, the permanence of their freedoms, and aimed at the improvement of their material well-being and national recovery and progress.

We released all political prisoners, giving special attention to the immediate release of the chief Communist Party ideologue, Jose Maria Sison, against the strong objections of the military faction that had helped in the ouster of the dictatorship.

Again, against the strong objections of that faction, we signalled the insurgency that we were prepared to negotiate a peace. That effort ultimately failed, yet, in retrospect, it had to be made to establish a moral basis for the resumption of war. Equally, the failure of our peace initiative definitively fixed the predominantly military character of the insurgent challenge, and the military necessity of the appropriate response.

Yet again, we made sure that the renewed hostilities would be conducted, at least by our side, in a manner consistent with the values we are defending against the insurgency. I therefore signed Protocol Two, which accords to the enemy in civil conflicts the protection of the Geneva Conventions.

We drafted a Constitution that would provide a pro-people framework for the policies we were preparing: policies that would upset established patterns of property relations and expectations, and therefore required a mandate across the spectrum of economic classes. That Constitution, which was ratified by a near unanimity of the voting population, provides in its Declaration of Principles and State Policies:

"The State shall promote a just and dynamic social order that will ensure the prosperity and independence of the nation and free the people from poverty through policies that provide adequate social services, promote full employment, a rising standard of living, and an improved quality of life for all."

Further:

“The State shall promote social justice in all phrases of national development.”

“The State values the dignity of every human person and guarantees full respect for human rights.

“The State affirms labor as a primary social economic force. It shall protect the rights of workers and promote their welfare.”

In this declaration are summed up the primary concerns which the Revolution sought to address, and the lesson which dictatorship had seared in our minds: that we will not accept progress at the expense of the workers or by exacting the price of their liberty.

So that these promises will not remain words on paper, the Constitution empowers the Supreme Court to promulgate rules for the protection and enforcement of constitutional rights.

I shall forthwith take the necessary steps to secure the approval by the Court of the rules for a new Philippine writ of amparo, a special constitutional remedy to enforce human social, and economic rights through a speedy and inexpensive procedure.

To the security given by the Constitution, we have added the protection of international conventions.

I have directed the dissemination of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights throughout the Philippines, translated into the national language and the major dialects.

I have ratified the ILO Convention on Tripartism and the ILO Convention on the Rehabilitation of the Disabled, and have submitted them to our Senate for concurrence, along with the Amendments to the ILO Constitution which will widen Third World representation in your governing council.

As mandated by the Constitution, human rights have been included in the curricula of all schools.

To answer fears that democracy has proved inadequate in protecting human rights in the Philippines, I have strengthened the Philippine Commission on Human Rights by providing for the permanence of the tenure of its members and by giving them sufficient powers to bring violators to justice. The Commission recently issued guidelines to the military to safeguard the rights of arrested persons, including the right of visitation.

We have appointed to the Congress men and women from the underprivileged sectors: labor, farmers, the poor, the disabled, women, and youth, selecting those who have distinguished themselves despite great disadvantages.

We launched an emergency employment program to alleviate the unemployment problem, especially in the countryside. Admittedly, the program was modest given the size of the unemployed force.

A few days ago, after over a year of bitter debates, I signed into law a Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program that will redistribute agricultural land to the landless tillers, and, more importantly, give them the support services that will make Philippine agriculture productive again. Agrarian reform is not justice, if all it achieves is the subdivision of the present miseries on the land. What the Program aims for is the liberation of the economic potential of the countryside, the increase in its standard of living and the creation of the market that will support the industrial progress we likewise seek.

This is only the start. More good might have been accomplished, if so much evil did not have to be undone. And we shall go on.

Violations of human rights still happen even in democratic states most determined to protect them. The attraction of democracy is also its weakness, for it must accord the same constitutional safeguards to the perpetrators as to the victims of human rights abuse. And in the free spaces created by democracy, evil goes about its work, sometimes more efficiently than good.

It behooves us then to narrow the scope of evil. This must be done by more democracy, not less. As much by removing the present restraints on human freedom imposed by poverty and underdevelopment, as by wider grants of rights and liberties. The next liberation must be economic. This includes a fair resolution of the Debt problem. For the tightening grip of its austerities threatens to strangle the life out of the new democracies of the Third World, even as it threatens to upset the stability of the international economic order. The linkage of debt, development and democracy is undeniable and is the most pressing issue this body must address.

The first duty of democratic institutions, like the ILO, is the protection of human rights. Chronic underdevelopment is the most systematic abuse of human rights. I put before the ILO the challenge of finding a resolution to this threefold issue in the just, sober, and democratic fashion that alone can win the consensus and cooperation of everyone involved. A resolution reflecting the spirit of the ancient lawgiver:

“I establish this law in the language of the land . . . for the welfare of the people . . . to cause justice to prevail and to destroy the wicked and the evil. . . that the strong might not oppress the weak . . . to rise like the sun over the people and to light up the land.”

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the Swiss-Filipino community

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Swiss-Filipino community

[Delivered in Geneva, June 14, 1988]

ASSISTING THE OVERSEAS WORKERS

The President addresses some 2,000 Filipinos working in this distinguished international community. She expresses pride in the contributions her people has extended to the international community and pledges that the Philippine government will do all it can to help them. This includes protective mechanisms in host countries like a renegotiation for better employment benefits.

It is a pleasure to meet with you today. I was pleasantly surprised to find out that the number of Filipinos in this beautiful city runs to almost 2,000, including family and friends.

I am proud to address this corps of able Filipino minds and hands working in this distinguished international community.

Far from home, you are however situated in an amiable country busy promoting international understanding.

I trust that you enjoy your work and have been assets to your employers. I have heard with pride of your contributions to the United Nations and other international organizations, to permanent missions, and other Swiss organizations.

In a sense, you are more fortunate than most of our countrymen in other parts of the world. There are hundreds of thousands of Filipinos in the Middle East, Asia and the Americas working under far more difficult conditions. Like you, they have chosen to work abroad, to improve their lot, to save or to send back earnings to their families. Unlike you, they are exposed to a host of more complicated problems in camps and worksites where competition is stiffer and work conditions more harsh.

All these, however, are sacrifices we take upon ourselves as part of that often lonely decision to work abroad. Recognizing these difficulties, your government has tried to smooth some of them away.

The volume of emigration from the Philippines has indeed been phenomenal. While we should like to keep such a flood of talent and industry within our shores, we have faced the fact that overseas employment provides temporary relief to our country's unemployment problems.

This recognition has provided a major aspect of our national employment strategy. It is our intention to project the Filipino worker's skill and expertise as his main selling point, rather than the cheapness of his labor at home. The exemplary work you have been doing abroad has testified to these work virtues more eloquently than all our messages to the world. At the same time, we have adopted measures to ensure that your work is justly recognized and compensated, and that you are treated with the respect and dignity you deserve.

Filipino labor overseas has contributed significantly to the progress of the host countries. The fair treatment we expect from these hosts is therefore a matter of justice and mutual respect.

Your country must, of course, accord the same justice, respect, and concern. After all, it is your earnings that account for much of the foreign exchange we use to pay for our foreign debt, that debt which the past government and its friends stole or wasted. This recognition of your essential contribution to our economy and financial stability, has prompted us to initiate several programs to assist you abroad. I am especially concerned with the treatment of our women workers abroad. That is why we handed down the ban on domestic helpers. We were addressing the realities of our women accepting employment under depressed contract terms and conditions. Protective mechanisms must first be sought out in host countries. Our intention is to re negotiate for better employment benefits.

We are looking into bilateral labor agreements with host country governments. We are assessing labor markets abroad and working on improvements to manpower agreements. In Manila, we are curbing illegal recruitment practices.

Foreign demand for Filipino labor continues strong for its performance has been its best credential. I salute you for the honor that your industry and skill have brought to our name and pledge that we shall do all we can to help you.

Thank you.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the Swiss Red Cross

Message of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines To the Swiss Red Cross

[Delivered in Geneva, June 14, 1988]

A DIMENSION OF NEUTRALITY

The President thanks the Swiss Red Cross for its many good works in the country which include timely assistance to the victims of natural calamities to the comfort and rescue of victims of human rights abuse by their unnatural governments.

There are two kinds of neutrality.

There is the kind that does not care whether there is pain and hurt in the world, provided only that it is safe from them. It feels that, having achieved well-being and progress, it is enough to be able to keep these things for itself. This kind of neutrality has no sense that such blessings establish an obligation to attenuate the sufferings of those who have been less fortunate – taking its inspiration from the insolence of Cain: “Am I my brother’s keeper?”

And there is the neutrality that answers. “Yes, I am my brother’s keeper; and while I have not the power to stop oppression and calamity, I need only courage to help its victims.”

Like the first kind of neutrality, it wisely avoids entangling alliances or conflicts with the rest of the world, but only so it can move freely in the world to help their victims. Such is the neutrality of the Swiss and their Red Cross – an organization separate from the world the better to do good in the world. It celebrates this year its 125th anniversary.

I am honored to be a part of this celebration and grateful for the opportunity to thank the Red Cross for its many good works in my country – good works that range from timely assistance to the victims of natural calamities to the comfort and – occasionally – the rescue of victims of human rights abuse by their unnatural governments.

Last year alone, the Red Cross gave assistance to thousands of victims of natural calamities in the Philippines. It donated 100,000 metric tons of rice just for the island of Mindanao. It was instrumental in the release and repatriation of some one hundred Filipino workers in Angola.

But its most notable work in the Philippines was in recording the acts and, occasionally rescuing the victims, of human rights abuse in my country.

There is little even a universally respected body like the Red Cross can do to stop a government determined to abuse its people, except to bear witness. Yet, bearing witness is often enough to ennoble their sufferings in the eyes of the victims themselves. The democratic restoration in the Philippines ended the systematic and deliberate abuse of human rights as an instrument of policy, yet we welcome the continued vigilance of the Red Cross in the preservation of human rights. While the path of good is clear, straight, and singular, the devious ways of evil are many.

Dictatorship encourages the abuse of human rights as the foundation of its authority to govern, yet often democracy can only hold such abuses to account. It cannot always prevent them. Yet ironically, it is more important to protect human rights in a democracy than in a dictatorship. For a dictatorship, as I said, thrives on abuse; while a democracy is sustained only by the people’s continuing faith in its ability to deliver on the promise of a good life, enduring liberty, and the pursuit and protection of individual happiness and dignity.

Take away that faith, mock the democratic promise by the abuse of human rights in the very citadel of right and law, and you undermine the foundation of democracy where it stands strongest – in the commitment of the people.

In the noble record of the Swiss and their Red Cross, one finds the noble dimension of neutrality: not a casual and indifferent attitude to the woes of the world, but a resolute and successful attempt to stand clear of entanglements and compromise the better to stand unambiguously for those absolute principles that protect the dignity and foster the well-being of man. I thank you again for this honor and wish you every success.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the World Economic Forum

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the World Economic Forum

[Delivered in Geneva, June 14, 1988]

STARTLING POSITIVE GAINS

Twenty eight months after the Revolution, the economy bounced back to health and started its trek to recovery. The President is optimistic that we can surpass this progress if all effective challenges to democracy will be eliminated. She said that foreign investments and foreign technology must complement our efforts to achieve prosperity.

I would like to thank the World Economic Forum for organizing this conference on the Philippines. I would like to thank the participants most of all as your presence attests to the world's continued interest in my country. I hope the afternoon session with the Philippine ministers has given you a more accurate picture of the real conditions in a country whose portrayal abroad has made Filipinos at home think it is a foreign country that is being talked about.

28 months after the Revolution sent the dictator packing out of the country he had abused and plundered, the Philippines, reports and rumors to the contrary notwithstanding, is alive and well, democracy is there to stay, and I will be there to make sure of it.

In that brief span, we restored honor to the Philippine justice system by reforming the courts, we adopted a new democratic constitution and ratified it. We elected a Congress and a Senate, and the nationwide system of local governments. In all three electoral exercises, the voter turnout was unprecedented anywhere in the world, at any time in history. And yet the country had just emerged from 15 years of corrupt and incompetent dictatorship: half the population was too young to have known any form of government other than that by fiat and terror. The turnout and the result proved the deep roots of democracy in the racial memory, and the complete ignorance of foreign analysts about the prospects of political stability in the Philippines. I am not surprised.

In the same period, the Rightwing made repeated attempts to destabilize the government by alienating the military from it and picturing the government as one of appeasement and naivete. These efforts succeeded only in frightening away foreign investments, which is a shame, but had no other effect but to convince me finally that the Rightwing had no place in our country. It is now in flight and hiding after my forces crushed their most determined and ruthless attempt to seize power last year.

Yet in this period of unwanted foreign publicity, our economy bounced back to health and started on the road to recovery. From negative economic indicators, including rate of investments, the economy made startling positive gains. Not much, of course, if you make comparisons with countries that haven't been robbed by their governments, but in the light of our experience, the growth was a respectable one.

After all, we had inherited only devastation from Marcos: pillaged industries, bankrupt banks, a rifled treasury, and a shockingly large foreign debt with nothing productive to show for it, until we uncover and recover the man's hidden wealth from where he has hidden it. The Philippines, which had been Asia's second strongest economy 20 years ago, had become the Southeast Asian basketcase after 15 years of dictatorship. The economic wreckage spawned a widespread insurgency which we have finally begun to turn. In two years we have recovered much lost ground.

This afternoon's presentations explained the progress we have achieved. That progress is by no means the best we can do. We can surpass it, and we shall, given the elimination of all effective challenge to Philippine democracy from the Right, and the significant reverses suffered by the Left.

Early this year, the top leadership of the Communist insurgency was captured. Documents captured from recent urban raids have revealed a much diminished insurgent army. Credit for this goes, ironically, to our failed attempt to negotiate a peace with the insurgents. The truce I called had allowed many rebels to revisit their families and see for themselves the earnest efforts we were making, and convinced many of them to give peace another chance.

Our offer to negotiate was interpreted as surrender by the insurgent leadership until the offensives we launched corrected all misconception about our determination to achieve civil peace only on our terms, the terms of democracy.

Am I saying that the Right will not try again, or that the Left has finally laid down its arms? Certainly not. The Right will keep on threatening as its impotence increases, because threats are all that are left to it. And the left must fight because that is its militant faith, but the fighting will progressively be marginalized in the hinterlands and mountains, far from the areas of commerce, industry and agriculture.

Preparing the framework for recovery and progress was itself a very difficult task. Striking a balance between the priority of immediate relief to the people, injecting life into a listless economy, and satisfying the insistent demands of our creditors, which at times were inconsistent with each other, was an especially arduous task.

The Medium Term Philippine Development Plan has sought to address these and other problems, and has set as our primary objective, a sustained growth based on balanced agro-industrial activities. The creation of new jobs and the attraction of foreign investments became the principal elements of our strategy.

On debt repayment, we have sought and obtained the agreement of our creditors to a short breathing spell via the restructuring of a significant portion of our outstanding debts so that we can allocate more resources to poverty alleviation, and other urgent needs of our people. Yet we continue to search for fresh options that will lighten the debt burden during this critical period, and help us achieve the progress that will, in the end, better assure the fulfillment of our obligations. I hope that the explanations I have made will inspire the international financial system, represented here, to cooperate with us even more closely in finding these fresh options, and, of course, in helping us recover what we lost.

A key element of the Program is job creation on a massive scale to absorb the 750,000 new entrants to the labor force every year, not to mention the large number of the already unemployed.

This brings us to the question of labor. Here let me digress for a moment. The restoration of full, genuine democracy tempted the extremists in the labor movement to test the limits of their new rights and liberties. 1986 saw a distressing increase in strikes. Our careful handling of labor unrest in the spirit of the new tolerance was taken as a sign of meekness and surrender. Our appeals for sobriety and reason were ignored. Last year, I lowered the boom on this exuberance and ordered the strict enforcement of the labor laws in the spirit of their true intent: as affording protection equally to labor and management. The number of strikes dropped by 70 percent. But there still are strikes, businesses still have labor problems, but that is only because ours will not be a slave economy, and our people shall enjoy many of the same rights, even if not yet the same prosperity, as labor in your own countries.

We shall not achieve progress by the exploitation of a labor force whose skill, industry and commitment to work, given decent treatment, are the match of any in the world. But we shall insist that once the terms of employment are accepted, they will be upheld and enforced. Industrial peace means agreement and cooperation, not the subjection of the worker or the intimidation of management. Although these are not hardnosed business concepts, we aim for progress and justice for all in a climate of freedom.

Thus, last Friday, I signed the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program the effect of which will be the progressive redistribution of land on a more equitable basis. Its higher aim, however, is greater productivity in agriculture and higher incomes for the farmers to create the markets for the industries we want to see rise up in our country.

But there are more markets within reach than the domestic in the Philippines. We are in the most promising part of the world, in the Pacific whose century is coming. Not surprisingly therefore export is a prominent component of our strategy. We have started to recover many of the markets we had lost. Still, our 18 percent growth in exports is not enough to meet the foreign exchange requirements we have projected. We have set ourselves higher targets in the expectation of making exports the source of sustained growth in the long term.

The flow of investments has increased. We are heartened to note that most of it is Filipino. This is a confident sign: those who know the country best have regained faith in its future.

We have tried to create an attractive investment climate by offering incentives, and, more effectively, by removing disincentives such as the elimination of monopolies and the withdrawal of the public sector from the economy. We have reduced red tape and other causes of delay, and adopted an import liberalization program that will enhance the efficiency of Filipino industry by exposing it to the challenge of fair foreign competition.

The construction of roads, bridges, communications is opening up more of the country for private enterprise.

The nation has put its shoulder to the wheel. The serious work has started and we invite you to join in the effort, and pitch in with the capital, and know how we need. Foreign investments and foreign technology must complement our efforts to achieve the prosperity that we can all enjoy in the country that you too will come to love.

Thank you and good evening.

Response of President Corazon Aquino to the toast of Mr. Blanchard of Geneva Response
of

President of the Philippines
To the toast of Mr. Blanchard of Geneva

[Delivered on June 14, 1988]

A TOAST TO FRIENDSHIP

It was a great honor and pleasure to address the ILO. The occasion allowed me to share with you the experiences of a country which, in the words of some of you, is emerging like a phoenix from its ashes.

We have drawn much strength and encouragement from international support, such as you and the ILO have shown to us.

Mr. Director-General and friends who are here with us, what we have done in our country merely prepares the way for the great tasks ahead, tasks whose difficulty may show that man to have been right who said, "Winning freedom was the easy part. The hard part is knowing what to do with it." In our case, it is making freedom meaningful to the vast number of our poor. Still, our experiences give humanity reason always to hope and to believe that we have not seen the last of human courage and creativity.

The ILO faces equally formidable tasks of translating the formal victory of human rights, through their embodiment in its conventions, into a better life for the working people of the world. In return for your hospitality, I offer only that hope which our Revolution symbolizes: the inexhaustibility of human courage, creativity, and commitment to good.

Again, my sincere thanks.

May I now invite everyone to join me in wishing Mr. Blanchard continued success in his work and good health.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the Filipino community in Italy

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Filipino community in Italy

[Delivered in Rome, June 16, 1988]

PROTECTING THE DIGNITY OF FILIPINO LABOR

The President acknowledges the hardwork and remittances of the expatriate Filipino worker, the largest amount of foreign exchange compared to any other sector. She announces some necessary initiatives taken with the host government to protect the migrant workers. Among these is a bilateral agreement for social security coverage for non-Italian employees.

Mga minamahal kong kababayan. Isang kasiyahan para sa akin ang makapiling kayo sa araw na ito.

I had heard about the large Filipino community in Italy and have long wanted to visit with you. It was one of the strongest reasons for the serious thought I gave to coming over for the canonization of Lorenzo Ruiz and for my deep disappointment when I had to postpone our meeting. As you know, some people back home had other ideas about who should be running our country and how it should be run. They thought the February Revolution meant only a change of dictatorships, from the rule of one man in a barong to the rule of a junta in fatigues. So I stayed behind to set them right.

Still, better late than never. I am very happy to be here with you. I understand that this is the largest Filipino community in Europe, numbering some 70,000. But it is not just your far-flung reputation for hard work, skill and probity that has called attention to yourselves and imposed upon your government back home the obligation to see to it that you are accorded the rights and privileges you deserve in a foreign land.

When I spoke to the Filipino workers in Hong Kong, I called them the unsung heroes of the country. For the hardwork and remittances of the expatriate Filipino worker have brought in, compared to any other sector, the largest amount of foreign exchange, which is so essential to the servicing of our foreign debt. That debt which our unlamented past rulers stole.

This was not the first tribute I paid to your sacrifices, for when I posed the question to the U.S. Congress, "Must we pay for the debt with the sweat of our men's faces?" I had you in mind, for your labors are made heavier by being away from home. I know what it is like to have to live away from one's country.

The whole world saw how Filipinos won back freedom, and wondered at their courage and faith. That unprecedented and still unmatched event conferred upon the Filipino everywhere a dignity that all must recognize. I know that that achievement was a spiritual and political one, and that world consists even more importantly, in its eyes, of harsh economic realities.

We are still poor and our people must still go where they can to provide themselves with the material means to live decently. Many of us have had to seek those means abroad, far from the protection of our laws and the care and concern of family and friends. I have been very concerned that this lack of protection has in many cases stripped Filipinos of their dignity.

They have been abused with regard to wages, conditions of work, and even with regard to the integrity and honor of their persons. Every abuse of Filipinos' rights, I feel, erodes the foundation of the Filipinos' new dignity. I have therefore taken the necessary initiatives with host governments to protect that dignity. The government of the Republic of Italy has been most cooperative. I understand that there are already improvements, among them an amnesty law. The Welfare Fund has established a Filipino Workers Social Center in Rome to attend to your problems. We continue to work for better terms of employment for you in Italy. And we are working towards a bilateral agreement for social security coverage for non-Italian workers. Of course, we are guests here and there is only so much your government can do. This is not our country. But precisely because we are guests, we are assured of the protection, help and friendship of our Italian hosts, for there are few peoples so warm and caring and generous, and who truly understand, because of their own experiences, what we are going through as a young nation and a new democracy.

We have so much in common with our Italian brothers and sisters: the same saga of liberation from foreign enemies, the same faltering attempts to achieve national unity, the same tragic experience of local tyranny, the same epic of mass emigration to preserve, in times of trouble, the best of the Italian spirit: hardwork, ingenuity, skill, and adaptability to all circumstances anywhere in the world. As they once prayed and worked for the decent treatment of their sons abroad, so do we now invoke that memory in asking them to help the Filipinos in Italy.

I am proud to join you in thanking the Italian government and people for their warm and generous welcome and hospitality. I wish you, my brothers and sisters, every success. I pray for you, and hope that you will do the same for me.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Confindustria, June 17, 1988

IDEAL CLIMATE FOR INVESTMENTS

With a reinvigorated economy and its relative immunity from any political turbulence in the region, the Philippines deserves serious consideration as a most promising country to invest in. The President tells her audience that the Italian industry will find ideal conditions for setting up plants in the Philippines.

Two years after the Revolution which many of you followed on television and on the front pages of the newspapers, another, quieter revolution has been taking place in the Philippines. A revolution in the political attitudes of the vast majority of Filipinos and in the remarkable exertions they are making to achieve economic recovery quickly.

Quite as remarkable as stopping tanks with prayers, is the picture of virtually a whole population taking democratic elections seriously and jealously defending their new democracy – thereby providing the surest basis for enduring social stability and order.

Western analysts had predicted that the peaceful February Revolution was a flash in the pan, that the Filipino people would sink back into lethargy and indifference to the fate of their new democracy and their country. In the past two years, as essential democratic institutions were firmly implanted in swift succession, that prediction has turned out to be totally false.

In less than two years, we had a new Constitution and had had it ratified in a referendum participated in by virtually the entire voting population. We elected a Congress with almost the same record turnout, and then all the local governments.

We did not neglect the economy. On the contrary, we knew that its plundered and devastated condition required immediate attention. Following a medium-term plan, whose preparation was in itself a very difficult task, we reversed the negative growth trend the economy had been posting for three years previous, and by 1987 achieved a growth rate of 5.6% in real terms. In the first quarter of this year, we posted a real growth rate of 7.5%.

This was done against the backdrop of persistent rightist attempts to seize the government and a continuing Communist insurgency. In August last year, the right made its strongest bid for power in a ruthless assault on the Presidential Palace. The attack was repulsed and the coup was crushed. Its instigators have been captured or are being hunted; at any rate, I can say without any reservation that they are finished as credible threats, not only of another coup but even of any measure of destabilization.

We tried to negotiate a peaceful settlement of the Communist insurgency and invited its representatives to talks. This was interpreted by the Right as naivete and by the Communists as surrender. The exercise failed to achieve a settlement, but turned out to be a success in other respects. The gesture convinced many in the countryside that the government was serious about wanting peace and addressing the issues that had fueled the rebellion. At any rate, the resumption and escalation of military offensives and urban raids should have convinced the insurgent leadership and the Right that I will take peace only on terms that respect our Constitution and our traditional values and way of life.

A few months ago, the military captured the top leadership of the insurgency. Documents seized in urban raids now show a much diminished insurgent force.

No one can dispute the facts now: there is order, predictability, and freedom in the Philippines, as well as a reinvigorated economy. Given its strategic location in Southeast Asia, its relative immunity from any political turbulence in the region, and the skill and industry of its labor force, the Philippines deserves serious consideration as a most promising country to invest in. Perhaps the best indication of this is the rate at which Filipinos are investing in their own country, reversing a pattern of capital flight that antedated even the dictatorship and the instability it created.

Italian industry, with its wide range of manufactured products and technology, will find ideal conditions for setting up plants in the Philippines, which offers not only its rapidly expanding markets but also the equally promising and easily accessible markets of the region.

We have been studying with deep interest both the products and the methods of Italian industry, especially the important part played by small and medium enterprises in Italian progress. We have watched the growth of these sectors in the Italian economy with great interest and admiration, remarking both the excellent quality of their products and their efficient methods and resiliency.

The European business community is presently the third largest investor in the country. Italy, however, has been one of the smallest investors. We invite you to come to our country and study its prospects for yourselves. You will experience not only its traditional hospitality, but an environment in which you will find yourselves very much at home.

Thank you and good day.

Message of President Corazon Aquino in Vatican, June 18, 1988

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
In Vatican

[Released on June 18, 1988]

GOD WALKS WITH US

Thru the power of faith, the Filipinos won back their freedom. The President says it is this faith which also sustains her in all trials and continues to hold her up under the pressure of high office. She thanks the Holy Father for championing the cause of poor nations. She believes that in the midst of great difficulties there is that profound assurance that God walks with us.

I am specially happy on the occasion of this visit. For I stand here both as chief of state and as the leader of a people of faith, who won back their freedom through the power of that faith. It is the faith also that sustained me in all my trials, and which continues to hold me up under the pressures of high office and in the face of those who continue to oppose the humane, and essentially Christian, principles and democratic aspirations of my people.

I bring with me the love and gratitude of the Filipino people: for His Holiness' visit to the Philippines in 1981, for the canonization of St. Lorenzo Ruiz last year, and for his prayers during the February Revolution, when God's hand, working through the multitude of men, women and children, snatched my country from the edge of calamity and gently set it down in peace and freedom.

I thank the Church for sending so many missionaries over the centuries who labored to save souls, enrich our art and culture, foster learning among our young. And, with our Muslim brothers, they gave shape to the general character of the Filipino nation.

I also thank the Holy Father for championing the cause of poor nations. He has spoken eloquently of their plight and of the need for measures to lift their peoples to their proper dignity as God's children. He has shed the light of his wisdom equally on the great issues of the world today: on the international debt, on human rights, on the self-determination of peoples, on nuclear arms, on social justice and on economic development. We have listened to his words with great profit and he shall find them reflected in the policies of our government.

Thus, in reviewing our accomplishments since the Revolution, we have adhered to the following principles:

First, that development must enhance the well-being and dignity of Filipinos from every walk of life, so that the nation's material progress must be matched by the Filipino's spiritual development.

Second, development must promote the unity of the nation and solidarity among the people. We will not follow a developmental path that accepts exploitation and class hatred as a necessary price. It must be fair to all, yet lean in favor of the poor who need to be helped.

Third, development must restore and preserve the values that distinguish the Filipino nation: faith in God and in the power of prayer, industry and honesty, love of country, and respect for the unity of the family.

Fourth, development must increase our capability to stand on our own, to be self-reliant and autonomous in the world, so that we can be useful and helpful members of the community of nations.

Fifth, development must promote private enterprise and initiative, consistent with the common good and our democratic institutions. Government will play a complementary and supportive role to ensure that our development goals are met in accordance with these development principles.

In conclusion, I believe that peace will come only through authentic development that fosters justice and solidarity. Development by any other path will lead only to violence and tyranny, of the left or of the right.

In the midst of great difficulties, we tread our way to the future with a profound assurance drawn from our conviction that God walks with us, and guides us in the darkness with the teachings of His Church.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the UP Alumni Association Oblation Award Conferment Rites, June 24, 1988

UP Alumni Association
Oblation Award
Conferment Rites
June 24, 1988

NINYO AND THE OBLATION AWARD

Ninoy followed the longer, rougher road to heroism and martyrdom. The President in getting the Oblation Award for Ninoy, the highest accolade U.P. can possibly bestow on an alumnus, proudly asserts that knowing her husband, he's fully convinced he deserves this award.

It is certainly a distinct honor and pleasure to be with you today.

One thing you can certainly say about Ninoy. He always got more than he bargained for. While he was a law student at the University of the Philippines, Ninoy set about to accomplish a number of things. He became the star reporter of The Manila Times, one of the country's leading dailies; he became the youngest correspondent to cover the war in Korea; he even won the heart of another law student who eventually married him and got more out of her life with him than she bargained for. If there was one thing he did not manage to do at the University of the Philippines, it was to finish his studies and get his degree.

I can almost hear him saying now, and not without a hint of his usual braggadocio: "You see, I did one better. I got the Oblation Award, the highest accolade the University can possibly bestow on an alumnus."

I understand that the five previous recipients of the award have either been presidents of the university or Presidents of the Republic. Certainly all have had a direct hand in the shaping of the University and were intimately acquainted with its affairs. Ninoy was only 17 when he left for the war in Korea. In 1949, I understand, the U.P. Oblation statue made its famous journey from the old university grounds in Padre Faura to its permanent home in Diliman, Quezon City.

Ninoy may not have been there when the Oblation was set on its foundation to become the symbol of everything the University of the Philippines stands for. But the spirit and ideals that guided its sculptor, Guillermo Tolentino, were as firmly imbedded in Ninoy's heart as they are engraved in bronze at the base of the Oblation today.

That spirit is contained in the second stanza of Rizal's "Mi Ultimo Adios." As the martyr wrote: "On the fields of battle, in the fury of the fight, others give you their lives without pain or hesitancy. The place does not matter; cypress, laurel, lily white, scaffold, open field, conflict or martyrdom's site, it is the same if asked by the home and country."

And as I said, Ninoy got more than he bargained for. He had originally set his sights to lead his republic. Instead, he followed the longer, rougher road to heroism and martyrdom. Guillermo Tolentino's interpretation of Rizal's vision of martyrdom is that of a young man free of all encumbrances. He no longer looks behind or ahead, or at the conditions immediately surrounding him. Instead, his face is lifted to the sky, his arms outstretched as he gloriously offers himself for the loftier purposes of the Almighty. Those purposes went beyond the shattered dreams of Rizal's or Ninoy's time, and took shape in a surge towards freedom that remains the driving force of the University of the Philippines today.

There were, of course, times when the Oblation seemed less to look upwards and beyond than away from the confusion and rage that attended some of the more turbulent years of the University of the Philippines. On various occasions, the statue was blindfolded, draped with a skirt, or smeared with paint by campus activists protesting not only the policies of the university of the state, but the vision and direction of the state that sustained it.

Those years, I believe, are over. May the Oblation stand from hereon as it was meant to – naked and unfettered, solid as the foundations upon which the country and its foremost college, now stand.

Ninoy was very proud to have been a student of the University of the Philippines. In behalf of the Aquino family, let me express our heartfelt gratitude for the great honor you have bestowed on Ninoy. I am sure that Ninoy is not only flattered, but if I know him, he's also fully convinced he deserves this award.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 90th Philippine Navy Foundation Day, June 27, 1988

90th Philippine Navy Foundation Day
June 27, 1988

MULTIPLE ROLES OF THE PHILIPPINE NAVY

The President lauds the many roles played by the Philippine Navy in securing the nation from internal and external threats. She urges them to continue their innovative work in building a self-reliant navy and commends its institutional adaptability in the employment of indigenous watercraft.

As Commander-in-Chief of all Armed Forces of the Philippines, I am delighted to join you, the Philippine Navy, in celebrating the 90th anniversary of your foundation.

Anniversaries are milestones in one's life. They are occasions for festive affairs. They are also occasions for reflection: to take stock of the past, ponder on the present, and scan the future.

In my talks before the commands of our Armed Forces, I have stressed the constitutional principle that civilian authority is, at all times, supreme over the military.

I have emphasized that policy making is the province of the civilian government. Consequently, military policies should flow from the directions and priorities set by the civilian authorities. The defense institutions should pursue programs consistent with these national policies.

I have directed the various commands, in our collective task of removing the elements of insurgency from our midsts, to unleash the weapons of war. Force must be met by force.

On the other hand, I have asked them to receive, with temperance and compassion, those who wish to mend their ways and return to the fold of the law.

We are aware that insurgency, with its ideology of violence and anger, must be met by implacable force. At the same time, we must also win our people's support.

In this way, we will then be able to deprive the insurgents of the substance that sustains their mindless and destructive pursuit for power.

I am happy to note that Commodore Carlito Cunanan, has instilled these principles in the Philippine Navy.

We are all aware that, in view of our archipelagic geography, maritime affairs are of prime importance to our people. Through the highways of our seas, goods, ideas, and people sail from one island to another. Through these sea arteries are woven the threads that now bind us in our nationhood.

These sea routes and marine resources continue to serve our country's current efforts for progress and development. Our seas continue to produce bountiful yields to feed our people and earn precious foreign exchange.

But the expanse and bounty of our seas have attracted the unwanted attention of fleets from other countries. Meanwhile, our own fishing fleets have been endangered in our own waters by the activities of other nations.

I am aware that, in our pursuit for peace and a better life for our people, the Philippine Navy performs multiple roles. It assists in the tasks of national development. It helps in securing the nation from internal and external threats.

And, in the current insurgency problem, it carries its share in the twin-pronged effort of facing up to the forces that threaten national security and inculcating hope and confidence among our people.

The Philippine Navy has been performing a yeoman's job in these tasks. When one considers the constraints imposed by our country's limited resources, your performance is even more commendable.

The expansion of the Philippine Navy is not only desirable but also necessary. I wholeheartedly support this intent.

Our Navy has many needs. This situation is quite widespread among our government institutions. The fact is that we need much courage and more resources to address the many social and economic needs of our people. And as we are still in the process of recovery, we have to replenish our coffers.

Thus, the present circumstances of the economy exhort us to tighten our belts, and spend less today so we may have more tomorrow.

There are indeed many demands on our government's scarce resources. It is fortunate that some of our friends from across the seas have been generous in their concern for us.

For the present, therefore, I would urge you to continue in your creative optimization of available resources.

I urge you to continue in your innovative work. I certainly applaud and appreciate your efforts to do more with less.

I commend the present efforts to build a self-reliant Navy. As in many large endeavors, the initial steps must be taken. Our demonstrated capability to produce our own patrol craft should be further enhanced.

I commend your institutional adaptability in the employment of indigenous watercraft. This is a clear example of using innovation to enable us to face the enemies wherever they are.

We should have more of these innovations. These are proofs that we have not allowed ourselves to be imprisoned by the limits of the present.

Rather, the Filipino people has built on the strengths of the present to expand the horizons of the future.

Thus, through the exercise of our collective intellect, and a strong abiding faith in the Almighty, we have converted the difficulties of the present into opportunities to innovate, to seek new ways of doing things. We have surmounted the limits of physical resources to achieve not only higher levels of productivity and efficiency, but our ideals and aspirations as a people.

Accordingly, I am inspired to ask Commodore Cunanan, along with his gallant officers and men, to prepare plans for the Navy's future expansion.

It is an expansion that should be reflected not only in the size and variety of the vessels in its fleet. It should take into account the additional tasks the Navy has to perform, as required by the demands of national security and national development.

These plans should serve as the recommended blueprint for the growth and development in our Navy. They should be consistent with the anticipated growth and recovery of our economy. They should be suited to the particular and specific conditions of our country.

These plans should cover a number of years. The plans should indicate the gradual modernization of our fleet and the acquisition by our Navy of the technology required in shipbuilding, repair and maintenance.

The plans should indicate an optimum mix of the use of indigenous watercraft and technology, alongside with the technology to be transferred from other countries and their adaptation to our local and specific requirements.

It should, likewise, anticipate developments now brewing in the southwestern frontiers of our country.

The plans should also consider the need to protect our waters from poachers. It should include measures that will enable us to police our waters.

We must maintain our vigilance against the smugglers and other nefarious elements who seek to undermine our nation's political and economic stability.

I will look forward to these plans.

Meanwhile, I urge Commodore Cunanan to persevere in his programs to establish and maintain a professional, decentralized, streamlined and welfare-oriented Navy.

The way may be arduous. The needs are many. And the resources are few. But we, as a people, accomplished in the EDSA Revolution what was deemed impossible.

Through a deeply-rooted faith, unity of spirit, and dint of effort, we succeeded in restoring democracy in our country. It is a feat that continues to inspire the admiration of many peoples from other countries.

Let us tap into these veins of creativity and determination to produce a Navy that can, as an instrument of national policy, hasten the attainment of our national aspirations.

Such a Navy will help ensure that the democracy we restored with so much hardship and sacrifice will stay rooted in our land.

To all of you, officers and men of the Philippine Navy, my warmest greetings and best wishes on your 90th Anniversary.

Congratulations again and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino Addressing the Underdevelopment of Region 8 on her Samar Visit, July 8, 1988

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Addressing the Underdevelopment of Region 8 on her Samar Visit

[July 8, 1988]

A number of essential infrastructure projects have been set in place including health and education services to insure the development of Region 8. The President cites all efforts to address the endemic underdevelopment of the region in her determined effort to lift the area to the prosperity envisioned for all the people.

Mga hinigugma-on kong mga tagabonto.

A-anhi ako ha iyo para ipagpadayon han mga consultasyon dinhi ha Region 8.

Nakahistorya ko na an iyo representante ha Congreso, pati an iyo mga local opisyaes. Pero maruyog ako na ako mismo ang makasabut it iyo mga problema, ngan kon ano na paagi it aton gobyerno makakabilig ha iyo nga tanan.

I am here to continue my consultations with Region 8. I have talked to your representatives in Congress and in local governments. Secretary Mita Pardo de Tavera, the CORD for Region 8, has kept me informed of developments here. But there is no substitute for first-hand knowledge from those who know. Being right here, you know better than anyone else what is happening and what is best for you.

Eastern Visayas is one of the least developed and poorest areas in the country. This is a tragic waste of the great potential the region represents.

To tap that potential, we have identified several areas where government should direct its resources and efforts. These areas are infrastructure building, health services, education, security, reforestation and stopping illegal logging, more electrification, more communication services, and more post-harvest facilities.

We have given great attention to these needs. Thus, the budget for public works for Region 8 was increased from P625 million in 1987 to P735 million in 1988. But the problem, I discovered, was not in the amount allocated but in the failure to spend the budget at all. Only P1 38 million of the 1987 budget was spent. So now we are set back two years in meeting the infrastructure requirements of the Region. Care in the selection of projects and in the expenditure of funds is commendable, but the country cannot wait until all the safeguards are in place. I have directed the Department of Public Works to hasten the implementation of projects, and ask the private sector to monitor their progress.

For 1988, we have programmed P566 million for roads and bridges, and P46 million for an improved rural water supply system. In this connection, I have been told that there is duplication of functions between the Catbalogan Water District and the provincial government. This controversy should have been resolved without my intervention, but I now direct Secretary Santos to ensure that the provincial government does not duplicate the work of the Water District.

To bring Free Secondary Education to the Region, we have allocated P42.5 million to take in 73,000 high school students. We have also increased the allocation for school houses and other facilities by 50 percent. The ESF-financed construction of 22 municipal, vocational, and technical high school buildings costing P25 million will start by October this year.

The total budget for the improvement of seven airports in the Region will cost P15.9 million over a 3-year period starting in 1987. P4.3 million will be spent this year. The program covers the improvement and extension of runways, terminals and control towers of the Catarman, Calbayog, Catbalogan, Borongan, Maasim, Ormoc and Hilongos airports.

On the other hand, Public Works will be spending P24 million for the improvement of eight seaports and lighthouses in Tacloban, Ormoc, Calbayog, San Jose Caragian, Catbalogan, Palompon, Maasim, and Borongan.

The Department of Health has completed 24 projects involving the improvement of provincial and district hospitals at the cost of P6.25 million. Nine more hospitals will be upgraded. P3.2 million has been procured out of savings for medicines. The PAGCOR has donated P1 million to the Department of Health Region 8 for the purchase of generic medicines and equipment for public hospitals. There is also the Italian Government's generous TB Assistance Grant in the form of medicines, equipment and funds for medical personnel training.

Government has found the assistance of the private sector indispensable in the reforestation program. Thus, I would like to acknowledge the efforts of the Rotary Club of Tacloban which has agreed with the Department of Natural Resources to help in the reforestation of 100 hectares of denuded upland areas. I would also like to cite the Knights of Columbus of Tanauan, Leyte, which has committed to help in the seedling propagation program of the DENR.

The private sector has been most helpful in the catching of illegal loggers by informing on them to the authorities. Through their vigilance, we confiscated 5,600 cubic meters of illegally logged wood products or the equivalent of 450 ten-wheeler truckloads. I would like to announce that by virtue of EO 277, we shall award as much as 20 percent of sales proceeds of contraband to anyone who helps in the apprehension of illegal loggers and timber smugglers.

We have started monitoring gold panning operations in the area to avoid some of the tragic accidents in other regions. An educational drive will be conducted to assist the gold panners.

There has been some improvement in the peace and order situation, which is so essential a component of progress. We have appointed Governor Oscar Tan as Chairman of the Regional Peace and Order Council to act as coordinator for all agencies and the private sector in further improving the security condition of the Region. I ask the people to support them, to lend their eyes and ears to this effort to bring order and progress to their communities.

On rural electrifications shall reduce power rates in all electric cooperatives in Samar from the present high of P4.35 per kilowatt hour to not more than P2.50 kilowatt hour. Last May, the installation of 81 kilometers of transmission lines crossing Ormoc-Baybay, Lemon-Biliran, and the San Juanico Strait was completed. The NEA has programmed the P20 million Amanjuray Mini-Hydro project in Eastern Samar for immediate implementation. As of last month, Leyte 2 and Southern Leyte Electric cooperatives became NPC direct customers which will result in a significant reduction of power rates. 2,000 families will benefit from the operation of generation sets donated by the Australian Government covering three municipalities in Northern Samar. By the end of this year, 10,000 more households will be extended electric power services. The costs of these programs are tremendous and again we shall need the cooperation of the people to help us keep down costs by informing on electricity thieves.

On communications, as of May this year, 95 percent of the five provinces have telegraph facilities. We are finalizing plans for 1,800 digital telephone lines for Ormoc, Borongan, Catarman, and Catbalogan to be operational in three years.

The National Food Authority is operating 17 warehouses in the Region with a total capacity of 50,000 metric tons. Another 1,500 metric tons will be added when we complete the warehouse in Catubig. Two small grain centers in Las Navas and Hilongos will soon be completed and will be turned over to farmers' cooperatives.

From 1986 to June 1988, NFA bought 35,163 metric tons of palay valued at P123 million, an increase of 54 percent from the 1983-1985 level. The NFA has allotted P40 million for palay procurement this year. In addition, the Department of Agriculture is undertaking several programs to increase productivity, such as the Rice Production Enhancement Program which has increased average production by 45 percent per hectare.

This report on our efforts to address the endemic underdevelopment of Region 8 underscores our determination to lift this Region to the prosperity we envision for all our people. It does not sum up by any means the measures needed to achieve that goal. We barely scratch the surface of the problems. But we want our people to know that the commitment is there, and action has started. What better way to do this than by the concrete measures and tangible results thus far achieved.

Gin hahangyo ko ha iyo nga tanan na ipagpadayun an iyo suporta og bulig na gin hahapag ha akon nga hit aton gobyerno. Salamat at mauupay na adlaw ha iyo nga tanan.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Environmentalists, July 11, 1988

Environmentalists
Malacañang
July 11, 1988

THE OTHER FILIPINO

According to the President, the environmentalists are the other kind of Filipino, those whose love of country grows with the sacrifices and contributions they make to its strength and progress and to the preservation of its beauty.

One of the most encouraging signs of the times is the near universal concern for the environment, and the growing number of Filipinos who have committed themselves to its protection. I regard this as a flowering of patriotism. For the object of environmental concern, which is the very land itself, makes it the most fundamental form of patriotism. Indeed, no Filipino should hold back from a total commitment to save the beauty of his country, the richness of its earth, and the purity of its waters for himself and his posterity.

Yet there are those among us who lack this patriotism. They are the ones who have been stripping our country of its natural wealth, leaving nothing for the future but the destitution and ruin that we are already experiencing.

These are the main culprits, yet the focus is always on the poor kaingero. But the random destruction of the kaingin system is merely the revenge of those who have been neglected by their country, even as the floods that sweep away our harvests are the last link in the chain of corruption that has characterized the management of our forest resources. So it is with the drought that inevitably follows. The kaingero will learn civic responsibility only after we show that the big-time ravishers of the environment have been duly punished and their activities curtailed.

I am pleased and honored to have you here because you are the other kind of Filipino. The kind whose love of country grows with the sacrifices and contributions they make to its strength and progress, and to the preservation of its beauty and potentially inexhaustible productivity. The government's environmental program has benefitted greatly from your insights on how we can use our natural resources without destroying the environment, on how we can meet the needs of the present without surrendering the future. For the program derives its strength from people like yourselves.

I thank you for your presence here and commend you again for the noble work you have been doing to keep our country whole. Good day and God bless you!

BE YOURSELF

The President clarifies the role expected of the Assembly members: to react to the professionally prepared plans and projects as ordinary private persons practicing their ordinary professions of lawyer or teacher or farmer. In essence, they are ordinary people speaking directly to a government which is now making a special effort to listen.

Now that you have been sworn into office, I am sure the first question you will be asking yourselves is:

As members of the Cordillera Regional Assembly, what are we expected to do?

We cannot be expected to get involved in the administration of our region, because that is the job of the mayors and governors.

We cannot be expected to draw up and evaluate development projects and programs for the region, because that is the job of the line agencies and the Cordillera executive board.

We cannot be expected to pass laws for the region because that is the job of our six congressmen; and furthermore, we are not elected representatives of the people, as they are.

Finally, we are only given five days to do our work! What can we do in five days except act as a ceremonial rubber stamp on the work done by others? If that is all, why are we wasting the government's money?

II

My dear members of the Cordillera Regional Assembly, I would like to assure you that no one is more conscious than I am of the need to conserve our scarce resources. If we use some of these to support you, it is because you have a very important role in the political development of your region and your country; and you have a central place in my personal political philosophy.

Perhaps the most important thing our recent history teaches us is that politics has become a very specialized profession – so specialized that it is difficult for ordinary people to get into or sometimes even to understand. So specialized that those who have made it their life's work, if they are unscrupulous as well as clever, can use it to manipulate the people rather than to express the people's will.

But our recent history also teaches a more hopeful lesson. The unscrupulous and clever specialists do not always prevail. The people can act together to express their will outside the professional political process, and can defeat the unscrupulous few, no matter how well entrenched.

I have never forgotten that I owe my position to the direct expression of the people's will; and I have constantly sought to incorporate it into our political decision-making process. The basic principle of my administration is that the people have a right to express their will directly to those in power; and they should be able to do this easily and regularly without having to endure hardship and face frightful risk as they once did.

That is why we have regular regional consultations, where all sectors may come forward and face the president directly – and incidentally, I intend to have one in your region as soon as you are organized well enough to make the consultation productive.

That is why we have strengthened the system of regional development councils to give a greater voice to the non-government representatives. In your region's counterpart of these councils, namely the Cordillera Executive Board, you will note that only six out of the twenty-nine members are elected public officials.

That is why we have many other initiatives, such as the people's economic councils and the four pilot provinces where we are trying out more autonomy, all with the objective of decentralizing decision making and going more directly to the people at the grass roots.

III

In this thrust of decentralization, the two autonomous regions are in the forefront; and within the autonomous regions there is a very special role for the Cordillera Regional Assembly.

This role arises precisely because you are not mayors or governors or congressmen or any sort of professional politician.

As I have said, politics is now a very specialized profession, and one who has made it his career has somehow separated himself from the ranks of ordinary people. So much so that on important issues he usually needs to consult the ordinary people and who are his constituents.

The Cordillera Regional Assembly is very different. You represent the people not because they have elected you, but in a simpler and more direct way, because you are the people. Your role is to be not representatives of the people. You do not consult; you are the one who are consulted.

So you can now answer the question, what are you expected to do? The answer is very simple: be yourself.

You are not expected to make laws, because you are not congressmen, and the people have not authorized you to make laws for them.

You are not expected to formulate plans and projects because you are not civil servants or professional public executives.

And when the professional public executives present their plans and projects for your evaluation, you are not expected to return home and consult your constituents because you are not mayors or governors and you have no constituents.

You are expected to be yourself.

This means that you should react to the professionally-prepared plans and projects as ordinary private persons practicing your ordinary professions of lawyer or teacher or farmer or whatever your occupation is. And because there are so many of you in relation to the population of your region, we can be reasonably sure that your reactions will be truly representative.

You should now also be able to understand why the time allotted for your work is so short: five days, or less than one and one-half percent of the year.

This is to better enable you to be yourself. You should regard your service in the Cordillera Regional Assembly as a brief interlude in your ordinary life, which will still take up ninety-eight and a half percent of your time.

That is your special value and your special role: you are ordinary people speaking directly to your government, which is now making a special effort to listen.

In doing this, you will not only be serving your region but also providing a model for the rest of the country. And together we will be showing the world that in our country people power continues to prevail.

Thank you and good morning.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Science and Technology, July 13, 1988

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Science and Technology

[Delivered on July 13, 1988]

ENCOURAGING TECHNOLOGICAL INNOVATIONS

The President exhorts the scientists to recapture some measure of our former eminence in science and technology in Asia. In this respect, government's role is to encourage technological innovations by the private sector through the provision of incentives.

Science and technology in our country is in the same state of neglect as in all developing countries, with this dubious distinction: the neglect is greater here than anywhere else. Yet, 20 years ago, we were second only to Japan in scientific and technological know-how in Asia. The challenge is clear: we must recapture some measure of our former eminence in these fields, if never our former ranking.

The key to progress is science and its technological applications. The history of the developed economies of the world prove this; and the lesson is underscored by the story of the emergence of the Newly Industrialized Countries.

In the highly developed countries, 50 to 70 percent of economic growth is attributable to Science and Technology, while in newly industrializing countries, it is 45 to 55 percent.

We have made it our goal to achieve the status of a newly industrialized country by the year 2000. This will require a consistent minimum 10 percent growth rate in GNP until that year. Only science and technology can help us achieve that.

The economist Robert Solow has shown that 70 percent of the U.S. economic growth from 1940 to 1950 was brought about by technological innovations in industry, encouraged of course by two wars. Certainly, a more modest growth through science and technology is open to us without war.

The role of the government is to encourage technological innovations in areas that the private sector finds too risky and to encourage such innovations by the private sector through the provision of incentives. The private sector today accounts for only 10 to 15 percent of total research and development. This is not enough. We must forge a closer bond between public research and private industry to make up for the slack. I have asked the Science Secretary to give me a report on the situation of Philippine R&D with his recommendations on how government can help.

Meanwhile, we commend the members of the science and technology community for their help in spreading awareness of their critical role in development. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Film Academy of the Philippines, July 14, 1988

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Film Academy of the Philippines

[Delivered at Malacañang on July 14, 1988]

PROTECTING THE INDUSTRY'S PROPERTY RIGHTS

The President considers the film industry as industry and art. She points out that as art, there should be the most minimal influence exerted by the State. She affirms that the era of favoritism has vanished and no favors will be accorded to a favored group. The best option is for government to protect the industry's property rights.

I am deeply honored to be here among you, to receive the Film Academy award. I know that this award has been given for the great improvement in the economic situation of the movie industry as a result of our determined efforts to root out film piracy. The instrument of that protective policy, Mr. Ed Carrascoso, the head of the Videogram Board, is here with us and I would like him to stand up and share the credit of the success of our anti-piracy campaign.

That policy has its roots in our basic philosophy of justice, that people are entitled to the full compensation for their labors, and that it is the duty of the State to make sure that they get it. The anti-film piracy campaign was started in the past administration, yet at no time has its success been so great as now. We should not be surprised, for at the root of the problem then was the favoritism of government for certain individuals and groups engaged in film piracy and sharing the loot with government officials. The new government has tried and succeeded in ending all that in line with my pledge that under my government there will be no fear of undue influence on government by a favored few, and no favors to a favored few either. I would like to regard this award as recognition of our success in keeping that pledge, at least in the film industry.

I am wary of suggesting what role the film industry can play in national development. While films are an industry, they are essentially an art. And in matters of art, there should be only the most minimal conscious influence exerted by the State. I would hesitate to outline how you can contribute to national development, and leave it entirely to you to decide what those contributions can be. I trust in your innate patriotism and know that the mass appeal of Filipino films would not be possible if the industry, especially its actors and actresses, were not motivated by the highest respect and the deepest care for their audience and following. Your fans know you care for them because you give them the best you can.

Except for the role of movie review and censorship which cannot be avoided because the community must insist upon certain moral standards being upheld, I feel that the best thing government can do for the film industry is to protect its property rights and leave it alone to develop its full potential.

I shall study with much sympathy the measures being proposed by Senator Estrada, Congressman Perez and others to help the movie industry. These measures have just been filed I am told. I would like the honorable gentlemen to furnish me with copies of them immediately so they can be studied by the relevant government agencies.

For the rest, as I said, I leave to the industry the configuration of its own future, trusting the good men and women of Filipino films to do what is best for their sector and for the country. I know that some coordination of the industry's efforts are necessary in this regard, and that the Film Academy of the Philippines was established with that end in view. To fully operationalize the Academy, I hereby appoint Atty. Espiridion Laxa as Director-General of the Film Academy of the Philippines and wish you and the Academy, and the film industry in general even greater success. I had better, or I will hear it from Kris. Let me assure you all, you will never lack for an eloquent spokesperson in my government, and in my very home. Good day and God bless you all.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Sugar Industry, July 21, 1988

Sugar Industry
July 21, 1988

A PARTNERSHIP FOR COMMON ADVANCEMENT

The President admonishes the country's sugar planters to study market developments abroad as a reaction to their thinking about a production quota. Government feels that a rational credit policy is probably the best way to rationalize production.

Only four months ago, I appeared before a smaller convention of sugar planters. But this I understand is a bigger affair, in fact the first Joint National Convention of Planters and Millers in many years. I am pleased to note the large attendance and the buoyant mood of the assembly. This is of course what pleases me most, that the occasion is a celebration of great and wholly unexpected achievements.

In October 1986, I expressed before a gathering in Bacolod the government's profound skepticism about the future of the industry. Not only our own economic and agricultural experts, but officials from abroad had grimly assured us that "sugar is finished!"

A look at the sugar industry then confirmed the prognosis. Sugar fetched low prices both here and abroad; access to the U.S. market was severely limited; there was little financing available, and Nasutra back accounts with the industry remained outstanding.

Domestic prices were at less than P200 per picul; world market prices at about 6 cents per pound. Our U.S. quota was down to 150,000 metric tons. Sugar production, from a high of 2.4 million metric tons had dropped to 1.3 million in 1986-87. Areas planted to sugar cane fell from 460,000 hectares to 269,000 hectares, and this was pure abandonment, not planned diversification. Hunger stalked these abandoned lands, in which insurgency quite naturally began to grow.

We were told that no help should be extended to the sugar industry because it would create false hopes and therefore cause delay in the diversification to other crops which was insistently demanded by these experts and officials.

I felt however that government had to offer some help and so I pledged to get government off the back of the sugar industry and return the initiative in sugar back to the people who are in sugar. Nasutra was dismantled. I then issued directions for the organization of a task force to oversee the restructuring of the industry.

After many consultations, I issued Executive Order No. 18. This is the law which struck down Philsucom and erected in its place the leaner and more effective Sugar Regulatory Administration, and two private foundations for research and socio-economic programs.

But the essence of my approach was to leave the industry to take care of itself, sink or swim; prove its mettle or its critics correct. I am proud to say that sugar came through with flying colors.

To a great extent, of course, the recovery of sugar was a consequence of the general improvement of the economy. The expanding purchasing power in the countryside revived a corresponding demand for sugar. From 800,000 metric tons for domestic consumption, we are now approaching 1.4 million metric tons. This was not only an injection of life but a reorientation of the industry away from over-dependence on the U.S. market. Domestic demand took virtually the entire production of sugar, compelling us to import for our commitments. The importation also eased the upward pressure on domestic prices that might have forced industrial users to switch to substitutes as they have done abroad.

It was a wise move, events have shown. Had we not closed the import contract with Thailand early enough, we might have been caught in the rising spiral of world sugar prices that came soon after. I understand that the price is now 14 cents a pound.

I know that this was an unpopular measure among you. But I think we must agree in retrospect it was a wise move.

Now I am told that you are worried about a production surplus and are thinking of a production quota "to rationalize the industry." I put that in quotes because it reminds me of past "rationalizations" of agricultural crops.

I suggest you give this proposal a long, hard look. Think of the timing. Study market developments abroad, and of a domestic economy that is definitely on the upswing. Consider your own experiences with "rationalizations," and of moves abroad away from market interventions.

Government feels that a rational credit policy is probably the best way to rationalize production. We have done away with the politically motivated liberal credit policies of the state banks in the past and have prescribed normal credit standards in the approval of your loans. Market forces throughout economy will dictate more wisely than anything else in the directions sugar should take.

The problem of insurgency in the sugar areas, and in other parts of our country is of course ever present in our deliberations. New military initiatives are planned, of which I shall speak on other occasions. For now let me say that the best cure for the insurgency is development and justice, a better life for the great body of our people.

With special regard to sugar, let me say that your best security lies in the care you take of the people who work for you. Give them a decent and livable wage; go among them and learn their needs and problems. Transform the sugar industry in a general partnership of worker, planter and miller working for their common advancement.

In the larger context, I ask you to take a sober view of the present "boom" as part of a cycle of ups and downs, and to prepare for both a further improvement in the industry and a downswing that seems built into it. Do not be complacent. Learn from the past.

The introduction of high yielding varieties and the wider adoption of more rational practices in the field can no longer be postponed. The milling sector must also respond by upgrading their plants so that the sugar in the fields is not lost in the mill before it ends up in your coffee.

Per capita domestic consumption of sugar can be raised through more efficient distribution. The elimination of occasional shortages in certain areas in the country will result in a steadier expansion of the market.

Now is probably the time to consider establishing a buffer stock to take advantage of market developments abroad and ensure the sufficiency of local supply. The venture will of course be funded by you. Yet, let me emphasize again that government stands ready to help.

I created an Inter-Agency Committee on Sugar to provide a mechanism for the identification and resolution of problems in the industry. This agency is meant to represent you in the councils of government. Use it to your fullest advantage.

The ownership of the Republic Planters Bank has been resolved. It will be rehabilitated and its expertise in sugar financing will be tapped to assist you. In time it will be privatized consonant with standing policy.

CARP is now in place. I know that many of you are not happy with it even as a concept, let alone with the details of the new law. I don't think my talking to you now will make you change your minds but I do ask you to keep an open mind about it. It is a reality that cannot be escaped, but more fruitfully, I ask you to consider it as a challenge you are willing to take up: a challenge to make all the people of the sugar areas partners in the general progress of the industry. It cannot go on as it has done for centuries. The world is swiftly changing, and so must we. The new spirit in the land demands a more meaningful sharing in the good things of life. Let us not begrudge that. The age of masters and men is over. A sense of brotherhood with our fellow Filipinos from all walks of life is more in keeping with the time. More and more planters are acquiring this sense of fraternity, this willingness to share as shown by the improved standard of living in the countryside, the increase in the purchasing power of rural folk.

I thank you for inviting me to address you. Good day and God bless you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Agrarian Reform, July 22, 1988

Agrarian Reform July 22, 1988

LAND OF ALL OUR PEOPLE

Agrarian reform hopefully will raise up the seven million families below the poverty line. The President intimates her ambition to increase agricultural productivity, improve rural incomes and make agriculture the spearhead of economic development.

Today marks the passage of one year since I promulgated the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program setting the aim of liberating the tremendous potential wealth of Philippine agriculture by giving the vast body of our people a real and rightful stake in the land. One year is not a long time when one is talking about the fundamental restructuring of a country's economic system. But it must seem an eternity to those who have waited for decades, to a class that has suffered for centuries, for the promise of the soil to come true.

The process of change in a democracy is not an easy one. The move has been slow and difficult from aspiration to articulation in the Constitution, to the enabling act in my executive order and in a law in Congress. After that comes the even more grinding process of implementation in the context of a country strapped for resources, short of efficiency in the various departments of government, and riven still by competing interests on the land.

The reform laws now on the books were a significant and essential step, but the journey is only the beginning. And the way will continue to be hard. But the aim makes it all worthwhile: making this democratic country of ours truly the land of all our people, of the few who are rich and of the multitudes who remain poor.

We must raise up the seven million families below the poverty line so they can see the future we want for us all. We look to agrarian reform to bring this about.

We shall need to acquire and redistribute for Phase One some one million four hundred fifty-four thousand hectares from now until 1992 among nearly eight hundred thousand beneficiaries. With Phase 2, we shall need to redistribute to some 3.7 million beneficiaries about 169,000 hectares in 1988, and over 2.5 million a year from 1989 to 1992.

In the matter of redistributing the land, we have done more than all previous administrations, but it was never my aim to just redistribute poverty. My ambition for our country is to increase agricultural productivity, improve rural incomes, and make agriculture the spearhead of economic development.

So, indeed, much remains to be done. The effort comprehends not only initiatives in agriculture but in every other field as well, of which I shall speak when I deliver the State of the Nation next week.

For today, let me congratulate the Department of Agrarian Reform for the work it has done so far. I commend the dedication of its workers and look forward to even greater success in the years to come. Good day and God bless you all.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Manggahan Floodway Project, July 22, 1988 Manggahan Floodway Project
Pasig, Metro Manila
July 22, 1988

MAKING MANILA A FAIR CITY

The Manggahan Floodway alone cannot solve the recurring flood problem of Manila. The most important part of the solution belongs to the local governments of Metro Manila and to the people.

This project is truly godsent. Floods have been the bane of Manila since population and waste increased beyond its inherent capability to handle them. Each year, almost a billion pesos are lost as a result of floods. The Manggahan Floodway goes a long way towards the final elimination of this endemic problem. We have much to thank the Japanese Government through Ambassador Tsuneo Tanaka for its critical and invaluable contribution in making it happen.

Yet this imposing project will not solve the problem. The most important part of the solution is the hardest, yet it costs next to nothing. That part is the part that belongs to the local governments of Metro Manila and to the people of this great city. Studies show that 2,034 cubic meters of garbage are shamelessly thrown by the inhabitants of Manila into the drainage network. To this glaring example of lack of self-respect, we must add the selfish and narrow perspective of urban developers who fail to provide adequate drainage facilities in their projects.

Let's stop blaming Public Works for the annual calamities that visit this city during the wet season. Let's look to ourselves and to our local government for the solution. That solution is cheap. Let us respect our own surroundings by keeping them clean, by disposing of our garbage properly, and by demanding of our local governments the attention they owe their people.

The national government will continue to do its part. We are studying a program to improve the natural drainage capacity of our rivers, esteros and creeks which drain 80 percent of Metro Manila.

I urge all our people here in the city to do their part in making Manila the fair city and capital it once was.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the BIR Anniversary, August 1, 1988

BIR Anniversary
August 1, 1988

NOT A POPULARITY CONTEST

President Aquino recognizes the tough job the BIR handles. She states that popularity is not that important so long that the job is done, in the right perspective. According to her, doing good work in government is the opposite of a popularity contest.

Most of my time in government is spent with people who spend money. Cabinet secretaries of the line and staff departments spend their time drawing up programs for the public improvement that cost hundreds of millions, if not billions, of pesos. When things don't improve, they blame the lack of money for it and cast a sour eye on the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Today, for a change, I'm pleased to meet with the people whose job it is to raise this money.

The people of the BIR hold perhaps one of the toughest and most critical jobs in the government. Without them, all the best-laid plans would come to nothing.

The rest of government look to the BIR to give them the fuel that will make programs move. This puts a great deal of pressure on the Bureau to perform.

But pressure on the Bureau comes not only from on top, but equally and perhaps worse from below, from the public. I say yours is a tough job because the public from whom you must collect the revenues of government are far from being cooperative and happy. As the saying goes, there are two things people dread and feel they cannot escape: death and the tax collector.

I am here today to change that saying into "death and the payment of taxes." That is how it is in the advanced countries of the world: the payment of taxes is unavoidable, like the day of reckoning. If we want to become a modern country with all the amenities, we must advance that day to now.

This goal will not make you popular. But you should be used to it.

Since Biblical times, the tax collector was intensely disliked. The only modern parallel I can think of is the dentist. And the analogy is striking: the task of pulling out for their own good something to which people are intensely attached, their teeth and their money.

Unlike in other posts in government, doing your duty well will not earn you plaudits, but brickbats. Not surprisingly, one is tempted to compromise, to relax, to make friends instead of enemies among the public because life can be lonely. I speak from experience when I say, doing good work in government is the opposite of a popularity contest.

But never mind. For no less than Christ chose among his first followers a tax-collector. Of course, he had him stop collecting taxes, but nevertheless it still means that however unpopular tax-collecting may be, it does not, contrary to common belief, condemn your soul.

I too am calling you to follow a path: the path of diligent work in the task to which you are called: not to give, but to take. Not for yourselves, but for the country. And no more, and no less, than what the law says you should.

You have been doing good work. Do more. We need it. It will be unpopular, and it will be lonely going. But that is the price of honesty in public service. The opposite is worse. Because I may find out. And then, it will really be much lonelier and harder for you.

I am particularly demanding because of one added pressure in your job. The public gauges the honesty of government by the conduct of this Bureau. You are the barometer of integrity. It is just like the Bureau of Customs, whose job is the same as yours.

I want this government to be remembered as the most honest in our history. That achievement must be recorded first and foremost in this Bureau. And so I and our people look to you for this historic first. That will be your burden, but I think also, for most of you, it will be your greatest honor and challenge. I congratulate you on your anniversary and wish you continued success.

God bless you all.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Martha's Vineyard, August 3, 1988

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Martha's Vineyard

[Released on August 3, 1988]

LIGHTENING POVERTY

The President is happy to see the Marthas still hard at work; that their ranks have even swelled with new members. She reminds them of the real reason why we work: the aim of a Christian is Christ himself, that whatever we do to the least of our brethren we do unto Him.

I am happy to see you all again. When I last addressed the workers of Martha's Vineyard two years ago, we were just enjoying the fruits of our peaceful revolution and were planting the seeds of a new harvest. One that might yield us unity and peace, and a better life for the millions of our impoverished countrymen.

I'm glad that the Marthas I met then are still hard at work, and that your ranks have even swelled with new members. I hope that in the months and years to come, more and more will hear your call to serve, and give more generously, not only of their material resources but of their time, energy and prayers. As the scriptures tell us the work is so much, but the workers are so few.

As an honorary member of your group, and as one called to tend a larger vineyard, I know how hard the work of a Martha can be. As we all have learned since we started afresh in Eighty-six, the time of planting and nurturing is the longest and most difficult period of all. First we must break new ground, and work new life into hard and tired soil, choked with weeds that we must uproot. These weeds are the old habits of corruption that cannot seem to die. I spoke of this in my State of the Nation with much regret.

Meanwhile, we must also cope with those who stand on the sidelines and tell us of the hundred and one ways we could have done things better.

Finally, we must be prepared for every wind and weather: the sudden storms that can come up in the night and destroy all our labors, or the long dry spells when our resources run low and there is very little to nurture what we have planted.

There are times when we find the work of a Martha just too tiring, as I am sure you occasionally do. The fields we must tend seem endless, the work is never done, the difficulties never cease. At such times, I remind myself of what Christ said when he called us to the vineyard, "Take my yoke for it is light." And that is true, for he carries half the load. And when I am tempted to complain of the lack of understanding and appreciation, I remember that we are entitled to no more than just wage of the worker in the vineyard.

At the same time, we find fresh zeal and perspective by reminding yourselves of the reason why we work. As Christ admonished the original Martha, who was so caught up in her work, the aim of Christian is Christ himself. He did say that whatever we do unto the least of our brethren, we do unto him. And occasionally, perhaps, the best thing to do is just to sit at his feet and listen, and somehow things take care of themselves.

At this time, we in government continue to plant and sow, just as you do in your own portions of the field. The first fruits have come in of our earlier toils, but the larger harvests, those that can be shared by the greater number of our countrymen, have yet to come. I hope in the meantime that the Marthas here and the many more that I hope will join you will continue and increase their efforts to lighten the crushing poverty of our people.

I have been told of your recent work in military hospitals, and of your efforts to give material and spiritual help to wounded soldiers and their dependents. I am glad to know that your efforts have extended beyond charity to livelihood programs. I am also happy to see the new Marthas among us. As an honorary member, I would like to personally welcome the wives of our military officers to our ranks. The wives of those who defend our fields from marauders and poachers have come to join in the work of making them productive.

If only there were more Marthas in our society; more women willing to help solve our problems rather than talk about them, women who show their status by being servants first, then our country would yield larger harvests much sooner. I hope your numbers go on increasing and that you never tire of your work, which is one of the things that inspire me to go on. Thank you, and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Philippine Free Press, August 8, 1988

Philippine Free Press
August 8, 1988

LET THY SPEAR KNOW NO BROTHER

The Free Press has long been missed. Now, in its aim to revive the lost era of free journalism, its motto is again thriving: Let thy spear know no brother. Objective journalism, and uncompromising morality. The President looks to the journalism of the Free Press for the unvarnished truth and moral insight that guided the champions of Philippine democracy.

The Free Press as it was before Martial Law has been too long missed. I am very happy to see it back in its old fighting form. The balanced and comprehensive news and the fearless views of its editors and writers, for which the magazine was shut down and sequestered by the dictatorship, were of course back with us when it resumed publication in a small format during the SNAP election campaign. But I share everyone's pleasure in seeing the old format back again. May I say it was also Ninoy's favorite magazine, principally because he was often on the cover.

Since it resumed publication, the Free Press has steadily built up its circulation in the only way it knows how: honestly and exclusively by hard work. After the Revolution, it never asked any favors of this government, nor any restitution for what it lost as a result of its seizure by the dictatorship.

Chipping in its share of patriotism, rather than encashing patriotism, has always been the way of its editor. He will no more change than I will. I guess we are just too stubborn.

The motto of the Free Press has been: "Let thy spear know no brother." It adhered to that motto throughout its 80 years of existence, minus the martial law years when it disdained to publish despite generous offers from the dictatorship. We look to the journalism of the Free Press to give us again the unvarnished truth and the moral insight that guided the champions of Philippine democracy in the past.

"Let thy spear know no brother." Objective journalism and uncompromising morality. The answer to blackmail journalism.

The public has reason to welcome this event.

I just want to ask one question of Teddy, Sr., "Will that spear recognize a sister?"

I am only joking. Thank you for inviting me and God bless you all.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on a Family Farm School project, August 8, 1988 Family Farm School August 8, 1988

NEW APPROACH TO FARM EDUCATION

President Aquino feels honored to participate in the launching of a family farm school project which is the first of its kind in Asia. She congratulates the pioneers of this family farm school and expresses the hope that more of this kind can be established in the near future.

I am happy to be here to participate in the launching of a family farm school project which is the first of its kind in Asia. It happens to be an innovative approach to farm education that is fully consistent with the spirit of our Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Program. I take note of the support given to this project by landowners who are being asked to sell a significant portion of their landholdings by CARP.

It is our commitment to the common good of our people that unites us. All of us are being asked to sacrifice for the greater welfare of the society we are trying to rebuild and strengthen. We have to put in a lot of our time, talent and resources particularly during the decade of nationalism ahead of us. We can make our economy develop and our nation recover if we think less of our own narrow interests and do more for others, especially the underprivileged and the disadvantaged.

Each one of us must try and reach out to those of our fellow citizens in dire need of opportunities to be opened up to them. Each individual, each institution can find the most appropriate and effective way to help as many of our people to realize their dream: for acquiring skills and knowledge; for getting access to the chance of earning a decent living; for having many pathways opened for their self-expression and self-fulfillment.

The private citizens behind this family farm school have to be commended for their initiative and their contribution. I also wish to commend the local authorities — particularly the government of the province of Batangas and of Lipa City for their support to this private initiative. I would also like to cite the Development Bank of the Philippines for its outreach programs which enable it to work for development in close collaboration with cooperatives, family farm schools, institutes for small entrepreneurs as well as with local officials in all regions of the country.

The road to development is a long one. History tells us that it is often not smooth. We therefore have to join hands and work together as a team, with that spirit of unity born out of genuine concern and service for our communities. Private volunteer organizations must take many initiatives such as this family farm school in Lipa City. Non-government organizations must strike a meaningful relationship with government institutions and with local governments to undertake projects that truly promote area and regional development following a cohesive and consistent framework.

Finally, the partnership between local and foreign private volunteer organizations is welcome for as long as the projects they jointly promote have true and lasting developmental impact in many of our local communities.

Congratulations to all those who helped to pioneer this family farm school. May you have more of these projects in the months and years ahead in many other communities in the Philippines.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the PC-INP Day, August 8, 1988

PC-INP
August 8, 1988

Day

A LOOK AT TWO MAJOR FORCES

The President is not about to overlook the achievements of these two major forces. On their anniversaries, she discourses on problems in the areas of carnapping, gambling and drug addiction among the youths. What is more important to her is putting a complete stop to the participation of military and police personnel in these criminal activities.

The PC and the PC-INP celebrate today their 87th and 13th anniversaries with good reason to be proud. All the carping critics who never risked their lives in combat cannot diminish one bit what you have achieved this year, which I have called a turning point in the Republic's war against the insurgency. There is no need to list your achievements, and that of the Armed Forces as a whole, in order to answer these critics. It is enough to recall that the Communist threat became a military giant when they were in charge – a giant this Administration has cut off at the knees. It is not now – but in their time – that the AFP had years of defeats and retreats as never before in our military annals. We had been written off by the rest of the world as the next Vietnam.

No, we do not have to remind anyone that it was under this Administration that the leadership of the new Khmer Rouge was captured.

It is not in the tradition of the Philippine military and police to celebrate their great occasions with self-praise but rather with the acceptance of new challenges. There are many new and grave challenges before us.

Our military achievements can, in no way, make up for our comparatively poor performance in bringing to our people the most basic security against criminality and anarchy; against threats to their families and properties; and against the near-total breakdown of traffic control that has all but paralyzed the center of the Philippine economy.

Carnapping continues to be a major syndicated crime that blackens even the record of our military and police. In the first quarter of this year, carnapping hit a high of 6.6 vehicles per day. The average has dropped to 3.3. I do not know if that is due to our renewed vigilance or a slackening in the market demand for stolen vehicles. It is bad enough that this is happening because of our apparent inability to arrest the criminal elements responsible. But it is absolutely intolerable that certain elements in the military and police have been implicated.

Another area is illegal gambling. Again, I must congratulate the PC and the INP for the increased number of arrests in gambling raids. Yet again, we must acknowledge the general impression that this criminal activity enjoys the patronage and protection of military scalawags and especially public officials. I have received a report that an anti-gambling raiding party was actually arrested and jailed for carrying out their duties.

Drugs are another problem. Here I must commend the PC and the INP for the great number of arrests effected, even as I deplore the justice system which has allowed the cases to drag on endlessly without resolution. The almost complete ineffectiveness of the judicial and prosecutorial arms of government in drug enforcement is matched by its near total paralysis in all other cases, so much so that billions of pesos of assets have been tied up in litigation for decades.

Failure to give justice to the victims is as much a denial of due process, as punishing the innocent by haste.

More important to me than bringing down the average of stolen vehicles, curbing illegal gambling, getting drugs off the streets and the mouths of our children, is putting a complete stop to the participation of military and police personnel in these criminal activities. Because what is at stake here is the very bond of our people's allegiance to the idea of government and democracy.

I will make no more promises to our people. But I hope I will be able to report to them very soon that this has ended, or that those who have failed the people have been separated from the service.

An important element in the drive against crime is gun control. I won't bother to describe the obvious: more and more guns are being seen in public; more and more powerful weapons are being used in crimes.

The laws against illegal possession are among the most stringent in our arsenal of legal remedies. I want to emphasize again that no one, but no one, is authorized to carry firearms unless he has a license and permit-to-carry issued only by the Chief of Constabulary. I hereby instruct the Chief of Constabulary to supply me with an updated list of all such licenses and permits, however long it may be. This is necessary so that anyone apprehended with an unlicensed firearm will not suddenly be able to produce a license and permit. Mission orders can be issued only by the Chief of Staff and by those specifically authorized by him, and by the Office of the President. A similar list of mission order holders must be submitted by the Chief of Staff.

I will not have this government and this army authorizing crime.

The war against the insurgents must now be pursued with greater vigor and vigilance. A desperate enemy is the most dangerous and brutal. As it loses all hope of victory, the insurgency will opt for chaos and violent anarchy regardless of the outcome. In short, the Communists intends to punish the people for their failure and to bury this nation in the graveyard of their failed ambition. This will not happen, whatever it takes.

In the less dramatic but equally important area of traffic control, several schemes will be tried. I have cut through the tangle of bureaucracy and proposed 18 pilot traffic centers to be operated with private sector assistance in order to decongest major traffic bottlenecks in the city. Let us wait for the results and be prepared to take even more sweeping measures to halt the chaos in our streets.

These are the challenges to mark this joint celebration; challenges that I know you will meet with the same distinction as your unappreciated successes. I will be with you all the way, supporting you every way I can.

This will be one of the few joint celebrations of the PC-INP left. Soon, depending on the Congress, a national police force will stand here before me to face the challenges of the future. Many of you will be among them. Our confidence in the ability of the Philippine National Police to fulfill its obligations rests on the performance that you, the PC and the INP, have shown and will continue to show until the day of its creation.

A measure of the confidence that I feel is our promotion of a total of 1,330 AFP and 751 INP officers to the next higher rank since January, 1988.

Congratulations. I wish you all the best.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the Marian Closing Rites

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines During the Marian Closing Rites

[Delivered on August 14, 1988]

A MARIAN PRAYER

The following is the full text of prayer delivered by President Aquino during the Marian Year closing rites on August 14, 1988, at the University of Santo Tomas.

For many years, Filipinos have held to the dream of total and lasting peace. At the start of the Marian Year, we resolved to recollect how that dream began. It was a hope first conceived in Mary's womb, in the Person of Jesus Christ, God's only Son and His Prince of Peace. As the vessel for that Infant Christ, Mary carried in her womb the original message of peace: God's offer of love, reconciliation and the salvation of all men. That gospel has overflowed the vessel of its birth and reached, through Christ and His Spirit, all men of every race and generation.

Today the Marian Year ends, but the message of peace remains with all Filipinos. May we take to heart the first commandments embodied in that message. The first is that we love our God with all our hearts, and with all our souls and with all our minds just as Filipinos loved, believed and turned to Him in our years of greatest fear and helplessness. Second, may each and every Filipino love his brother Filipino as he loves himself, and as Christ loved us all.

Those, as Christ said, are His first requirements if we are to follow and please Him. And as the angel sang as Mary cradled the Savior in her arms: "... on earth, peace to men on whom His favor rests."

With one heart and mind with Mary, may we lift our petitions as a people to her son Jesus Christ:

May all Filipinos indeed love one another, forgive each other and give to each other as Christ loved, forgave and gave Himself for us.

May all Filipinos remember that our land, our resources, our opportunities and our very lives are not our own, but are given to us as stewardship to fulfill, protect and nurture and not to corrupt or destroy, to share with the many and not to withhold for the few, and to be offered back to Him who in turn promises to bless us abundantly.

May we offer up into His care, the plight of our powerless, poor and suffering. As Mary sang with conviction in her Magnificat, He lifts up the humble and fills the hungry with good things.

From the end of the Marian year onward, may Mary's Son, Jesus Christ, dwell also within us and work powerfully through us to bring widespread peace and prosperity to our land.

With Mary, and in Jesus' name, we pray, amen.

[Delivered on August 19, 1988]

TUNAY NA WIKANG FILIPINO

Sinabi ng Pangulo na ihiwalay na natin ang dating hindi pagkakaunawaan tungkol sa kung ano ang nararapat na salitang pangkalahatan at pumunta na tayo sa tunay na pagbuo at paglilinang ng tunay na wikang Filipino.

Una sa lahat ay ipinaaabot ko ang isang taos sa pusong pagtanggap sa lahat at bawat isa sa inyo.

Binabati ko kayo sa inyong pagpapakita ng kahanga-hangang kasiglahan sa pakikiisa sa pagdiriwang ng Linggo ng Wikang Pambansa.

Napakagandang pangyayari itong pagsasama-sama ng ating mga lider sa Kongreso — mga Kinatawan at mga Senador — sa isang samahan na pangkultura at pangwika. At ito nga ang Samahang Balagtas.

Para sa akin, ito’y isa ng ganap na pagkakaisa ng lahat ng mga Pilipino, ano man ang katutubong wika sa ngalan ng “Filipino” na ating wikang pambansa.

Ihiniwalay na natin ang dating hindi pagkakaunawaan tungkol sa kung ano ang nararapat na salitang pangkalahatan, at papunta na tayo sa tunay na pagbuo at paglilinang ng tunay na wikang “Filipino” kung saan pagsasama-samahin ang lahat ng ating mga wika. Marahil ay sa pamamagitan nito maaring matupad na rin ang lubos na tagumpay ng mga gawaing ukol sa pagsulong na pang-ekonomiya, panlipunan, pang-edukasyon at pangkultura.

Dahil dito’y hinihiling at iminumungkahi ko sa inyo na magpatibay na tayo ng batas na nagpapatupad sa iniaatas ng Saligang Batas tungkol sa wikang Filipino. Ang tinutukoy ko ay ang pagtatatag ng Komisyon ng Wikang Pambansa o National Language Commission ayon sa sinasabi at ipinag-uutos ng Artikulo XIV Seksiyon 9, ng Konstitusyon. Maka-kaasa kayo sa aking walang sawa na pagtangkilik sa lahat ng inyong pagsisikap hinggil sa mahalagang bagay na ito.

Ang aksiyon sa bagay na ito’y matagal nang panahon na hinihintay ng ating mga kababayan.

Ituring natin na sa pagkakataong ito’y gumawa na tayo ng isang pagpapasiya at isabay na natin hindi lamang sa pagdiriwang ng Linggo ng Wika kung hindi gayon na rin sa selebrasyon ng Balagtas Bicentennial Year at sa pagsisimula ng Decade of the Centennials of Filipino Nationalism, Nationhood and The Philippine Revolutionary Movement.

Sa ganyang hakbang, makasaysayan at dakila ang mga sandaling ito.

Malaki ang aking pag-asa na hindi na matatagalan ang ganap na pamumulaklak ng ating wika.

Ito’y tanging karangalan ng inyong mga liderato na natitiyak ko na tutulungan ng walang pasubali ng ating mga kababayan sa lahat ng dako ng bansa.

Isa pang maliit na kahilingan: Kung maari ay simulan na natin ang pagbigkas ng sariling wika sa atin-ating larangan.

Nakamasid sa atin ang buong bayan, lalo na ang mga kabataan.

Kayat magsimula na tayo sa makasaysayang hakbanging ito. Maraming salamat.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on remembering the death of Ninoy

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On remembering the death of Ninoy

[Delivered at Santo Domingo Church, August 21, 1988]

A PLEDGE TO NINOY

In remembering the death of Ninoy, President Aquino dwells on Ninoy's beloved "friend" who never left him, who showed him the way — a supreme sacrifice to free his people. She intones her covenant with the constitution, our contract with God and our pledge to Ninoy.

This is the first time that the anniversary of Ninoy's death is celebrated on the day of the week when it occurred: Sunday. A day of quiet when people stay home. Ninoy had made it easier for his executioners.

It is also a day of prayer, when people go out to Mass.

It is, of course, a special day of sacrifice, of the outpouring of blood for the liberation of men — from sin two thousand years ago, from tyranny just five years ago. The formula has not changed: blood for freedom.

On this day, I wish to honor not just my husband Ninoy but his beloved friend who showed him the way.

Like many other Filipinos, knew Him since childhood from the respectful distance of formal worship. That distance grew with every increase in Ninoy's fame, power and responsibilities, all of which ended abruptly with Martial Law. And that was when their friendship began to flower.

Ninoy had few visitors in prison. It was not only the fears of his friends but also the restrictions of his captors that kept Ninoy mostly alone in those years. I, the children, his mother, brothers and sisters, the handful of lawyers who remained faithful, gave him what comfort and companionship we could. There was, however, one regular visitor to Ninoy's cell, that neither guards nor high walls could keep out, once Ninoy had let him in. That friend came day after day, night after night, more faithful than any other.

In the solitude of his cell, Ninoy enjoyed His companionship most and made up for the time he had lost away from Him. But deeper friendship was still to come.

Ninoy's captors, seeking to break his defiance, threw him into what was virtually a box. But unknown to them, his friend had slipped in with him. And there, in the utmost solitude and utter darkness of despair, Ninoy saw more vividly than in the full light of his days of freedom the true face of his friend and savior.

"He stood me face to face with myself," Ninoy later wrote, "and forced me to look at my emptiness and nothingness, and then helped me to discover Him who has never really left my side: but because pride shielded my eyes, and lust for earthly and temporal power, honor and joys drugged my mind, I failed to notice Him."

In that moment of recognition, friendship turned to the love that never left Ninoy. Together they embarked upon that long journey which ended on this day of the week, five years ago. He would face even more dangers and difficulties, and suffering worse than any he had endured in Laur, but this time Ninoy had a strength beyond his own. He was not alone. Ninoy liked to quote St. Paul's letter to the Corinthians to describe his new self-assurance: "For the sake of Christ, I am content with weakness, insults, hardships, persecutions and calamities, for when I am weak, then I am strong."

Yet Ninoy thought he saw a shortcoming in his friend, for Christ had not revealed to him despite his pleadings, the way by which he, Ninoy, could save his country. But there was still a lot of time for them to spend together, and know more about each other. In the seven more years of imprisonment, and the three of exile, the way was shown to Ninoy. Two thousand years ago, his friend had shown the way to bring peace, reconciliation and salvation for all men – through His death. For these things can only be had as gifts that all save the giver can enjoy. They had to be paid for in blood. As it is written, “. . . without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness.”

Five years ago today, Ninoy arrived in Manila.

A shot rang out. A light went out in August, but a conflagration was lit.

According to the experts, when a bullet strikes you in the back of the head, the tendency is for the head to jerk back. So, the last thing that Ninoy saw, before his face slammed on the tarmac and the blood began to form in a pool around his head, was the sky, and the face of his friend who had come to take him home.

The slogan that came from that event was “Ninoy, hindi ka nag-iisa. ” The words were like a balm on a wound — for his family. But Ninoy was never alone.

Nor are we. Certainly not in the work Ninoy started, and which we must complete.

I know his friend watches now over every Filipino, awaiting the moment of recognition on his or her part of the larger duties to God, country and fellow man that will finally rescue us from the prison of greed and ambition.

I am certain He walks in our hills and hinterlands, offering love and faith to the rebels, so that one day the destructive courage of their wrong convictions may turn into the constructive energy and commitment without which we cannot restore this nation.

He walks with the poor and meek, seeking to comfort their spirits and give them the strength to stand for their rights and struggle on to the life of abundance on this earth that is meant to be their inheritance.

He marches with our soldiers, giving them courage in the fight and faith in their cause, assuring victory and protection to the righteous, merciful and just.

He walks with our wealthy and powerful, seeking to temper pride with humility, lest it presage their fall, and riches with generosity; and to instill a sense of responsibility for the country and people that create their wealth.

He walks with the corrupt, the libellers, the influence peddlers, the name-droppers, to temper their destructiveness and turn them again towards the exalted purposes for which God placed us on earth.

He walks even with those whose ambition has blinded them to the plight of their country, and its need for a measure of peace in which to heal and grow strong again.

He walks even with those who have destroyed the unity that was the flower that grew from Ninoy’s grave, and became the first casualty after his death.

The unity that poured millions into the streets for his funeral, and again to celebrate the first anniversary of his death, was broken by the second anniversary.

By a miracle, that unity was forged again and held up through the snap election and the EDSA Revolution so that we could say to Ninoy, on the third anniversary of his death, “Thus have we used your sacrifice: We have created a nation that is free again and proud as it has never been, the envy of all the world, and standing on the threshold of progress.”

Yet, exactly a week after the fourth anniversary, the unity that gave this nation the strength to recover its freedom had been lost forever in the brutal coup attempt of August 28. We had meant to celebrate that anniversary again with an offering to his memory of all that we had accomplished together: complete democracy, the restoration of the Congress in which he had taken the greatest pride, the first clear signs of a revived economy. We were reduced to singing instead the dirge of national unity.

Since then we have tried to build a less encompassing unity of those whose commitments have never wavered to God and country and democracy.

That unity is again being tested by those who seek to further reduce it. Who seek to undo the progress we have painfully made, and set this nation back again upon the downward course from which you and I had rescued it.

Every step we have taken towards progress has been challenged, particularly at this time of the year, by those determined to see this nation fail of its destiny. You and I shall not let it.

We will take this nation as far towards recovery and progress as God, duty, and the people's support will let me.

I shall not relent, I shall not rest, for there are too many miles to go to even think of sleeping. Nothing and no one will deflect me from this task. For my mandate is with this nation; not with its enemies. My covenant is with the Constitution. Our contract is with God, Our pledge was to Ninoy.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the LAWASIA Human Rights Seminar

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the LAWASIA Human Rights Seminar

[Released on August 25, 1988]

BEYOND COMPROMISE

The President congratulates the LAWASIA Human Rights Standing Committee for organizing a seminar on a vital subject that confronts many governments today – human rights. The President deeply shares the cause for which LAWASIA stands and the ideals that continue to be its spiritual inspiration.

At the outset, let me congratulate the LAWASIA Human Rights Standing Committee for organizing a seminar on a vital subject that confronts many governments today.

Human rights advocacy, particularly in Asia and the Pacific now stands at a most challenging threshold – the threshold of decisive influence over the human rights policies of governments in the Asian region.

The challenge is, indeed, awesome. But history leaves us no choice but to respond with our deeply held ideals, our firmest commitment and with our noblest efforts. Because our peoples will never abdicate their birthright to freedom and human dignity, nor their yearnings for just and human societies. And we owe it to our peoples as much as to ourselves to bring life to that birthright.

The memory of one of our most revered nationalists, the late Sen. Jose W. Diokno, inspires us all today. For it was he who hurled the challenge for the creation of a Standing Committee on Human Rights in LAWASIA. You have brought his challenge into the realm of dynamic reality.

The LAWASIA's Standing Committee on Human Rights is now the heart of your movement's unrelenting struggle to exact full reverence to human rights among the peoples of our region. It is our pride that our Chief Justice Marcelo B. Fernan was its Chairman for many years.

Building from that challenge, you are now close to realizing a greater goal — the establishment of an Asian Commission on Human Rights which promises to be a decisive force for positive change in the human rights policies of governments in Asia.

Needless to say, I deeply share the cause for which LAWASIA stands and the ideals that continue to be your spiritual inspiration. I say this not because my late husband Ninoy and I suffered greatly from a tyrant's arrogant disregard of human rights; but because of a firm conviction that no government and no man can ever deny from any human being the right to live a life of dignity, justice and freedom.

My administration's position for the promotion and protection of human rights is beyond compromise. Among my first acts upon my assumption to the Presidency was the creation of Presidential Committee on Human Rights.

This Presidential Committee has since been transformed into a constitutional body called the Commission on Human Rights by virtue of Art. XIII, Sec. 17 of the 1987 Constitution. Under this same constitutional provision, measures for the preservation, safeguarding, defense and advancement of human rights have been institutionalized.

I take pride in the inclusion of Art XIII in the 1987 Constitution, specifically in the arena of Social Justice and Human Rights. For it earned for the Philippines the singular distinction of being one of the few nations of the world that enshrines in its fundamental law the supreme duty of the state to protect and advance the frontiers of human rights.

I wish you every success in your seminar. And may your stay in this country be exceedingly pleasant and immensely fruitful.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on National Heroes Day

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On National Heroes Day

[Released on August 28, 1988]

TWO KINDS OF HEROES

There are two kinds of heroes; soldiers and officers who fought and gave their lives to defend the State and its territory and those who live lives of quite honor and dedication to the country and State they love. As the President speaks at the Libingan ng mga Bayani, she pays tribute to these two kinds of heroes who both equally deserved the nation's undying gratitude and praise.

Today, I wish to pay tribute to two kinds of Filipino heroes. Both were born and bred in the most difficult phases of our struggle towards nationhood. Both displayed the same glowing attributes: bravery beyond the call of duty, honor beyond question, a readiness for sacrifice, including the last, and love of country and trust in God.

Both have marched side by side, each essential to the success of the other, in the trek towards freedom and progress. In the course of our history, both have equally deserved the nation's undying gratitude and praise.

Here, at the Libingan ng mga Bayani, we pay tribute to the first kind of hero. I refer to the soldiers and officers who fought and gave their lives to defend the State and its territory, and to uphold the democracy that is its soul. A few of them are buried here, that you and I know personally. They fell on this day last year in the greatest battle waged to defend our newly restored democracy. They are the heroes of the most crucial battle waged by our Armed Forces, for that battle separated the chaff from the grain, the traitors to — from the soldiers of — the Republic.

The other breed of heroes are not buried here nor in any other military graveyard in the country. They live — and live lives of quiet honor and dedication to the country and State they love with equal fervor and serve with equal skill. They bear no arms, yet just as faithfully man the ramparts of democracy, and the outcome of their struggles to be honest and to serve well are equally decisive of the fate of our country.

I speak here of the honest public servant — as poorly paid, yet as conscientious as the soldier who lays down his life for a country that too easily forgets him.

I speak here of the farmer, from whose sweat comes the food that keeps the race alive; whose diligence in his work, whose fidelity in paying his debts, are standing rebukes to some of the rich who complain incessantly, and whose legacy to this nation has been the bad debts in the billions and the non-performing assets beyond number that the common Filipino must shoulder in the end.

I speak of those businessmen who pay their taxes dutifully.

I speak of the upright judge, the honest policeman, the industrious overseas worker, and of the rebels in the hills who have chosen, at grave risk to their lives, to give democracy the second chance that I have asked.

I speak of the silent multitude of heroes, whose quiet labors and unyielding integrity make them “the fifty just men” that has kept the Lord from sweeping away the righteous with the wicked from this nation.

Every nation has its heroes. Usually a handful. Ours stand out for its multitude of heroes. None have monuments in their name, yet it is their work that has kept this nation going, and will keep this nation's appointment with its destiny. This day is our tribute to them all. God bless us all.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the National Chamber of Commerce Brunei

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the National Chamber of Commerce Brunei

[Released on August 30, 1988]

A NEWLY-FOUND PARTNERSHIP

The President expresses her deep appreciation to the National Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Negara Brunei for making this meeting possible. She expresses confidence that Brunei and the Philippines will be good partners in business as she encourages investors to come to Manila not only for the conference but to see for themselves what the Philippines has to offer.

May I begin by expressing our deep appreciation to the National Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Negara Brunei Darussalam; and to all of you here for making this meeting possible.

About eight months ago, His Majesty the Sultan was in Manila for the Asean Summit. The Asean heads of state approved in that meeting economic initiatives that are very relevant to your business activities.

For example, the member countries agreed to raise intra-Asean investments to at least 10 percent of total foreign investments by the turn of the century. They also hoped to increase manufacturing value-added by 8 percent annually.

In trade, the member countries agreed to increase substantially the number and value of traded items within Asean preferential trading arrangements.

To implement these initiatives, we are counting upon the entrepreneurial drive and spirit of the Asean private sector. Although these are formally goals of multilateral cooperation among the six ASEAN states, they translate in practical terms to bilateral trade. Expanding intra-Asean trade means expanding trade between pairs of member states. Likewise, raising the level of intra-Asean investments means increasing capital flows between any two ASEAN countries.

In short, what Brunei Darussalam and the Philippines can do together in terms of trade and investments would all be in the spirit of the regionwide objectives of the Summit last year and the spirit of ASEAN since its inception.

Over the past 2½ years, dramatic improvements in the political and economic situation in the Philippines have enhanced our capability to trade with and to provide a hospitable climate for investments for foreign investments, particularly from our immediate neighbors.

The GNP growth of 1.5 percent in 1986 almost quadrupled to 5.7 percent in 1987, and increased further to 7.6 percent in the first quarter of 1988. The industrial sector contributed significantly to this performance with its growth rates of 7.9 percent in 1987, and 9.67 percent in the first quarter of this year.

After two consecutive years of decline, investments last year reached $420 million, the highest level registered by our Board of Investments in 20 years. At $575 million, investments in the first semester alone have already surpassed the level for the whole of 1987.

We have also achieved substantial progress in international trade. From a 14.1 percent decline in 1985, our exports have grown by 4.6 percent in 1986, by 17.6 percent in 1987, and, in the first 6 months of 1988, by 25.4 percent.

We have also been able to stabilize our foreign exchange rate and hold back inflation to 3.8 percent last year.

As I said in my address for the opening session of our Congress last month, there's no denying that "the economy has taken off, it is on the move – not fitfully anymore but in firm strides on the path of sustainable growth".

And the key to this has been the free rein we have given to the private sector, and its involvement in the preparation of our policies for growth – both domestically and intertionally.

To widen the foundation of economic growth, we identified 13 regional agro-industrial centers to draw the forces of development to the countryside, and enlist the energies and creativity of the small and medium entrepreneurs who have sustained our economy thus far. This strategy calls for the pouring of substantial infrastructure in the regions outside Manila to make them hospitable to investments. We will see to it that these areas will have what they need in power, water supply, telecommunications, transportation network, security, and other government services.

One of the centers we have chosen is Zamboanga, which is quite near Brunei Darussalam. This will bring the two private sectors closer to each other and hopefully enhance trade between our countries.

It is heartening to note that trade between our two countries, which had steadily declined from 1981 to 1986, improved almost four times in 1987. However, because our imports from your country consist almost entirely of petroleum products, while our exports have not yet made significant inroads into your market, the balance of trade between our two countries has been heavily in your favor over the past decade. We hope that our private sector, which has been quite enthusiastic about doing business in Brunei Darussalam, can enter into more contracts with many of you so they can help reduce our trade deficit.

I know that one of the reasons for the low volume of trade between Brunei Darussalam and the Philippines is the lack of shipping services between our two countries. To address this problem, we are trying to secure commitments from shipping lines to introduce regular direct shipping services between our two countries. Whether these lines will be established or long survive will depend on the volume of trade.

A most encouraging framework for such trade was laid in the revised Basic Agreement on Asean Industrial Joint Ventures. Under the Agreement, products of any industrial project with equity participation from at least two member states like Brunei Darussalam and the Philippines, will be entitled to a 90 percent tariff cut when exported from the host country to other participating countries.

With the signing of the Memorandum of Agreement on Trade, Investment and Shipping between our two countries, we can now look forward to stronger business ties between the Bruneian and Filipino private sectors.

The accompanying Philippine delegation will answer your other questions about trade and investment opportunities between our countries. May I take this occasion to invite you to an investors conference scheduled for the first week of November in Manila. I hope to see many of you there.

Community of race, community of commercial interest, community of security concerns in the ASEAN region, and the particular proximity of our two countries – these factors argue most strongly for a special relationship between our two countries. I hope that this visit will mark its beginning. Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Filipinos in Brunei

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Filipinos in Brunei

[Released on August 30, 1988]

A TEST OF CHARACTER

The President speaks to the many Filipinos working in this foreign land to manifest her continuing interest in the expatriate life which she herself lived. She acknowledges the tremendous contribution of the overseas workers to the Philippine recovery effort.

Whenever I go on a foreign visit, I make it a point to talk with fellow Filipinos abroad. This is not just a ceremony expected of all Philippine presidents, but a manifestation of my continuing interest in the expatriate life which I myself lived with my husband and children.

Political persecution aside, just living abroad — away from the ways of life in which we grew up, away from the comforting and saving network of family and friends — is a trial in itself. It is a test of character on the part of the Filipino who uproots himself and starts again in a foreign land. May I say also, it is a test of the character of the people who welcome him in their fold.

Our presence abroad, particularly here in Brunei Darussalam shows the wealth of opportunity for livelihood and advancement and the generous welcome which foreign lands offer to Filipino industry, skill, and talent, even as the protection and hospitality you receive are a recognition of the contributions and a manifestation of the care and concern of your particular hosts, the people and government of Brunei Darussalam.

The mutual advantage which your stint here in Brunei Darussalam represents is matched by the equal advantage we derive at home from your employment abroad. The tremendous debt service burden and the other priorities of our economic recovery program are met in no small measure by your remittances to the home country. That fact has moved me to call communities like yours, the unsung heroes of the Revolution.

For the tremendous contribution you have made to the Philippine recovery effort, we offer you every assistance we can, especially here through our Embassy. Your government will exert every effort to meet your needs.

The Department of Labor, for instance, has already attended to your concern to see the period for issuing a travel exit pass shortened. The POEA has decentralized the Balik Manggagawa processing system to its regional offices in Cebu, Davao, Cagayan de Oro, La Union, and Baguio. This will soon extend to the 12 labor regional offices all over the country.

The Overseas Workers Welfare Administration is hereby directed to immediately send a welfare officer whose only function will be to attend to your needs here in Brunei Darussalam. By next month, a number of measures will be adopted to make it easier and faster for you to send money to your loved ones back home. I have also directed Secretary Drilon to study what incentives we can offer to our overseas workers who remit their earnings through our banking system.

We shall continue to explore ways to make your exemplary sacrifices abroad lighter and more rewarding. We would welcome suggestions from you.

The well-being of the Filipinos in Brunei Darussalam speaks highly of our hosts — of the liberality of the rulers of Brunei, and of the ever-deepening friendship between our two nations which are so near each other.

Even before we came over, your outstanding work here has been the best ambassador of goodwill which the Philippines could have. You make us all proud at home.

I wish you more success. God bless you all. Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Traffic Management

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On Traffic Management

[Released on September 1, 1988]

A CALL FOR CIVIC INVOLVEMENT

IN TRAFFIC IMPROVEMENT

The traffic condition in our country has long been a problem. And TRIP seeks to improve traffic management within the metropolis by instituting short, medium and long term projects and activities. President Aquino congratulates the Presidential Task Force on Traffic Management for coming up with the TRIP.

Today, we shall put into effect the Metro Manila Traffic Improvement Plan, or TRIP. The TRIP seeks to improve traffic management within the metropolis by instituting short, medium and long term projects and activities.

I congratulate the Presidential Task Force on Traffic Management for coming up with the TRIP. I take pleasure in acknowledging the private corporations who are contributing their time and resources to the TRIP, particularly in the project under the Plan called POOK BATAYAN.

In each of the chosen Pook Batayan, traffic enforcement will be upgraded to eventually make Metro Manila a standard in terms of efficient and effective enforcement of traffic rules and regulations. Let us recognize, however, that this is a shared responsibility of the traffic enforcers and the motorists and commuters.

In the long run, the TRIP also seeks to develop a mass transit system and a road network responsive to the travel needs of Metro Manilans and necessary for an efficient traffic management

Let us collectively commit ourselves to help improve Metro Manila's traffic in more and better ways. Let us start the collective commitment to TRIP with our individual and personal action. Whatever gains we attain in Metro Manila will undoubtedly be replicated nationwide.

I believe that the success of the Metro Manila Traffic Improvement Plan will prove our readiness to meet even greater challenges of development that lie before us.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Commission on Immigration and Deportation

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Commission on Immigration and Deportation

[Released on September 2, 1988]

A TRANSFORMED CID

President Aquino commends Commission on Immigration and Deportation Commissioner Miriam Santiago for the changes and reforms that have successfully taken place in the CID making it more honest and relevant to our times. She adds that the transformed CID has proved her thesis that it is possible to cleanse and energize the bureaucracy.

One of the decisions I am pleased to have made in office was to corner Miriam Santiago into accepting the position of Commissioner of Immigration and Deportation.

If I recall correctly, Miriam and I had the same reactions to the challenge thrown unexpectedly our way: reluctance and apprehension, less over the task than over the toll it would exact upon our private lives. But, fortunately or unfortunately for ourselves, we came to the same conclusion. It would be cowardly, not to say unpatriotic, and lastly un-Filipina to say no. For if there is anything which a Filipina woman who is also a wife and mother is raised to do, it is to trust that God will give her the strength and capability to protect her own. And to every Filipina, every one of her fellow countrymen is her own.

And so, for better or worse for our well-being, here I stand at the helm of the nation, and here is Miriam, in charge of CID.

Another thing that I think we have both discovered is the unusual and unpleasant diet that goes with our jobs.

Miriam says she eats death threats for breakfast.

I for my part have tasted coups, demonstrations, lies and insults. A man would say in our place that he would chew up this diet and spit it out.

But Miriam and I, being ladies, have learned to chew it all quite daintily, and, when we're through, go into the kitchen, reason with the cook or throw him out.

I am pleased that Miriam has not tired of this diet, and that many of her colleagues in the CID have learned to take it as well.

The public and I are well informed of the changes and reforms that have successfully taken place in the CID, making the Commission far more efficient, far better organized, more relevant to our times, and more honest in its dealings and operations than at any time in the last twenty years.

I credit this not only to the Commissioner's strong stomach and stronger words and actions, but to your responsiveness to the challenge she has laid: to let this, of all unlikely agencies, serve as the model of good government. It is of people such as yourselves that I spoke in glowing praise at National Heroes Day—the men and women of quiet determination and unhesitating self-sacrifice in the public service, who are greater heroes than the chest-thumping, sabre rattling men who brought this nation to the sad past from which you and I have tried very hard to rescue it. More importantly, you have transformed the CID by your own inner strength. You have proved my thesis that it is possible to cleanse and energize the bureaucracy. You have shown the strength of your moral will.

Today, Miriam speaks with some experience when she says that “there is life after the bureaucracy.” I am sure she also means there is life and fulfillment even within it. For I see it in all of you who have worked so hard to clean up and present the image of government proper to the country of the Yellow Revolution.

I have spoken quite highly of your boss, but she and I are transients in our present positions. It is you who will abide here to make sure that what we have all tried to build will be completed and will endure. Keep up the good work and May God Bless you in your efforts.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 106th Anniversary of Metropolitan Waterworks and Sewerage System

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 106th Anniversary of Metropolitan Waterworks and Sewerage System

[Released on September 8, 1988]

106th Anniversary
MWSS
September 8, 1988

WATER FOR ALL

The President greets the men and women behind the MWSS on their 106th anniversary and urges them to continue the commitment of giving the people clean, potable and safe water.

As you celebrate the 106th Anniversary of Metropolitan Waterworks and Sewerage System, it is good to bear in mind that it is given only to a few government agencies to observe over a century of service to the people.

If your corporate life has spanned the different political structures of our nation, it is because you deal with that precious commodity, water. Water that is vital to life and health. Vital to trees and crops. Vital to industry and development.

I take this opportunity to tell you that providing the people with clean, potable and safe water is a major thrust of my administration.

As you may know, as of the end of 1987, only about 63% of the total population of the country had access to water supply systems. The service area coverage included 86% in Metro Manila and its adjoining areas, 55% in other urban areas and 62% in the rural areas.

So the rest of the population, or approximately 37%, still depend on water from open dug wells, rainwater cisterns, lakes and streams, most of which are of doubtful quality.

It is for this sector that I launched the Tulungan sa Tubigan program. With the indispensable help of the private sector represented by the Philippine Business for Social Progress, we have put up 425 water projects in 15 provinces which will benefit 31,000 families.

Reflecting the high priority that my administration accords to the water sector, we have allocated the amount of P28.35 B to fund the water supply and sanitation program for the period 1987 to 1992. This is embodied in the Medium-Term Development Plan of the Philippines.

Likewise, Congress has responded to the constitutional mandate to provide basic social services, particularly safe and adequate water supply for all Filipinos.

Senate Bill No. 47 which was later converted to Senate Resolution No. 13 strongly urges the Department of Public Works and Highways to undertake a comprehensive feasibility study for the construction of water wells and the development of springs in all barangays. To the same effect is House Bill No. 3282.

As you are aware, the MWSS is now part of the Multi-agency Task Force created to implement this directive.

I am pleased to know that the Angat Water Supply Optimization Project, which we have just launched, will serve an additional four million people, while the Manila Water Supply Rehabilitation Project II will benefit about a million people. On the other hand, the Cubao Pumping Station, which we have just inaugurated, will increase the water pressure in 11 areas in Quezon City benefiting 350,000 people. Because these are costing the government several billion pesos, I am pleased to note that under the leadership of Administrator Luis V. Z. Sison, you have increased your water bill collection by 23% and your billing efficiency by 16%.

Binabati kong muli kayong lahat sa inyong anibersaryo. Ipagpatuloy natin ang atingpagtutulongan upang mapagkalooban ang ating mga kababayan ng tubig na malinis at walang hinto ng pagdaloy.

Maraming salamat sa inyong lahat.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Napolcom

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Napolcom

[Released on September 8, 1988]

A NATIONAL POLICE FORCE

President Aquino impresses upon the members of the NAPOLCOM her determination to push through the unification of the constabulary and police into a national police force dedicated singlemindedly to bringing law, order, and security to our communities. She touches on a bill detailing the character of this national police force, the hierarchy of command, the scope of jurisdiction, the manner of interacting with local authorities.

I am told that this is only the second time a Chief Executive addresses the National Police Commission in its 22 years of existence. I am also told that very shortly after the last President was your guest speaker, Napolcom's first chairman lost his job. Let me assure you, nothing like that will happen. Yet, undoubtedly, important changes are in store for the Napolcom – for the forces of order throughout the country.

These changes cannot be resisted for they have the compelling force of the Constitution behind them. On the contrary, they should be welcomed, for they will address the shortcomings of the present national police system which keep it from meeting its great objectives.

The first duty of the State is law and order. This priority ranks higher than social amelioration, human development, cultural attainment, and whatever else one can think of. This may sound unduly harsh, but only the ignorant will deny it.

As the Constitution states in the Declaration of Principles, the “prime duty of Government is to serve and protect the people,” and the “maintenance of peace and order, the protection of life, liberty and property, and the promotion of the general welfare are essential for the enjoyment by all the people of the blessings of democracy.”

Without law and order, our lives would be nasty, brutish and short; none of the things that make life worth living would be possible.

Economic progress beyond a hand-to-mouth existence would be impossible without a comprehensive order to assure everyone of at least his right, and that of his family, to life, followed immediately by his right to work undisturbed and keep the compensation of his labor – his right to the property he sweats to acquire. These are the most basic demands of human beings everywhere. They are so basic, hardly anyone thinks of them until they are lost or gravely threatened. The State itself hardly gives them any regard, concentrating instead on improving the lives it protects from harm. The only time the State remembers its minimal function – the protection of life and property – is when their violation reaches such proportions that the public puts on the pressure.

The pressure is on us.

No question about it. The demands I get are increasingly less for the good life, for social justice, and other important aspirations, as for the basic requirement that the State do to every man its basic duty: keep him and his family secure from physical harm, his property rights respected, and his community a safe and decent place to live and work in.

The tragedy in this country is that this very function is so divided and confused, that the State quite frequently fails to perform it.

In recognition of this terrible shortcoming, the Constitution has mandated the coming together and fusion of all the forces of order into one national police force. A unification to assure coordination; a clarification of hierarchy and duty to pinpoint responsibility.

The Constitution provides:

“The State shall establish and maintain one police force, which shall be national in scope and civilian in character; to be administered and controlled by a national police commission. The authority of local executives over the police units in their jurisdiction shall be provided by law.”

It was therefore with a great deal of surprise that I listened to complaints from both parties to the police function, the PC and the INP, about the implementation of this provision. Both sides had essentially one and only one complaint: who would run the show. Yet both sides agreed, that the show was being badly run; that the confusion of functions and roles had seriously hampered the State’s first duty of protection. The discussions between both essential partners – who should be working as one, with one and the same name and uniform – took on the accents of a labor-management dispute.

Well, let me make this clear. The task of policing the community, of securing lives and property, of laying down that modicum of order without which we cannot call our society civilized, is not a job: It is a duty and a calling.

It is all sacrifice, and its chief reward is only that which anyone who goes into public service should expect: the largely private satisfaction that one did his part for his country. No one cares what you gave up in private life to serve in public office. Public service, in addition to being a public trust, is its own and principal reward. There is always the private sector one can go back to.

It is therefore with great eagerness that I accepted this invitation to attend and to talk on your 22nd anniversary. I just had to layout before you my thoughts, my determination to push through the unification of the constabulary and police into one national police force dedicated singlemindedly to bringing law, order, and security to our communities.

A bill detailing the character of this national police force, the hierarchy of command, the scope of jurisdiction, the manner of interacting with local authorities has been introduced in Congress, with my certification. And only yesterday, I repeated my urging to Congress to pass that bill so we can get on with its much needed implementation.

I expect, and know I will get, from the police and its chiefs the cooperation and dedication needed to make the law succeed. I expect the same from the constabulary and its officers. Both organizations were in the forefront of the defense of government and democracy around this time last year, again at EDSA. A sense of embarrassment at how short the forces of order have fallen in the popular expectation, as well as a sense of patriotism on both your parts, assure me that that cooperation will be forthcoming. We shall soon cease to mark constabulary and police anniversaries separately and start proudly to celebrate the achievements of the National Police Force together. I would like to congratulate you on your 22nd and perhaps last anniversary as the National Police Commission, and wish the police and the constabulary every success on the coming rebirth of the national police. Thank you.

On the signing of Generics Act of 1988

[Released on September 13, 1988]

TUNGO SA ISANG MALUSOG NA BANSÀ

The health of the people of a nation is one major commitment of government. The signing of Generics Act, is one step towards the realization of a dream — safe, potent and affordable drugs for all.

Nagtitipon tayong lahat dito upang saksihan ang paglagda sa Generics Act of 1988.

Lubhang mahabang panahon na ang pinagtiis nating lahat. Sa tuwi nang tayo ay nagkakasakit, napipilitan tayong kumagat sa presyo ng mamahalinggamot.

Sapagka't ang kalusugan ay kayamanan, kahit ang pinakamahirap sa atin ay hindi nag-aatubili ng paggastos kung ikagagaling rin lang ng karamdaman.

At ang kahalagahan ng paglagay sa abut-kaya ng kababayan natin ng presyo ng gamot ay kinikilala sa ating Saligang Batas.

Ayon sa Art. XIII, Sec. 11, "The State shall adopt an integrated and comprehensive approach to health development which shall endeavor to make essential goods, health and other social services available to all the people at affordable cost."

Ako'y nagpapasalamat na sa kinatagal-tagal ng panahon, naabot na rin natin ang layunin na iyan. Ating maaalala ang simulang pag-aaral na ginawa ng U.P. Law Center. Ibinunyag ng kanilang batik ang mananaliksik na ang sanhi ng lubhang mataas na presyo ng gamot ay ang palasak na paggamit ng mga kilalang marka o "brand names."

Ang madla, dala marahil ng pagkahilig sa mgaangkat na produkto, ay gayon din ang hanap sa gamot.

Ilang taon ang lumipas bago nakapagpanukala ng batas sa Kongreso hinggil sa pagtangkilik ng tinatawag na "generic drugs." Hindi naman lubos na pinagbabawal ang pagreseta ng "brand names" na kasama ng "generic names" kung ito ang nais ng mga doktor sa pribadong sektor.

Ang lakas ng loob at pagpupunyagi ni Secretary of Health Alran Bengzon at ng mga tumaguyod sa kanya ang nakapagpasulong sa batas sa Kongreso.

Malaki rin ang tulong na ibinigay ng ilang makabayang media na naglunsad ng kampanya upang ipabatid sa ating kababayan ang malaking pakinabang sa "generics."

Higit sa lahat, nais kong kilalanin ang puspusang pag-tulong ng ating mga kinatawan sa Kongreso na siyang sumuporta at nagsabatas sa Generics Act. Totoong marami sila nguni't ang pangunahing mga sponsors at Chairmen ay si Sen. Mercado sa Senate at si Congressman Monfort sa House of Representatives.

Nguni't hindi pa tapos ang ating trabaho. Kailangan pang gumawa ng mga patakaran o "rules and regulations" sa tulong ng ating mga doktor sa pribadong sektor upang isakatuparan ang Generics Act.

Sa kabila ng matinding pagsalungat sa batas na ito, muli na namang pinamalas ng ating mamamayan ang diwa ng EDSA – ang ating pagkakaisa para sa ikabubuti ng bansang Pilipinas.

Tinatawagan ko kayong lahat, aking mga kababayan, upang tangkilikin ang “generic drugs” tungo sa isang malusog at maunlad na bansa.

Maraming salamat po.

On the meeting with Regional Consultative Committee

[Released on September 16, 1988]

THE OPTION THAT BUILDS

The responsibility to preserve the unity and the integrity of the country rests on the President. She pledges to do everything in her power to arrest any drift towards fragmentation.

I am happy to be able to welcome you once again to Malacañang. It has been over five months now since I had a chance to meet with all of you as a group. This was during the first meeting of the RCC when you took your oath of office as commissioners at the Sharif Kabunsuan Hall in Cotabato City.

I know that during the intervening time, you have been busy conducting public consultations on the contentious issues of autonomy and in protracted discussions to reconcile the conflicting views on these issues within the Commission.

While I have not had the opportunity to meet with you these last five months, I would like to assure you that I have kept myself in touch with the activities of the RCC. I am grateful to learn from the reports I have been receiving that most of you have been working with great fervor and commitment to bring the autonomous region to reality.

I realize that you have not been given as much time and resources as the complexity of the work requires. But we have to live within given constraints. Congress has established a clear timeframe within which you have to deliver your results. You must realize that Congress must set firm deadlines because Congress itself is bound by the Constitution to draft an organic act within a fixed schedule.

I understand that the issue of what to call the autonomous region has provoked much disagreement and debate within the Commission. I hope that you will not allow yourselves to be paralyzed by the conflict over this issue. More important, certainly, than the name of the autonomous region is the nature of the powers and responsibilities that you vest in the autonomous regional government.

Let me share with you my perspective as the President of this country. My fundamental responsibility is to preserve the unity and the integrity of this country. I would be culpable if I did not do everything in my power to arrest any drift towards fragmentation. I would hope that in settling controversial issues, you would be guided by the same principle. Cast your support for the option that builds rather than encourages discord.

The Constitution has delineated the areas proposed for inclusion in the autonomous region subject to the consent of the residents as expressed in a plebiscite. Autonomy, if it is to be acceptable, must be for all of those citizens.

I have expressed to you before my great hopes for this experiment in participatory democracy in which you are engaged. You have perhaps discovered in the course of your work that you have accepted a large and heavy burden. Part of that burden must come in the form of a willingness to submit your personal preferences to the consensus of the group.

We expected, as I warned you in Cotabato, that you would need to reconcile many different perspectives. But we have not given up on the hope that you would join hands to achieve our common goal of progress and peace. And we continue to expect that the recommendations you will forward to Congress will reflect a common concern for the protection of human rights, a commitment to the peaceful resolution of conflict and a compassion for the disadvantaged among our people.

Once again, my thanks for your contribution to nation-building and my best wishes for the successful completion of your work.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the LDP Convention

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the LDP Convention

[Released on September 16, 1988]

REBIRTH OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Political parties play an important role in the molding of a nation. These parties should serve as an organization of people with shared ideas and aspirations from where the people could get insights and enlightenment. In the LDP convention, President Aquino expresses her support for the rebirth of these parties and of the Laban ng Demokratikong Pilipino. She stresses that LDP should not only be for the elections in 1992 but more especially for the people in these times of crisis.

The founding of this party inaugurates, I hope, the more efficient use of political power for national ends.

The past two years have been a time of building up democratic institutions, of shoring their defenses, and developing their capabilities to absorb the shocks of the free-wheeling politics of a full-fledged democracy. Now that the institutions are in place and the processes have been tested, it is time for the political forces to start aligning themselves on the basis of their respective beliefs and programs.

There can be no democracy without parties, for the various strands of opinion in the country cannot make their influence felt unless they are organized and able to pursue systematically their specific political agendas. Without the organization of political beliefs and programs into disciplined parties, we would have only a riot of conflicting opinions but no effective action. The people, who unavoidably speak in many voices, will be frustrated because none of these voices will be clearly heard.

Perhaps, it is time to have political parties. Perhaps, indeed, the time for realignments is now. Yet, I hope that these realignments do not portend the permanent and total division of the forces of democracy in our country. For should that happen, it will mean the end of all of us. The coming anniversary of Martial Law should be a tragic reminder of what happened the last time the friends of democracy fell out with each other. Democracy was left defenseless, and each of us was left friendless against the small but organized forces of dictatorship.

It is good for the country and for democracy if people with shared ideas and programs organize themselves into separate parties. But it would be disastrous if we divided ourselves again into permanently hostile camps, and thereby divided the attention and energies of the natural leadership of this nation into mutually destructive and frustrating factions.

It was like that in the past, it cannot be that way again in the future.

For we have stepped into a new age of politics, an age we ourselves invited when we fought and overturned the dictatorship in the only way possible, by calling out the people to do it. Now that the people have tasted what it is like to make history, they will not go back to being its victims.

The politics of the present and the future is a people politics, just like the character of the revolution that brought us all here, was people-powered. In the same manner, the full recovery of this country and the fulfillment of its potential must be an affair of the people, and for the people. There is no other way.

First, because the people will not allow themselves to be relegated to a minor role again. Second, because our problems are so great, the challenges before us are so daunting, the enemies of our freedom so many and persistent, that only with the active participation of the people can we prevail.

The breakup of the democratic coalition into parties, like the LDP, is, as I have said, an unavoidable, even a necessary feature of democracy. Yet, the popular unease over this development is understandable. For the general feeling is that every hand is needed to work in unison at the great tasks before us: giving justice and jobs to the people, strength to the economy, and security, both internal and external, to the nation.

The people are uneasy at the formation of parties because it has yet to be shown that parties will work for the people, and not against them.

The people must be convinced that this need not be the case.

But words will not sway them. They have heard too many already. Only actions will move them to give the next stage of democracy, which is the full-flowering of the multiparty system, their respect, support, and defense in the time of crisis.

You and I went through the Revolution. We have seen the power of the people; we know the price that leaders pay for the people's disenchantment; and the great power for transformation that the people represent.

That power is not a mindless thing that politicians can do with as they please, as they did in the past.

That power has a mind and purpose of its own.

It has goals to which the destiny of this country is tied.

It has a leader, who stands ready to protect it. And I am sworn to pursue its goals with every breath and ounce of strength in me.

Naliligayahan ako sa muling pag-usbong ng mga lapian o partido. Kailangan ito upang ang ating demokrasya ay umunlad. Naniniwala ako na ang Laban ng Demokratikong Pilipino na nagtataglay ng maraming kaanib at pamunuan na kilala sa kanilang katalinuhan at pagkamakabayan ay magiging katuwang sa mga gawaing ating sinimulan. Gayon din ang sambayanan ay umaasa sa tulong at payo ng LDP sa mga mahirap na suliraning ating hinaharap.

Inaasahan ko na ang LDP ay itinatag hindi lamang para sa halalan sa 1992 kundi upang tumulong sa bayang na harapin at pangibabawan ang ating mga pasanin.

Sa ganyang paniwala, ating ipagdiwang ang pagsilang ng LDP

Mabuhay ang Laban ng Demokratikong Pilipino!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Civil Service Week

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Civil Service Week

[Released on September 19, 1988]

SERVING THE PEOPLE

Civil Service Week was proclaimed to correct the injustice done to the men and women in the civil service and to call everyone's attention to their role which is no less than that of maintaining our society. She cites the many outstanding achievements of those in the service of the people.

On the day we honored the fallen heroes of our race, the men and women who fell in battle to make us free and keep us free, I gave equal honor to the silent but living heroes among us: the men and women of quiet dedication throughout the civil service who keep this country and its government functioning.

Public opinion overlooks them, except when one or two of the thousands of these heroes falter in their essential integrity and commitment to duty and country. And then they hit the headlines, blackening the shining record of the civil service.

Civil Service Week was proclaimed to rectify that injustice, to call everyone's attention to your role, which is no less than that of maintaining our society. The week was set aside also to enable you to re-examine your record in the light of the great tasks you are called to perform. It has been a time also of re-examining that very role itself in the light of our new thrust to bring government closer to the people.

The record speaks for itself. Time constraints prevent me from mentioning more than a few of many outstanding achievements:

Department of Health personnel serviced 19,121,075 patients in 1987 – the precision of the count is another manifestation of the efficiency and drive of that agency. 1,061,435 children were also immunized in 1988 nationwide – concrete proof that even as we recover from the past, we have made wise and caring provisions for the future.

The 544th Engineer Construction Battalion of the 52nd Engineer Brigade of the Philippine Army is commended for completing the concreting of the Tugaya-Bacolod Section Project (the Marawi-Malaband Road), one month and three days ahead of schedule. Proof positive of the potential efficiency of the entire civil service, given the right motivation and leadership. Colonel Leonito E. Lambino, commander of the battalion, must take a bow for this one.

The work of social workers in the rebel returnee program, in caring for the children of the streets, the rehabilitation and protection of abused women and children, and in countless other areas where we have fallen short of even our people's modest demands, defy enumeration and our ability to express our admiration and respect for the work they have done. The same admiration and respect on our part goes out to our public school teachers, who willingly added, to the burden of educating our youth, the dangerous and difficult task of assuring the integrity of the democratic process in various elections.

New dimensions will be added to the work of the civil service. The constitutional direction of decentralized government will come increasingly into play. We must bring government closer to the ordinary people it is meant to serve first and foremost.

We have strengthened the Regional Development Councils to identify and prioritize projects within their respective areas. Agency regional offices are now mandated to inform, consult and seek the approval of the RDCs for projects the agency proposes to undertake in the region.

We have established the Cabinet Action Committee on Implementation Assistance or CACIA as a support mechanism to the CORD and the RDCs.

CACIA regional consultations are taking place at this very moment. The aims are to identify and address quickly project-related problems, and to institutionalize, within the RDCs, the process of problem-identification and problem-solving.

At last September 7's meeting, the Cabinet endorsed the CACIA's recommendations on this and related issues. Among the significant recommendations are:

The delegation to regional directors and district engineers the work of implementing and supervising foreign-assisted projects on an area-jurisdiction basis.

And the early finalization (by November 1988) of the 1989 Infrastructure Program.

Yet even as we mark the achievements of the civil service, refine its concepts, and improve its role, we note with sadness that the epithet "heroic" was not casually applied to the civil service:

Asst. District Engineer Floriano Sarmiento was ambushed last 8 July 1988 in Camarines Sur while investigating several graft and corruption cases – underscoring the fact that our cruelest enemies are not only the rebels but also the crooks who undermine more effectively the people's faith in democracy and good government.

Dr. Pedro Vilela, Medical Specialist TB Control Program, died of a heart attack in the course of field work in Palawan last November.

Atty. Esteban Calalang, a Department of Labor and Employment legal officer, was gunned down while leaving his office last February.

Each name underscores the self-sacrifice that is the essence of public service. Each name should stir us all to a greater resolve to match their courage and their dedication to duty.

Mga kapwa ko manggagawa sa gobyerno, ang nangyari sa atin sa EDSA ay hindi ala-ala lamang ngpakikibaka. Ito'y patuloy na nagpapahiwatig na kung hindi natin iingatan ang ating mga kalayaan, maaari itong nakawin ng mga ilan na nagpapanggap na makapagbibigay sila ng higit na kasaganaan, kaunlaran at kapayapaan.

Kaya't pag-ibayuhin natin, tayong nasa pamahalaan, ang ating pagsisikap, paglilingkod at pagmamalasakit para sa bayan. Maraming salamat po.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino in tribute to Don Chino Roces

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines In tribute to Don Chino Roces

[Delivered at the Mount Carmel Church, October 5, 1988]

HE SHOWED THE WAY

President Aquino pays tribute to Don Chino Roces and his selfless, courageous, and unceasing service to his country and his people. She acknowledges his invaluable contributions to the struggle to achieve democracy in the Philippines. Don Chino's legacy is leadership by example which he attested by the values and goals he exemplified.

With your kind permission, may I speak of Don Chino not only in my capacity as President but as one of those whose lives he specially touched and transformed. May I speak also for Ninoy, whom he treated like a son. For Chino's relationship with me started with my husband.

As you know, it was Chino who introduced Ninoy to the political life – something Ninoy's father might have done for him had he lived longer. Chino took him into the Manila Times as a reporter and put him immediately in harm's way, to cover the Korean war. You might say, "Some 'father' Chino was to Ninoy." But that was Chino's way. He measured out his love and respect by the height of his expectations of you.

He knew that Ninoy was aching to serve where his talents would bring most honor quickly to himself, to his family, and to his country. And so Chino sent him to war.

The reputation he made in Korea launched Ninoy's political career. It made him a national figure and smoothed his political ascent. Ninoy would always be conscious of Chino's help throughout his career, yet not as a debt to be repaid but as a great expectation on the old man's part that he could not disappoint.

I do not think Ninoy disappointed Chino, not in the time of his meteoric rise in politics, nor in the time of his descent to the greatest misfortunes that could befall any person. Always, Ninoy was conscious of being watched and judged by Chino and the grand old men of the Republic who refused to collaborate with, and who carried on the struggle against the dictatorship.

After Ninoy's untimely death, but timely sacrifice, Chino turned his attention to me. As Ninoy's widow, I did not need anyone to tell me that I must do honor to that sacrifice by adding my voice to the general clamor for justice and freedom that the assassination had unleashed. But Chino had decided that doing honor was not enough; that a dignified witness was insufficient; that, in fact the time would come when it would be necessary for me to lead the movement in order to unify the forces of the opposition.

That is essentially what he said to me, in the midst of others more eloquent, more experienced in politics, and therefore more capable of presenting a credible challenge to an entrenched dictatorship.

Eloquence, he believed, would be supplied by the simple truth that I must always tell. And experience, by the courage to persevere until the goal was achieved. As for presenting a credible challenge, Chino would have none of it. He wasn't interested in a credible challenge; he wanted a victory. As a downpayment on his promise, he gave me the million signatures that finally convinced me he knew what he was talking about.

Chino was the man of few words in the opposition, comparatively speaking. Yet, he was one of its most effective members. I think his effectiveness lay in the simplicity of his goals and the simplicity of his method. His goal was the liberation of his country. And his method was simply this: he gave himself entirely to the task.

He himself went around gathering those million signatures, directly or through the hundreds of volunteers he had recruited. To raise money for the cause, he went around himself with a grocery cart or with a bag into which people, more embarrassed than he, put their money. Their embarrassment was not for this old man doing such an undignified thing, but for themselves that they were not doing it instead. For they would certainly enjoy, far longer than he, the freedom for which this old man struggled.

That was Chino's method: to attest by your personal example, the values and goals that you proclaim. It was the method and the single biggest issue of the campaign. Leadership by personal example, we said, would pull this country back from the brink and set it on the right path again. We showed, in our lives then, the kind of leadership that would do it. And not just me, but all of you who were with me in the campaign. Your selflessness, your courage and unstinting service without expectation of reward, spoke more convincingly to the masses than any speeches of the Tightness of our cause.

Chino showed the way and it worked.

Two years after the victory, Chino came back to remind us, especially me, that the work was not finished. If we thought it was, then he was sorely disappointed. That was his testy response to the Legion of Honor that was conferred on him. The response gave more significance to the award than the award gave him, for it unleashed a wave of recriminations and, more profitably, of self-examination on the part of many. It hurt when he said it. But it had to be said, and he was one with the moral authority to say it.

In this tranquil and grieving moment I see now that it was his legacy to me and to us all. He has warned us that we, the friends of democracy, shall have a worse time of it than the clear enemies of the people — if we fail the people. For the great expectations we raised in them will be the measure of their scorn and retribution.

Everyone whom the Revolution has put in a position of power and influence, whether in the public or private sector, should heed his warning. For Chino was seldom wrong. More importantly, let us heed it given the affection and the enormous debt we owe the old man for our freedom and for that piece of wisdom that he left us.

To Chino, now, I say: You disappeared from the public scene so quickly after the victory, you gave us no chance to thank you properly. We thought it was your modesty that made you shy away. Now we understand your reticence. You wanted us to realize that the gratitude was owed not to you, but to the people whom you had merely helped to call out. It was their power in the end that made us free. Your modesty reveals to us the more onerous obligation to satisfy our people commensurately with the great hopes we have raised and the great sacrifices they have made.

Chino was that way with those from whom he expected much in the way of patriotism: there shall be no rest except that to which he has now gone. He was that way with us, with you and me — the generation that struggled for freedom. Let us not disappoint him.

With Don Chino's death, another great tree that sheltered us from the winds of adversity comes down. I hope we have learned, while we were protected, to stand upright against them. We are increasingly on our own.

Goodbye, my friend —

On World Food Day

[Released on October 16, 1988]

PROGRAMS FOR THE RURAL YOUTH

President Aquino assures the youth that the government considers the promotion of their welfare and development as one of its priorities. There are several programs that have been laid out by the different government agencies. Among these are: the Integrated Human Resources Development Program (DSWD), Non-Formal Education Program and Study Now, Pay Later Plan (DECS), and Rural Manpower Development (DOLE).

Mga minamahal kong kabataang nayon, mga kapwa tagapaglingkod sa pamahalaan, mga magsasaka at mga kinatawan ng mga Agricultural and Fishery Councils ng iba't ibang bayan at lalawigan:

Napakaangkop ang paksang "Rural Youth" bilang tema ng World Food Day sa taong ito.

Sa kabuuang limampu't walong milyong populasyon ng bayan ngayon, higit sa animnapung porsyento ay mga bata na may gulang na isa hanggang dalawampu't apat (1-24) na taon. Ang labindalawang milyon nito ay kabataang nayon na may labinlima hanggang dalawampu't apat (15-24) na taong gulang.

Bilang mga taganayon, higit na alam ninyo ang tindi ng pagdarahop sa kanayunan. Bilang isang ina naman, labis akong nababahala dahil alam kong sa kalagayan ng paghihirap, ang pangunahing biktima ay ang mga bata at kabataan. Nariyan ang malaganap na malnutrisyon, maagang pagkamatay, at kakulangan ng mga serbisyong pangkalusugan. Nariyang hindi sila makatapos ng pag-aaral dahil sa pangangailangang makapaghanapbuhay na sila. Nariyang dahil sa kakulangan ng sapat na kabuhayan sa kanayunan ay napipiltan silang makipagsapalaran sa mga lungsod at sa ibang bansa.

Bilang Pangulo, nararamdaman ko ang bigat ng mga suliraning ito. Sa tingin ko'y walang sinumang makapagbibigay ng dagliang solusyon. Kaya natutuwa ako sa ginagawang pagpupulong ngayon ng mga kabataang nayon para pagusapan ang mga suliraning bumabagabag sa kanilang sektor. At binabati ko kayong lahat, mga kabataan, sa inyong sipag at pagpupunyagi.

Sa panig naman ng pamahalaan, tinitiyak ko sa inyo na patuloy na bibigyang halaga ang pagpapaunlad sa kabataan. Ito'y malinaw na ipinahahayag ng ating Saligang-Batas na nagtataguyod ng kagalingan ng kabataan, at kumikilala sa mahalagang papel nila sa pagtatatag ng bansa.

Kaya't patuloy na ipinatutupad ng iba't ibang ahensiya ng pamahalaan ang mga programa nila para sa mga kabataang nayon. Ang Department of Social Welfare and Development ay may Integrated Human Resources Development Program for Youth. Ang Department of Education, Culture and Sports, bukod sa pagsagot sa kabuuang pangangailangan ng kabataan sa edukasyon, ay may espesyal na "Non-Formal Education Program" at ng "Study Now, Pay Later Plan". Ang Department of Labor and Employment ay may Rural Manpower Development Program.

Naipahayag sa akin ni Kalihim Carlos G. Dominguez na ang Kagawaran ng Pagsasaka naman ay naglunsad ng isang Farm Youth Development Program. Sa programang ito, ang bawat teknisyang pang-agrikultura ay magtuturo sa isa o mas marami pang lider-kabataan sa pamamagitan ng aktuwal na paggawa sa bukid.

Sa pamamagitan ng programang ito, pinapangarap ko na ang mga kabataan ay lubos na makalalahok sa demokratikong pagpapatakbo sa pulitika at ekonomiya ng bansa.

Ako'y lubos na natutuwa na sa okasyong ito ng World Food Day ay magkakasama kayong mga kabataan at dina-gaanong kabataang magbubukid. Ipinapakita ninyo na ang mga problema, pangarap at pagsisikap ng mga kabataang magbubukid ay hindi hiwalay sa mga suliranin, adhikain, at pagpupunyagi ng iba pang sektor sa kanayunan.

Laban sa kahirapan, gutom at malnutnsyon, ang pangunahing sagot natin ay ang pagpapaunlad ng agrikultura. Ang produksiyon ng pagkain ay kakambal ng pagpapaunlad ng ating kabataan. Kung masagana tayo sa pagkain, higit na malusog ang ating kabataan. Mas malaki rin ang kitang maipantutustos sa kanilang mga pangangailangan.

Sa mahabang kasaysayan natin bilang isang lahi, ilang ulit nang pinatunayan ng mga kabataan na sila ang tagapag-pabilis ng pagbabago at pag-unlad. Kung paano isinulong ng mga kabataan ang pakikibaka ng sambayanan sa mga nakaraang panahon, ganoon din ang sigasig na ipinamalas nila sa mahabang pakikibaka natin laban sa diktadura, hanggang magtagumpay tayo sa EDSA.

Ako'y umaasa na patuloy kayong makikipagkapit-bisig sa kapwa ninyo kabataan, sa mga kapwa ninyo magbubukid, at sa pamahalaan. Gamitin ninyo ang lahat ng inyong dunong at sigla sa ikauunlad ng ating kanayunan para sa maaliwalas, mapayapa at masaganang bukas.

Maraming salamat sa inyong lahat.

World Congress

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the 19th International Association of Financial Executive Institutes World Congress

[Delivered at the Manila Hotel, October 17, 1988]

A GOOD NEWS ECONOMY

The restoration of democratic institutions has paved the way for economic recovery and growth. President Aquino discusses the government's accomplishments in the business and finance sectors — strong GNP growth, single-digit inflation; higher income levels; increased employment and increased investments.

At the outset, let me congratulate the Financial Executive Institute of the Philippines (FINEX) for hosting this very important conference of the world's chief financial officers and executives.

I also wish to greet the various member institutes of the International Association of Financial Executives (IAFEI).

This 19th World Congress is most timely and you earn global attention as you take center stage in addressing the subject "Emerging Issues in the Financial World". The theme becomes even more relevant in the light of such major global problems as the huge Third World Debt, the volatile foreign exchange markets and the "Black Monday" effect on the world's major stock exchanges.

Since those fateful days in February 1986 when we succeeded in toppling a 14-year dictatorship through a bloodless coup, the road to political and economic recovery has been far from easy. But we have taken giant steps to restore our democratic institutions. Under a New Constitution, we have established again a bicameral Congress, conducted relatively free and honest national and local elections, set up an independent judiciary and given back to the citizens their long-lost rights. To improve the quality of life of our people, our Congress has passed a Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Act, and a law giving free secondary education in public schools and regional autonomy to cultural minorities, among others.

These political infrastructures have paved the way for economic growth. The government has instituted pump priming activities and stimulated private sector participation as mandated in our Constitution.

To date, domestic investments have far outpaced foreign investments in the Philippines. We have, in short, put in place the magnet for investments and created the circumstances, that should encourage the entry of more capital into the national economy.

Hence, from a negative GNP growth in 1984 and 1985, our economy turned around in 1986; displayed a strong GNP growth of 5.7 per cent in 1987; and sustained a 6.8 per cent growth in GNP for the first eight months of 1988. Consumer spending remains strong due to higher income levels induced by increased employment and wages, which in turn are the result of increases in investments.

Prices have been stable owing to both a prudent economic policy and to drops in the prices of essential imports. For the past two years, the inflation rate has been single-digit; prime lending rates have hovered at around 15 to 16 per cent; while the peso-dollar exchange rate has been fairly stable.

And now that income levels are growing, so is per capita income. In terms of 1972 constant prices, the level of per capita savings in 1988 is almost 10 per cent higher compared with that of 1985.

On investments, the net profits after tax of the top 1000 corporations rose by 651 per cent in 1986. The net earnings of publicly-listed companies grew by 100 per cent in 1986 and by 30-40 per cent in 1987. They are expected to grow by at least 30 per cent this year. Successful business ventures with foreign participation enjoyed a return on investment almost 22 per cent higher here than in other ASEAN countries.

The market is booming so fast that producers periodically even run out of raw materials and components. Some makers of consumer products cannot even begin to export because local demand still has potential, so some manufacturing plants have to operate day and night on three full shifts! Production is, in fact, pushing the energy-generating sector to the limits of its capacity.

The labor situation has significantly improved. There has been a 43 per cent decrease in work stoppages compared to the figures last year and a speedier settlement of labor disputes. Meanwhile, the domestic market is expanding even as the export markets are opening up to Filipino producers trying to tap a bigger share of the US market that the newly-industrialized countries are expected to lose because of higher tariffs applicable to them.

In terms of government support systems, the government is continuing to develop the infrastructure necessary to encourage investments and industrialization, such as: the setting up of regional industrial centers, the establishment and improvement of viable export processing zones, and the modernization of our communications and transportation systems. In addition, our new Omnibus Investments Code offers tax and other incentives to foreign investors in priority areas even as we cut down on the regulations imposed by laws and administrative regulations.

In another sense, the investment climate has never been better. The general peace and order situation has significantly improved and can be expected to improve further.

The recent capture of some of the top leaders of both the Communist Party of the Philippines New People's Army (CPP-NPA) and the ex-military and right-wing elements is proof of the effectiveness of our military surveillance and operations.

To further ensure that peace prevails, I have likewise directed our police forces to effectively clamp down on ordinary criminals and lawless elements, and to uncompromisingly enforce discipline in the streets towards the protection of our citizens and guests.

I have been asked about the debt-equity swap program which the Central Bank initiated about two years ago to encourage foreign investments and at the same time reduce somewhat our foreign debt.

While this program has elicited considerable interest, the Central Bank has had to proceed cautiously because of its concern that the program could have inflationary effects on the economy. Hence, the Monetary Board of the Central Bank is currently evaluating the program to determine appropriate modifications which will, hopefully, enable us to achieve the objective without endangering the financial stability of the economy.

Let me also address the issue of graft and corruption which has contributed to the heavy drain of the country's economic resources in the past regime and whose adverse effects are being painfully felt by us now. I have said before and am saying again that we rose to power on the crest of hope for a new moral order in government. That hope shall not diminish and I shall see to it that it is realized.

I have already directed all agency heads, all department secretaries and all in government to take steps to minimize, if not to completely eradicate, graft and corruption in the bureaucracy. I have charged all government officials with the responsibility and the task of seeing to it that the commission of graft is made more risky and less rewarding for those to whom the inclination and the temptation come. Already we observe that the vigorous campaign to ensure integrity and enhance productivity and efficiency in sensitive frontline services is producing gratifying results.

We hope you will be our partners in our valiant effort to sustain the progress of our reborn democracy.

Be our guests and accept our hands in friendship and in partnership.

Thank you and please accept my good wishes for the success of this conference.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Convention Integrated Midwives Association of the Philippines
Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Convention Integrated Midwives Association of the Philippines

[Delivered on October 21, 1988]

THE MIDWIFE AS INFORMATION OFFICER

Aside from maternal and child care, the midwife's responsibilities include seeing to it that primary health care services are delivered to the community. In the annual celebration of Midwifery Week, the President reminds the members of the Integrated Midwives Association to continue collaborating and linking with their organizations in the field of health care so that they can serve a greater number of people.

I thank the officers of the Integrated Midwives Association of the Philippines for giving me the opportunity to meet with midwives from across the nation.

To the public mind, midwives are generally seen as assuming two major roles: helping deliver babies and being surrogate mothers. In a sense, I too, have had to play the role of midwife, but in the areas of statecraft and governance.

Your job has certainly expanded beyond that of maternal and child care. The professional midwife is now tasked with the immunization of our children against polio, measles and diphtheria. You are also responsible for delivering micro-nutrients like iron and foodstuffs for our malnourished children. You advise couples on family planning methods which is a take-off from your traditional roles. These services are more often than not delivered twenty-four hours a day to communities that are largely inaccessible, remote and even dangerous.

In a recent survey in Cebu on the control of diarrhea, it was disclosed that the incidence of diarrhea in a barangay or town went up or down depending on the capability of the midwife assigned there.

With the recent passage of the Generics Act, I urge you to add to your public relations work that of disseminating information on the benefits to the people of this law. How can you do this? Everytime people consult you on their medical needs, turn this into a forum for explaining the use of generically named drugs. When dispensing drugs and medicine, refer to their generic names. During immunization sessions, devote a portion of the session to enlighten mothers on the use of generics. In effect, you turn your barangay health station into an information center on the use of generics. In time, your efforts shall equip people with the needed information to make right decisions on the use and cost of medicine.

Aware of the many roles of a midwife, the Department of Health has thus recognized the need for your professional growth. It is now in the process of formulating guidelines for the position of supervising midwife at the provincial level. Being a supervising midwife, however, entails more responsibilities. For those of you who are willing and capable of supervising health service delivery in a larger area, this is an opportunity to prove your mettle and serve a greater number of our people. Ability, intelligence and integrity are virtues which field personnel, no less than professionals, should be gifted with.

As you close your annual celebration of Midwifery Week, let me remind you that the role of the Integrated Midwives Association will be made more meaningful if it could collaborate more closely and link up with other organizations in the field of health care.

Thank you, and I wish you success as you go forth to implement decisions made in this Convention.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the participants of the 3rd ASEAN Journalists' Exchange Program

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the participants of the 3rd ASEAN Journalists' Exchange Program

[Delivered on October 21, 1988]

THE GIFT OF COMMUNICATION

In welcoming the participants of the 3rd ASEAN Journalists' Exchange Program, the President reminds them that despite differences in ethnic origins and culture, it is still possible for journalists to work together, to communicate with one another and to form friendship based on understanding and a common commitment to peace.

I am happy and gratified to welcome you, the participants of the Third ASEAN Journalists' Exchange Program, to Malacañang and the Philippines.

I am happy because I am given the opportunity to meet you and to share my thoughts with you, the men and women whom I recognize as among the leading information specialists and opinion makers from our part of the world. And I am gratified because I see in you, and in the Journalists' Exchange Program, the workings of a wonderful idea whose time has come, an idea that should bring about greater understanding, friendship and peace among the peoples of ASEAN.

The beauty of the exchange program is that, in bringing all thirty of you together, you are given the chance to know each other. To interact with one another. To discover for yourselves that, despite the differences in your ethnic origins and your culture, it is still possible for you to work together, to communicate with one another, and to form friendships based on understanding and a common commitment to peace.

As you gain a better understanding of the ASEAN nations and peoples in the course of your tour, you should be able to deal more effectively with news originating from ASEAN countries when you report back to work. While others may tend to sensationalize or exaggerate our problems, I hope you will treat them with insightful objectivity as you become conscious of our shared problems and developmental needs.

Just as important, if not more so, is your capability to influence public opinion and policy makers on political matters. I have talked with your heads of government during the ASEAN Summit held in Manila last year as well as during my state visits. But I must count on your support to make sure that your people cooperate with us, especially during critical times.

I am happy to note that, included in this tour are some of my countrymen. They can apprise you of the background and present status of some of the problems we are confronted with here in the Philippines, including developments in the South arising from our proximity with some of your countries.

After your swing through the countries of the ASEAN region, you can all go back to your respective homes with a valuable lesson, and that lesson is this: given some amount of goodwill, it is possible for all of the peoples of ASEAN to live together in peace and harmony – if only they are given the opportunity to know and understand each other.

As journalists, you have the gift of communication. I urge you to use that gift so that, before long, you can bring ASEAN countries even closer together. And you can make them one in their desire to forge a region-wide commitment to progress, prosperity and peace.

Thank you very much.

On the creation People's Economic Councils

SKILLED

Small enterprises compose the backbone of our economy. President Aquino endorses the creation of People's Economic Councils which will help develop small businesses and enhance productivity and generate jobs for the unemployed. She considers this as one way of fulfilling her promise to provide incentives to the sectors that have powered our economic recovery, particularly the small and medium industries.

I am happiest when I can dialog with people and people-based organizations like yours. For as you all know, mine is an administration that was swept into power on the crest of a People's Revolution. The second Revolution is now upon us. And you are helping provide the people component of the ongoing Economic Revolution.

This is why I heartily endorsed the plan of Secretary Jose Concepcion to form People's Economic Councils (PECs) all over the country when he first suggested it. Through you, I have a chance to tap the private sector, not the elitist leaders, but those who rely on their home-grown resources and initiative to enhance productivity and generate jobs for the unemployed.

Government, with all its good intentions, organization and materials cannot accomplish everything to propel economic growth in the country. It needs the private sector-orientation and collective participation of the small entrepreneurs like you. And so I am immensely gratified to learn that in Abra, the PECs have developed the bamboocraft industry. In Alfonso, Cavite, they have established a Garments Center. In my own province in Tarlac, a financial assistance program that is the lifeblood of any business enterprise.

In General Santos, your timely intervention helped settle the problem at the port of Nakar.

In Cebu, I understand the PECs helped our government save some PI million with its suggestion that the city government purchase the more practical "Macho" jeeps instead of the more expensive Lancer cars.

In a very real sense, therefore, your small enterprises comprise the backbone of our economy. At a time when large businesses were hesitant about investing their capital in new ventures or were salting away their precious dollars, you were already providing livelihood to our people through cottage industries. Thereby you were helping create a pool of skilled workers for future industrial expansion as well as for the creation of forward and backward linkages, such as through subcontracting arrangements.

Now perhaps you could turn your efforts to assisting the government in meeting the challenge of insurgency. As you are aware, we have been implementing a National Reconciliation and Development Program to help our misguided citizens return to the fold of the law. Within their limited capabilities and resources, our Department of Social Welfare and Development and the Department of National Defense have exerted their best efforts to help the rebel returnees adjust to the challenges of a normal life.

This is where your 1300 organizations can contribute in a substantial way. By providing employment to these brothers and sisters of ours. Give them the opportunities to become productive citizens once again. As they rejoin their families, absorb them into the mainstream of the community's social economic and political life.

I understand that you have passed in your First National Convention a resolution urging the decentralization of certain functions of government. I could not agree more with you that this measure will ensure the faster delivery of government services to the people. That it will, in turn, encourage private businesses to establish their bases of operations in regions where their raw material supply and manpower are abundant is evident.

Let me inform you that as early as April 25, 1988, I issued Administrative Order No. 71 creating a joint Legislative Executive Committee on Decentralization and Local Autonomy in compliance with the Constitutional mandate to decentralize administrative functions. Then I issued Memorandum Circular No. 63 on May 30, 1988 that launched four pilot decentralization projects, namely, Davao del Norte, Laguna, Negros Occidental and Tarlac. A Cabinet Action Committee on Decentralization (CACD) was created to formulate plans and guidelines to implement this policy.

Last Monday, I issued Memorandum Circular No. 82 calling attention to the general provisions of the Administrative Code of 1987 which shall take effect on November 24. These pertain to the strengthening of regional operations through the delegation of more authority on administrative and substantive functions by Department Heads to their regional offices – exactly as you suggest in your Resolution.

Let me add that the New Disbursement Scheme now in full operation is making it possible to make budgetary releases directly to the regional offices concerned. Thus many an irritant that has slowed down the swift delivery of funds where they are needed has been removed.

Your second resolution endorses the “Omnibus Code to Rationalize and Promote Small Enterprises, Establish a Credit and Insurance Corporation, Provide Funds Therefore and For Other Purposes.” In my State of the Nation address delivered on July 25, this year, I promised: “On the economic front, we must provide long delayed incentives to the sectors that have powered our recovery, particularly the small and medium enterprises.”

Now, two bills with the same thrust have been filed in Congress — Senator Leticia Shahani’s bill in the Senate and Congressman Oscar Orbos’ bill in the Lower House. Their provisions are now being harmonized so that I can certify the final product as an Administrative bill.

Ito ang bunga ng pangako ko sa inyong mga munting mangangalakal. Maliit man ang inyong negosyo sapagka’t marahil kapos kayo sa puhunan, mayroon naman kayong mahalagang papel na ginagampanan sa ating lipunan.

Sa pamamagitan ninyo ay napahahatid sa amin ang mga hinaing at mga ninanais ng mga negosyanteng taga-lalawigan. Kung bagama’t mayroong mga matutunog ng mga Chambers of Commerce sa mga lunsod, nariyan naman ang mga mapagsikap at masigasig na People’s Economic Councils.

Kaya’t pag-ibayuhin ninyo ang inyong sipag upang higit na maging matatag ang sinasaligan ng ating ekonomiya.

Maraming salamat sa inyong tulong at Mabuliyay kayong lahat!

Asia is the cradle of the great religions of the world. President Aquino welcomes the participants of the Asian Bishop's Institute on the Theology of Dialogue. She acknowledges the importance of dialogue among the different religious leaders in order to generate joy, foster liberation, spawn dignity and peace, and bring about equality and hope among the people.

Allow me to extend to you a very warm and cordial welcome.

I understand that you are here to attend the Seventh Asian Bishop's Institute on the Theology of Dialogue under the sponsorship of the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences. And I am told that the theme you chose for your recently-concluded workshop was "Living and Working Together with Neighbors of Other Religions."

It makes me very happy that you chose this theme, for I see the wisdom in it. There is wisdom because it recognizes that the greatest service that Asian religious leaders can give Asia is dialogue. I say this because I know that dialogue can generate joy, foster liberation, spawn dignity and peace, and bring about equality and hope. Above all, it can create the sense of community which is still sorely lacking among the peoples in this part of our world.

This is sad, for Asia is the cradle of the great religions of the world. And all these religions have a vision of community. Of peoples coming together in peace and harmony despite their disparate cultures.

In my case I have opened avenues of communication with church leaders and organizations. A few months ago I had a dialog with representatives of the Association of Major Religious Superiors of the Philippines. Acting promptly on their recommendation, I appointed Atty. Narciso Monteiro as Commissioner of the Commission on Human Rights. I have directed Defense Secretary Fidel Ramos and Chief Staff Gen. Renato de Villa to hold continuing dialogs with such Church leaders as Archbishop Leonardo Legaspi and Bishop Bacani.

Aware that the church leaders have direct access to the people in the countryside, I have tapped some of them to help in our economic development efforts. Monsignor Pastor Cotiangco, whom I have appointed Chairman of the Regional Development Council in Region VIII, has earned the respect and high regard of his lay colleagues for his many insightful contributions.

In my unceasing quest for pipelines to both church leaders and the laity, I have agreed to meet next week with the members of the Public Affairs Committee of the Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines (CBCP).

I have not, however, confined my relationship with the Catholic Church alone. To ensure inputs from all religious denominations, I have set up the National Ecumenical Consultative Committee (NECCOM).

Under the leadership of Bishop Deogracias S. Iniguez who is here with us, officials from the Protestant, Muslim, and other minority sects keep me attuned to the feelings and aspirations of people of different faiths all over the country.

All these religions, as you very well know, have gifted us, not with just great leaders, but with thoughts and attitudes of surpassing wisdom and beauty. We can benefit from all these. From the leaders whose sterling example and exemplary way of life are an inspiration to all of us. From their teachings which, if followed conscientiously, can provide the answer to all the conflicts and dissensions that plague the world. These spiritual leaders and their wisdom can provide the right answer, in a prayerful way, to the questions that unsettle us and disturb our serenity.

The mystery of all religions flows through the mystery of faith. Then, through the mystery of a person who lives the religion into the mystery of man.

Each individual chooses his own path. We who are Christians chose the path of Jesus Christ. As we strive to walk in His footsteps, we become more and more sure that we have anchored our faith on a firm foundation. A foundation based on love which impels us to stretch our arms towards our brothers in peace and reconciliation.

Once again, I extend to you my sincere welcome. Thank you for listening and may the good Lord bless us all!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Conference of ASEAN Business Leaders

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Conference of ASEAN Business Leaders

[Delivered at the Fiesta Pavilion, Manila Hotel, November 7, 1988]

REACHING FOR NEW HEIGHTS

The President paints a more conducive business climate for the ASEAN business leaders who came to look more closely at trade and investment opportunities in the Philippines. She enjoins them to make the balance of her stewardship as meaningful and as significant as the past 2-1/2 years in the life of the Filipino nation.

At the outset, let me congratulate the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FFCCI) for its initiative in sponsoring this Conference of ASEAN Business Leaders.

I believe it is the sum of many efforts such as this, coming from different sectors but all pushing in one direction that eventually brings a nation to its fulfillment

Let me also extend a warm welcome to our guests from ASEAN who have heeded the call of their counterparts here to look more closely at trade and investment opportunities in the Philippines.

I know that you will not be disappointed with what our country has to offer. For today, perhaps more than at any other time in the past 20 years; the Philippines is on the rise. The momentum of recovery is building up. It may well overtake other countries that did not have to go through the pain and trials my country has.

Let me present you with unassailable facts.

Less than three years ago, the Philippines was known for its one-man rule. The man who had been elected President in 1965 was still in power 20 years after. He acted like he was preparing to stay on for some time more.

The Filipino people broke that line. They showed to the world in 4 historic days in February 1986 how democracy defends itself. Since then, we have lost no time in restoring our democratic institutions.

The people have ratified a New Constitution. They have elected their representatives to both Houses of Congress as well as their governors, mayors, and other local officials. We have given back to them their civil and political rights. Our independent judiciary has regained its pride and confidence. Peace and order have returned to many communities.

Less than three years ago, the Philippines was also known as the sick man of Asia. Its economy which had led the way for other Asian economies in the early '60s was in a dangerous tailspin. Real GNP was continuously contracting. International reserves were hemorrhaging even as a selected few enriching themselves at the expense of legitimate businessmen and entrepreneurs.

Today, we can proudly say that we have pulled off one of the most phenomenal rescue operations in economic history.

We arrested the nosedive of the GNP in 1986 and propelled it to a growth of 5.7 per cent last year, second only to Thailand in the ASEAN region. We have not stopped as we even exceeded this with a 6.8 per cent growth as of the first semester of 1988.

From a consumption-led growth in 1987, we have made the difficult transition to an investment-led growth. Capital formation radically increased its growth rate from 4.8 per cent in the first semester of 1987 to 22.5 per cent in the first semester of 1988, while personal consumption maintained its more moderate increase of 5 to 6 per cent.

This only means that expenditures are now flowing into the construction of plants and factories and into purchases of durable equipment, all of which directly expand our country's productive capabilities.

Having done away with the stranglehold of crony capitalism and government-run business, we have seen the private sector unleash its long pent-up energies. Industry has been showing the way for the rest of the sectors of the economy, with growth rates of 8 to 9 percent over the last two years.

Even with a burgeoning economy, we have managed to keep inflation below double digits. Prime rates remain at 16-17 per cent; while the peso-dollar exchange rate has been relatively stable.

The labor situation has already normalized. Businessmen are reporting marked increases across the board in gross revenues, net income, employee workforces, capacity utilization and capital expenditures. In fact, in a recent independent Business Confidence Survey (Makati Business Club), an overwhelming majority of the people actually doing business in the country are saying they expect things to get even better in the days to come.

When this government started out less than three years ago, they gave it about six months to survive. Well, this month I will reach my 1,000th day in office — more or less the midpoint of my Administration. I will celebrate it with the full intention of seeing through the balance of my stay as meaningful and as significant as the past 2-1/2 years have been in the life of the Filipino nation.

We still have many more challenges to meet and obstacles to hurdle in our way. The Filipino people are only now beginning to feel the first few gusts of the winds of change that have reached their lives. We must sustain our progress.

That is why we are putting in place the business infrastructure that will encourage many of you to take part in our efforts.

Last year, we passed a New Omnibus Investments Code that provides investment incentives at least equal to what are available in this part of the world. We are now looking at the further reduction of red tape and the simplification of the rules and regulations that affect the doing of business in the Philippines.

We are setting up regional industrial centers throughout the country that will offer the complete range of infrastructure necessary for business to operate competitively in world markets: power, communications, transportation systems and the like.

At the same time, we are pushing through Congress an Omnibus Code for Small Enterprises that will respond to the unique needs of the small business entrepreneur in terms of financing, marketing and raw materials procurement support

We are not wanting in specific viable opportunities for exports and investments. Not far from here, at the Philippine Trade Training Center, the Philippine government and the UN have just opened the Philippine Investors Forum which aims to promote close to 180 identified industrial projects for joint-venture partnerships through equity investments, market access, technology transfer or equipment supply. You may wish to visit and explore the possibilities there.

Let me therefore close with this message.

With the unique combination of its experience, resources and potentials, the Philippines today is unlike any other country in the world. We have emerged from the darkest days of our history into the bright sunlight of a promising future. And we are determined never to look back.

We realize that the journey ahead will be far from easy. Please help us along the way, as our neighbors, our friends, and most of all, as our brothers in our common search for a better quality of life.

Thank you.

Message of President Corazon Aquino at the inauguration of the tower transmitter of GMA 7

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the inauguration of the tower transmitter of GMA 7

[Delivered in Tandang Sora, Channel 7, November 7, 1988]

A TOWER OF POWER

GMA 7 not only survived the siege of the historic event but now makes a historic event of its own – the inauguration of its tower which multiplies its reach and influence to make it a truly outstanding television station.

This is a momentous occasion. The power of the television image is, this day, multiplied enormously by the power of this tower.

I need not remind anyone about the influence of television in shaping perceptions and actions in the world. The Revolution that restored democracy and gave us back the direction of our lives was essentially a revolution of images: the image of cowardice transformed before the eyes of millions of television viewers into images of courage, selflessness and patriotism such as the world had never seen. I speak not only of EDSA, but of the tremendous outpouring of popular support throughout the campaign, all over this land, that the whole world witnessed and which spelled in everyone's mind the certain doom of the dictatorship.

We did not see those images, so they are not a part of the national consciousness. We had it better: we were those images; we lived that courage – once upon a time.

The courage continued even after EDSA, most notably at GMA-7 where my dual and difficult commitment to keep democracy at any price, and yet to resolve conflicts by peaceful methods, was most severely tested.

On the spot, where GMA-7 stands, there would now be a bomb crater if I had wavered in my unpopular decision to settle the GMA-7 affair peacefully, against all "expert" advice. Several tanks were on their way to iron out and flatten out, so to speak, our differences with the loyalist rebels.

Perhaps that was the way to do it, but I had a commitment to keep power as I had gotten it: by peace without dishonor, by reason without compromise.

Those who were at GMA-7 at the time know that we kept the peace, we held on to honor, and the rebels saw the light of the reason.

I am happy to be here, and most pleased to address you on this occasion. GMA-7 not only survived that historic event, but has made a historic event of its own – the inauguration of this tower which multiplies its reach and influence, and makes it a truly outstanding television station.

I am especially pleased to be here because I have heard a great deal about the success of this station, which has become the sterling and enviable example of the spirit of private enterprise and initiative in communications. I see here also the same refusal to compromise principle – in your case, the principle of quality so evident in GMA-7's programming – that saved this station.

For what it is worth, let me say that you have, definitely, this President's constant eyes and ears.

Congratulations on your new tower and your new reach. I have the greatest confidence that an unwavering sense of public responsibility and civic duty on your part will always match and guide the enhanced power that is now in your hands. May others follow your lead and make us all equally proud of what Filipinos can do in communications.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Philippine Business Conference

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the Philippine Business Conference

[Delivered at the Philippine Plaza Hotel, November 11, 1988]

FOR GREATER DECENTRALIZATION

The President is gratified to know that the thrust of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce and Industry is the countryside because this is also the special concern of her government. This is indicated by the CORD program where each region has a cabinet member assigned to see to its specific needs. She assures the group that their recommendations for greater doses of decentralization will be seriously considered particularly on minimum wages, administrative regulations and law enforcements.

The participants of this conference conclude today a year's work on the challenge of rural development and progress. I congratulate you on the recommendations you have made and on the democratic methods by which you arrived at them. I can appreciate your satisfaction with the work you have done, for it was no easy task culling the concerns and refining the recommendations of the business conferences you held in all the regions.

When the Board of the Philippine Chamber of Commerce and Industry paid me a visit last February, they advised me that the thrust of the Chamber would be in the countryside. This was gratifying for the government's first priority had become, after the restoration of democratic rights, the equally democratic enjoyment of material progress by the people — most of whom are in the countryside.

That the countryside is our special concern is shown by the organization of our government. Your regional business conferences have become familiar with the CORD program, where each region has a Cabinet member assigned to track and see to its specific needs. Mr. Victor Lim tells me that this arrangement has made a major difference in the productivity of the regions. Rural projects and programs given high priority by the Regional Development Councils are seen to get the fullest support from the government. So far as I can tell, the CORD program has achieved what was intended: to open a two-way channel of communication between the seat of power and the people, whose welfare and progress are its first responsibility.

Yet, I have been in power long enough to know that you can never relax your vigilance, we cannot take anything for granted. Checks and double-checks must constantly be made to keep everyone on their toes. Thus, in addition to CORD, I have placed the Cabinet Action Committee on Implementation Assistance or CACIA to audit the performance of government in the regions. The CACIA has made weekly visits to the provinces to evaluate the programs being implemented and correct their mistakes and shortcomings with the utmost speed.

So, whatever anyone says, we are confident that the system for effective government action is well in place, and it has been producing results on which I shall report more fully on the occasion of the One Thousand Days of the Aquino administration.

Let me turn now to some of your recommendations.

We see great merit in the fostership program whereby business corporations may adopt a province or municipality as the focus of its countryside investments. The incentive will be in the form of tax exemptions. I think this was inspired by the Pook Batayan concept of asking private sector help to alleviate traffic congestion in Manila. Let me say, however, that rural development will certainly be a more complex and expensive proposition than traffic decongestion. Let me also express the hope that this extension of the Pook Batayan concept will work even better than the original.

I shall give this proposal to the Cabinet Assistance System for study, after which they will submit their recommendations to me. In the meantime, you should convince your business colleagues to start the program even before the tax incentives are in place. For the best incentive is already there: progress and material well-being in the countryside are the best insurance against instability and revolution. Consider that carefully.

You recommend a further decentralization of government services. I could not agree with you more. Which is why as early as May 30, this year, I issued Memorandum Circular No. 63 launching four decentralization projects, namely Davao del Norte, Laguna, Negros Occidental and Tarlac. A Cabinet Action Committee on Decentralization was created to formulate plans and guidelines to implement this policy.

I must tell you, however, that, based on our experiences, administrative decentralization and even central government initiatives are not enough. We are doing our part. The DBP has launched its Proactive Development Fund, which opens loan windows to worthwhile but undercollateralized projects. The PNB has its Small Enterprises Loan Program. There are several more credit programs. Yet, all together, they barely scratch the surface of rural requirements.

We need you, the private sector, to start that engine of the economy that you got back together with your freedom. We need that engine running in such investment-starved areas like Regions I, II, V, VIII and XII. Without those economic commitments, decentralization will mean nothing more than the central government turning its back on the autonomous problems of the regions as no longer its concern.

I am pleased to note that you have made some investment, at least of your time and talents. I mention specially the contribution of managerial expertise in the Agricultural and Fishery Councils. Your participation in the People's Economic Councils has been equally useful and praised, particularly by the Department of Trade and Industry.

The general theme of your other recommendations may be summed up in the words: Red Tape. Not just less of it, but eliminate it altogether.

That is a dream. For as long as there is need for government, which means for as long as we live in an imperfect world, there will always be bureaucrats and regulations. At most, we can strive to make bureaucrats and regulations more useful and less frustrating in the daily activities of the people. The process of elimination will be gradual. Much ground that is gained will be lost again, because regulations that promote progress today, may retard it tomorrow. What is important is that we do not stop listening to the complaints, nor stop trying to improve.

The Board of Investments has streamlined procedures and reduced processing time from 44 to 24 days, and the number of forms to be filled out from seven to one.

Your suggestions of greater doses of decentralization will be seriously considered, particularly on such matters as minimum wages, administrative regulations, and law enforcement. The process of preparing budgets can only improve by closer contact with the economic and political leaderships of the communities those budgets are designed to serve, allowing these communities to define priorities.

Let me conclude by expressing again my appreciation for your efforts; for the great concern you have shown in the vital area of countryside development. With government and the private sector working hand in hand, I am sure that more successes will crown our joint efforts. Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on plant research in Mindanao

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On plant research in Mindanao

[Delivered in Cotabato City, November 15, 1988]

TRIUMPH OF RESEARCH

Three significant events converged on the inauguration of a modest manufacturing plant to produce herbal medicines, namely: the plant is a triumph of Filipino research; it is also a continuing expression of our commitment to the National Drug Policy, and the plant is sited in Mindanao, a land that has symbolized the pioneering spirit of our people. The President adds that the event demonstrates our national will to grow and develop by our means.

In the past few weeks, I have been reviewing the devastation wrought by nature in some of the provinces affected by typhoons. While our government and people are responding well to relieve the pain and suffering of natural calamities, it pains me to see nature's damage added to our already enormous difficulties. It is therefore a source of great comfort for me to attend an occasion when our people has harnessed the bounty of nature for our benefit.

What we are inaugurating here is a modest manufacturing plant to produce herbal medicines. I understand that this plant has a capacity of two million tablets per month or 24 million tablets per year, enough medicines to relieve fever and pain of about one million Filipinos. Viewed from the magnitude of our needs, this plant is a small contribution to national welfare.

But why am I here, calling on our people to celebrate and congratulate its birth? I am here to call attention to three significant developments that converged on today's event.

This plant is, first of all, a product of Philippine research. Our nation's capability to discover and develop medicines from plants has a long history dating back to the Spanish era. But except for a few products like the vitamin B complex preparation, the Tiki-Tiki extract, and the anti-malarial drug from the bark of the chinchova tree, totaquiwa, our society has not benefitted greatly from these research activities. Well, this plant arose directly from the efforts of the National Integrated Research Program on medicinal plants, a program whose researchers were honored during the 88th anniversary of our Civil Service last September 19. This plant, therefore, is a symbol of our determination to generate national benefits from research and conversely to encourage science as an instrument of national welfare.

Apart from being a triumph of scientific research, this plant is also a continuing expression of our commitment to the National Drug Policy, a policy which I enunciated last year. Since then, we have been strengthening and upgrading the Bureau of Food and Drugs; we have caused the withdrawal of 120 drug preparations deemed of questionable safety and efficacy; we are currently conducting an intensified inspection program of drug establishment; we are revising drug registration policies and procedures; and above all, we have passed the Generics Act of 1988, a major step towards rational use of drugs. This plant is a clear step towards self-sufficiency in pharmaceutical production. This plant is one of four that we have established around the country. In addition to government's own production effort, we are looking forward to the finalization of plans to further develop the Philippine pharmaceutical industry, plans that we are formulating with the United Nations Industrial Development Organization. Initial indications are that our country can viably move towards further development of capacity to produce a broad range of antibiotics. This plant should thus be seen as a vanguard of our national effort towards self-sufficiency in pharmaceuticals via local production of key active ingredients.

Finally, this plant is in Mindanao, a fact that should not escape our people's notice. We are inaugurating a facility to produce medicines that we need, from plants that we cultivate, and in a land that has symbolized the pioneering spirit of our people. As we stand in the crossroads of national policy on development and autonomy, we shall always remember that in all our debates, the welfare of our people is a paramount goal, and our own capacity to work together to secure it is our major resource. This plant is yet another reminder that Mindanao can lead our national development in pharmaceuticals as well as in many other areas.

Let me pause a minute to contemplate the benefits of this plant's production. I am told that this will produce four medicinal preparations from herbs in tablet form, namely: lagundi, a broncho-dilator and analgesic-antipyretic; sambong, a diuretic; tsaang gubat, a product against intestinal hypermotility and yerba buena, an analgesic-antipyretic. All these are well known and well studied preparations coming from plants that are native to our country. Aside from being safe and effective, these drugs are also economical. Lagundi for example will be produced at a cost of P0.37 per tablet. The currently available commercial preparation that has the same effect as lagundi would cost about P1.94 or more than 80% more. From this plant, our people can obtain drugs from natural ingredients and locally produced that yield the same therapeutic benefit for a fraction of the cost of existing commercial products.

From these points of view, we mark an important event today, an event that demonstrates our national will to grow and develop by our own means, and an event that yields tangible, practical and welcome benefits for the ordinary citizen. That is why I am here today, to declare that "yes, we can!" And also to say, that our people will benefit in the process.

So congratulations on this achievement, and may this grow and flourish into a truly self-reliant national pharmaceutical industry.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on her 1,000 Days of Presidency

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On her 1,000 Days of Presidency

[Delivered at the Ceremonial Hall of Malacañang, November 21, 1988]

SO MUCH TO BE PROUD OF

The President recounts the reforms and measures she has instituted to insure the country's return to full democracy and economic recovery. While there appears to be a boom in the economy, she admits that there are faults that cannot be covered like the shortfall in tax collection, the glaring garbage problem, the shortcomings in the infrastructure and housing programs and the disappointing anti-smuggling effort.

She nonetheless looks back on the past 1,000 days and see much that we Filipinos can be proud of.

Today completes 1,000 days of the Aquino administration and 1,000 days of our regained Philippine democracy. This day is set aside as a time for taking stock and making judgments on the performance of this government, and the experience of democracy.

Judgment will be rendered on me, and on how well or badly the government has done.

But, equally, judgment must be rendered on the rest of us who pledged with me to serve our country.

Finally, there must be judgment on whether – and to what extent – those who opposed me succeeded or failed in frustrating my plans for our people. Both sides should note their failures and celebrate their victories.

Everyone must submit to judgment or this effort at stock-taking will be useless. If this government were a dictatorship, if no one else had a say in how things are run in this country, then only the government should be judged.

Those who campaigned for democracy along with those who raised the banner of revolt must all face the judgment of the common people who never failed then-country.

For myself, I knew what I had to do. The pledges I made during the Campaign were not just a candidate's promises but the aspirations of a people. Not just a partisan platform, they were an integral part of my oath as the first President of the restored democracy.

The first of those aspirations was democracy. Not economic freedom and profits, but democracy – the Filipino's birthright and racial identity.

None of the poor and striving masses that rallied to my standard asked for investment opportunities or tax incentives – only that I lead them to freedom. This is something to be truly proud of. No other people has shown such total commitment to so pure an ideal.

I was offered the support of the Marcos parliament, if I would keep it alive. If I accepted its modest terms, there would be stability immediately.

I refused the offer. I refused in justice to our people to whom that parliament had lied. I abolished parliament. I became, to put it bluntly, the legislator under the Freedom Constitution. It was essential that no one be able to obstruct me, for I meant to give our people democracy swiftly and to weaken their enemies permanently. With God's help and the people's continuing support, I succeeded in doing both.

With the same powers, I also laid the framework for other reforms – constitutional, administrative, economic, and military.

In adopting a new constitution, I had two choices: an elected convention or an appointed commission. Some of my advisers urged an elected constitutional convention; but a swift transition to democracy dictated the appointment of a commission. An elected convention would have represented only the residual money and machinery of the Marcos dictatorship.

In four months, on October 15, 1986, we had a draft constitution. Over 90 percent of all registered voters turned out, and over 70 percent voted for the 1987 Constitution.

On May 11, 1987, elections for the Congress were held. Again the turnout was record-breaking for any democracy in the world. In the last American elections, only 50 percent of the electorate voted.

On July 27, 1987, I divested myself of legislative power and inaugurated the Philippine Congress. On January 18, 1988, local elections were held and full democracy was in place. We had achieved it faster than in Spain, than anywhere else in the world or at any time in the experience of modern democracy.

I promised the people justice for the crimes committed by the dictatorship.

The government filed 39 civil cases against Marcos and 314 other defendants to recover what they stole from our people. The filing of criminal cases will soon follow, as we relentlessly pursue our commitment to bring the guilty to justice.

I had campaigned for national peace and reconciliation.

Immediately after the Revolution, I ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. I waived court martial jurisdiction over cases of human rights abuse in favor of the civil courts. And I released all political prisoners, among them the founder of the New People's Army, Bernabe Buscayno and party ideologue, Jose Maria Sison. The military objected. But I had pledged a fresh start for all Filipinos who had fought the dictatorship. Some of them might give democracy another chance.

I called for a ceasefire and invited the rebel leadership to a dialogue for peace.

I was serious; the Communists were not.

They demanded a share of political power as the price of peace. I gave the order to resume offensive operations against the insurgents.

The dialogue had failed, but the short experience of peace sowed division in the ranks of the rebel leadership. Our policy of reconciliation first, and force when it fails, has brought down the strength of the insurgency considerably.

Only our enemies will not see that the ceasefire was a moral victory for democracy, and a political setback for the Communists. But that victory came with a price.

The rightwing fringe of the military denounced the ceasefire as a betrayal and launched a succession of destabilizing actions to topple me from power. The assassination of leftist leaders discredited my commitment to human rights. Throughout these challenges I held firmly on to power, but the nation lost its best chance of an early economic recovery. The military rebels succeeded in all but destroying the faith and confidence of the world in our country, and in undoing a great deal of what had been achieved from our early reforms.

Despite these discouraging developments, we continued to make progress, and largely through our own efforts. Foreign investments accounted for only 10% of private investments made in this country, although this is still an improvement over the 3.7% under the dictatorship. Our ability to meet the demands of our foreign creditors proves the strength of the economy. We paid our foreign creditors $8.5 billion in interest and principal – $4.3 billion straight out of our own foreign exchange earnings. We have complied with all the conditionalities and paid out vastly more than we have received. We expect to be treated better than those who have not.

Despite the uncertainty and unrelieved hardship, we pushed ahead with reforms.

We abolished the agricultural monopolies, lowered the prices of many factors of production, and restored initiative and profits to the producers on the land.

We instituted agrarian reform, one of the most important pledges of the campaign. We have given out 154,000 emancipation patents, benefitting 108,000 families. A system of rural credit and agricultural extension services, as well as a massive public works program have been prepared and are being implemented.

We have built 4,411 kilometers of roads; 443 bridges; 896 ports; and 35,028 wells. We irrigated 75,416 hectares of new agricultural lands, rehabilitated 533,473 hectares of existing irrigation systems, and laid out 15,352 kilometers of access roads leading to them. We reforested 18,785 hectares of watershed in, among other areas, Magat, Pantabangan, and Agno River in Luzon, and Alah Valley and Muleta in Mindanao.

We have implemented free secondary education and built 53,184 classrooms.

Congress passed the Generic Drugs law to bring medicines within reach of the common people. Nine million children below one-year of age have been immunized. Public health services have markedly improved, in quality and reach.

We have established better coordination now of government efforts, and more effective consultations with communities throughout the country. We have decentralized political authority and devolved the initial setting of priorities to the regions, their local governments, and their private sectors.

In the field of foreign affairs, we had very successful visits to Indonesia, Singapore, the United States, Japan, China, Switzerland, the Holy See, Italy and Brunei Darussalam. We hosted the ASEAN Summit and the Conference of Newly Restored Democracies.

We have imparted a deeper understanding of our people's democratic experience, and a deeper appreciation of our country's crucial role in maintaining stability in Asia. The recently concluded review substantially increased the compensation for the Bases and ended, on a high note of equal respect, a chapter in Philippine-US relations.

In 1,000 days, GNP grew from a negative 4% to a positive 2% in 1986; to 6.4% in 1987. It was 6.8% in the first half '88.

Three million one hundred seventy-five thousand new jobs were created in the past 1,000 days – more than enough to absorb the yearly fresh entrants to the labor force.

The average Filipino's income increased from P10,900 in 1985 to P13,700 this year – a 25 percent increase in the past 1,000 days during which we kept inflation down to single digit levels. We drove down inflation levels from a high 54% in 1984 to 8.7% this year. We are targeting a per capita income of P15,700 for 1989.

Some critics say these improvements were the result of pure luck. To a certain extent, that is true.

But it was democracy and this government that made sure the tremendous profits that were made went to the procedures, planters, and workers not to the pockets of a dictator and a few.

As the price of its support in the SNAP Election, business asked that it be made again the engine of the economy.

We not only gave the engine, we even reduced the fuel price. In its own 1,000-day report, business must show what it has done with the engine and with the fuel.

For all the talk of lack of confidence, there appears to be a boom in the economy. It may be consumer-led and therefore shortlived, but money is being made today. Yet the corresponding taxes are not being paid. There has been altogether too much crying all the way to the bank and not enough remittances to the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Some blame cannot be shared. There are faults that cannot be covered.

The most glaring is the garbage problem right here in the nation's capital. This is a reflection of the inhabitant's lack of self-respect and discipline, as it is of a government's competence. I have heard the arguments about the impossibility of cleaning up Manila given present capabilities. I do not accept these arguments. I demand results in the next few weeks.

The infrastructure program fell far short of targets by almost 25%. At this rate, we shall never reach our targets.

The shortcomings in the infrastructure program were already evident last June. I therefore organized a Cabinet Action Committee on Implementation Assistance or CACIA to investigate the delay in specific projects, encourage the solution of problems in the Regional Development Councils, facilitate the release of funds, and recommend the removal of obstructing officials.

Some progress has been made in housing, such as the Kalayaan project for police and teachers housing, but it is far short of the target. NHA's capacity will be expanded. The Community Mortgage Program has been launched to enable residents of blighted or depressed areas to organize themselves and own the lots that they occupy and eventually build a decent house thereon, within the concept of low-cost house financing.

The tax collection has been disappointing. Instead of achieving a tax effort ratio of 12.4%, BIR and Customs reached only 11.1%. In money terms, almost P10.7 billion was not collected or 8% of the current budget. The tax collection efficiency of local government units is only 59%.

There is an economic boom out there. Whether it is consumer-led and shortlived or not, the taxes are due. The Bureau of Internal Revenue shall prepare a list of outstanding tax-evaders which I shall forward to the Department of Justice for prosecution. All tax-evaders must be on that list. Tax-evasion is non-partisan; it cuts across political sympathies and will be equally prosecuted wherever it is found.

Just as disappointing has been the anti-smuggling effort. The smugglers are known; there is no excuse for not prosecuting them.

I do not buy the argument that this is a democracy and due process takes time. I am not asking for immediate convictions. Only that the appropriate charges be filed immediately. There is no violation of due process there.

The targets for the next thousand days have been specified in terms of:

A growth rate of 6.5% annually in real terms;
 At least one million new jobs a year;
 Single-digit inflation levels;
 Adequate international reserves;
 Reducing poverty incidence to 45% of Filipino families.

All these have been broken down into specific regional, sectoral and agency targets in the Philippine Medium-Term Development Plan, which is evaluated and assessed yearly.

I find that we cannot afford to wait for one year between reports. I have therefore ordered quarterly reports from the social and economic sectors, such as health, education, and environment, and monthly reports from the infrastructure agencies, such as public works and transportation.

All these will be made public and will permit us to take immediate action on the problems which arise. The more closely we monitor performance, the better our chance for success. We cannot afford to fail.

I look back on the past 1,000 days and see much that we Filipinos can be proud of. I see also, in hindsight, how much more might have been accomplished without the struggle for final mastery that followed the Revolution.

There is not much I regret, not even my failure to strike earlier at the rightwing threat. It was a matter of timing – theirs was wrong and mine was right. The price of delay was, of course, the deterioration of the Philippine image abroad. Yet it gave us the certain survival of democracy.

Aside from God, my greatest trust is in the people who never failed me and brought us through the many trials of the past 1,000 days.

God gave us the gift of freedom; the rest we must work for – keeping our freedom and making progress in the economy.

For myself, I acknowledge the obligation to show that democracy can work for our people in real terms of effective security for our communities and real progress in the economy, of the greater health and education of our children, and in a greener and richer land where we can fulfill the promises we have made to ourselves and our posterity. And always, in working towards these goals, to treat each other with the respect and compassion one owes to a fellow Filipino.

Matatag ang aking pananalig na nasa demokrasya ang ating pagtatagumpay. Na ang demokrasya ang magdudulot sa ating kapaligiran ng wastong katahimikan at tunay na kaunlaran sa ating kabuhayan; ng mas mahigit na kalusugan at karunungan para sa ating mga anak; ng mas luntian at masaganang lupain na kung saan natin matutupad ang mga pangako natin sa ating sarili at sa mga susunod sa atin.

Taas noo nating bigkasin na tayo ay Pilipino – isang lahing gumagalang at nagmamahal sa kapwa, isang lahing handang magtulungan upang makamtan ang ating inaasam na kinabukasan.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the First International Festival on Indigenous and Traditional Cultures

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the First International Festival on Indigenous and Traditional Cultures

[Delivered at the PICC, November 23, 1988]

CULTURE AND NATIONAL IDENTITY

Culture forms the core of Philippine identity, it unifies a race, gives it a national identity and makes one proud to be a citizen of one's own country. The President calls on the Philippine artists to lend our people in forging unity and peace through culture. She hopes that the festival will usher in a decade of promotion of international cultural cooperation among the representatives of ethnic tribes all over the world.

I am deeply pleased to welcome all of you who represent ethnic tribes from all over the world to the Philippines. It is our singular honor to host this First International Festival on Indigenous and Traditional Cultures which ushers in the United Nations — proclaimed World Decade of Cultural Development for the period 1988-1997. Incidentally, this coincides with our own Philippine Decade of Nationalism.

The other day, I rendered a report to the Filipino people on my one thousand days in office. I stressed the fact that I considered the ratification of a new Constitution by over 70% of our people as pivotal to our efforts to restore the democratic institutions which were lost during the dictatorial regime.

Given importance in this Charter are the rights of some ten million Filipinos belonging to about 110 ethnic tribes.

Very explicitly, the State is mandated to “recognize, respect, and protect the rights of indigenous cultural communities to preserve and develop their cultures, traditions, and institutions. It shall consider these rights in the formulation of national plans and policies.”

And because basic to their survival is their rights over their ancestral lands, the State is further bound to “protect the rights of indigenous cultural communities to their ancestral lands to ensure their economic, social and cultural well-being.”

The government has created three offices to address the needs of the cultural minorities: the Office of the Northern Cultural Minorities, the Office of the Southern Cultural Minorities and the Office of Muslim Affairs.

Through these agencies, we seek to preserve the identities of the individual tribes and protect their rights. For as each nation progresses, there is a real danger of the cultural groups being swallowed up.

Let me cite to you a concrete illustration of how an ethnic tribe's identity was all but lost in the cross-currents of media hype and scholars' unscholarly posturings. First brought to modern men's awareness in the early '70s, the tiny Tasaday tribe of South Cotabato in Mindanao was given full exposure in the prestigious National Geographic Magazine. For apparently materialistic motives and to open the group's 19,000 hectares of rich agricultural and timber ancestral lands for exploitation, some scholars with media support denounced the existence of the tribe as a hoax. With the integrity of the discoverers and the concerned government agency at stake, Congress had to launch its own investigation through its Committee on National Cultural Communities. Many extended hearings later, the Committee confirmed that the Tasaday tribe is indeed a genuine and separate tribal group.

If I have taken pains to narrate to you the story of a tribe that was almost wiped out of existence by the inroads of present-day manipulations, it is merely to underscore the need for vigilance on the part of governments to keep intact their traditional cultures.

The survival and preservation of the identities of ethnic minorities in any country can only enrich a country's culture. I am sure that, in your own countries, culture also brings you together, gives you a national identity, makes you proud to be a citizen of your own country. That is what culture does in my country. It forms the core of Philippine identity. It makes us one. It makes us what we are, as a people, as a nation.

That is why, more than a year ago, I personally asked Philippine artists to get involved in the project that has resulted in this international conference and festival, I said then, as I say again now, that artists must lead our people in forging unity and peace through culture.

I was sure then that, with the help of Philippine artists, particularly those from the private sector, the Philippine government would be able to fulfill its commitment to the International Theatre Institute and to the United Nations when we first invited you to come to Manila to have this conference and festival.

The United Nations and UNESCO launched this Decade for Cultural Development because they realized that culture and development are inseparable. A nation, all nations, for that matter, cannot develop if culture does not develop. A world without culture is a retarded, a stunted world. Culture is a key to development. The development of culture is itself a major step towards all other forms of development — political, social, economic, spiritual, intellectual.

We are aware of the delicate balance between national unity and cultural diversity. Sometimes, nations tend to encourage uniformity, rather than unity. This tendency is understandable, in the light of what are sometimes perceived as more immediate political or security problems. But we in the Philippines believe that cultural unity can be and should be achieved within the framework of cultural diversity. And with a healthy respect for each other's cultural traditions.

It is good to know that there are more things that unite us than there are things that separate us. We all seek answers to the same questions. We all share the same problems crucial to our cultural survival and integrity. We all know that we can achieve national peace, even international peace, only if we learn to live with each other. To respect each other. To understand and to love each other. This is what it means to live and operate in a global village.

Now this conference and festival will usher in a decade that will achieve many things. Among them, the acknowledgment and enhancement of the cultural dimensions of development, the affirmation of cultural identities, the broadening of public and private participation in cultural life and the promotion of international cultural cooperation.

You are familiar with these goals of the decade. And I have no doubt that you will make them more concrete as you address issues and concerns that affect cultural development around the world.

I am also elated that you are showcasing new kinds of artistic expression inspired by the wealth of our ancestral roots. Your creative interaction with each other and with each other's traditions, your explorations and discoveries in the workshops, exhibits, performances, and film showings during this event will surely reaffirm our common humanity. This is our investment in building one peaceful world.

I wish to commend the UN, the UNESCO, the organizers and the non-governmental organizations which made this first-of-a-kind event possible. Their efforts will go a long way in ensuring unity among and within nations even as the rich legacy of diverse indigenous cultures are preserved for the ages.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the ASEAN Accountants

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the ASEAN Accountants

[Delivered at the PICC, November 29, 1988]

TO TELL THE TRUTH

The President exhorts her audience of ASEAN accountants to contribute their analytical skills in realizing the ASEAN dream. She says that they are the best placed of all sectors to advise the leaderships of the ASEAN states on the steps that should be taken to bring ASEAN nations faster and more safely to their dreams.

She advises them not to bend to tremendous pressure from their inflexible standards of truth. For theirs is the higher calling, to tell the truth.

It has been almost a year since the six leaders of ASEAN met here to forge a more meaningful role for the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. In my own remarks at that summit, I expressed the view that “the key to ASEAN’s strength, to its increased recognition as a respected force in international affairs, is the economic progress of each and every one of its members.”

I was speaking as the new leader of a country that had been less fortunate than all the others in its leadership. A country that fell behind the region it was leading. But it is also, now, a country whose recovery and continuing progress bespeak the effectiveness of its secret of success.

That secret is the truth, the truth that sets all men free; the willingness to face the facts, and tackle them fearlessly and without hesitation.

I am pleased and honored to be addressing a profession whose first and last duty is the discovery and fearless presentation of the truth: the accounting profession throughout ASEAN.

It is your function as accountants to track fearlessly and impose coherence on the myriad facts generated by the economic activities of your respective countries and of the region as a whole. As you know, it is ASEAN’s dream to have a regional complementary economy. That dream has eluded us up to now.

The reason is that we know, without grasping the details, the obvious fact that our countries have developed unevenly. As a result, if we were to push the complementation of our economies, all we would achieve is the subordination of some of them to the others. Rather than knit ASEAN more tightly together, this unequal relationship will be the force that will finally split ASEAN permanently apart

Worse, we do not even understand sufficiently each other’s economies. As a result, our plans are at best vague aspirations that are too risky to implement as they are. As a further result, we begin to lose faith in the ASEAN dream.

What is needed therefore is a clearer and more detailed grasp of the ASEAN economies. With that certain grasp, we can then make, as a regional organization, the right decisions that will finally realize the ASEAN dream.

This is what you can help us achieve. You command the information about our economies, down to the last detail. You command the analytical skills to make sense of this information. You are the best placed of all sectors to advise the leaderships of the ASEAN states on the steps that should be taken to bring us faster and more safely to our dreams.

The mass of information generated by the vigorous growth of the ASEAN economies, a vigor now shared by the Philippines, increases geometrically and makes correspondingly greater demands on your information gathering and analytical capabilities.

Under this tremendous pressure, you must not bend, even an inch, from your inflexible standards of truth. Only the unvarnished and even painful truth can help ASEAN achieve its aims.

Potential investors in the regional economies turn to the accounting profession for advice. This adds to the pressure of each national profession to downgrade the economies of the other countries, and play up its own economy. Such one-sided judgments detract from the honor and dignity of the profession. Yours is a higher calling: to tell the truth, in the unwavering confidence that the people who listen to you will act right accordingly.

This is what I ask, more particularly, of the Philippine accounting profession: be accurate, so we can know how far we have gone as a nation and what our mistakes have been to avoid repeating them. Above all, help us, as businessmen, to know what our obligations are to ourselves, to our posterity, and to the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

I wish this conference every success. Good day and God bless you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Fulbright Scholarships

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On the Fulbright Scholarships

[Delivered at the Philippine Plaza, December 6, 1988]

A BENEVOLENT INFLUENCE

The President sees on this occasion a time to remind ourselves that the best hope of a lasting friendship between America and the Philippines lies not in a shared perception of international risks but in the renewal of our faith in that gift and common heritage.

In the Fulbright Program, she recognizes the education of her government where she sees in its roster of distinguished alumni people who are now working closely with her.

The Philippine-American educational program — better known by its flagship, the Fulbright Program — had a movingly symbolic beginning. The program was established immediately after the Second World War. It was to be administered by the U.S. Educational Foundation in the Philippines using funds from the sale of war surplus property. The Fulbright Program was almost literally an attempt, in the aftermath of history's most terrible war, to beat spears into pruning hooks, and swords into plowshares to work the rich heritage of human learning,

On the level of national strategy, it was a rare attempt to build an enduring bi-lateral friendship, not by partnerships of military and economic convenience, but in the hearts and minds of two peoples who held certain truths to be self-evident. Such truths as that God created all men equal, that all men have certain inalienable rights, and that the subsequent inequality of men through the violation of these rights give rise to the duty to change the government and erect another more truly dedicated to the safety and happiness of the people.

These words need not be identified. They express the heritage of all men, yet also America's greatest gift to mankind.

I am happy to be invited to this occasion, for it is time to remind ourselves that the best hope of a lasting friendship between America and the Philippines lies, not in a shared perception of international risks nor in accommodations to each other's economic interests, but in the renewal of our faith in that gift and common heritage.

Certain moments in the dramatic restoration of Philippine freedom brought back a taste of the original purity of our two peoples' democratic commitments. I think of the broadcast journalist who interrupted an argument on the Political impracticality of an official US commitment to Philippine democracy, with the words, "But this is family." He was implying that certain things are beyond strategic calculation and must be decided by faith.

All that seems so long ago. On both sides, the talk since then has been about military necessities and economic pressures which seek to bend our original high purposes to lower and more pragmatic ends. Where we both once spoke of a second economic chance for the people to complement the rebirth of freedom, we are careful now to be practical, to accept a lesser improvement in the lives of the common people to avoid greater dangers to the country as a whole. "Prudence" is the watchword, in a setting where friendships fired by idealism are fast fading away.

We note these changes with some regret, yet also with a firmer resolve to forge ahead and achieve all we can of the vision that awoke the heroism of a race. We forge ahead in the hope and in the faith that we of this generation shall still see that vision completed.

A great part of that hope is grounded in the belief that idealism still abounds on both sides of this relationship. The sterling proof is the Fulbright Program, to which I can say I owe practically the education of this government. For I see in its roster of distinguished alumni many of those who struggled and worked beside me. To name only a few: Presidential Spokesman and reluctant everything, but now, just the same, Senator Rene Saguisag; Customs Commissioner and now, to his intense relief, Senator Bobby Tanada; and that courteous companion and fellow worker in our struggle for freedom, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Marcelo Fernan. I see the names of current members of my Cabinet also.

And I see the name of another Fulbright scholar who learned to love freedom not wisely but too well, and gave his life to give it back to his people. He reminds us that there are things — principles and goals — that are beyond calculation and compromise.

These names prove what I have said: That America cannot exercise a more benevolent influence in the affairs of other nations than by building in the hearts and minds of men.

I wish the Fulbright program and other programs like it every success and express the hope that they will continue to generate, among our people, brave and able workers for their welfare and unyielding protectors of their freedom.

Thank you and good evening.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the Energy Management Association

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the Energy Management Association

[Delivered at the Manila Garden Hotel, December 9, 1988]

LIFEBLOOD OF INDUSTRY

Government has taken significant steps to forestall any crisis in energy in case the OPEC reaches a consensus that would result in higher oil prices throughout the non-oil producing world. The President however, emphasizes that the principal actor and factor for the success of the government's energy program remains the private sector, the main energy consumer.

I am pleased to be here today before a sector that is crucial to our country's continuing progress. This conference is held at an auspicious time: the upturn of the Philippine economy after many years of decline.

The economy pulled itself out of negative growth almost immediately after we took power, showing that it is morale more than material that the economy needed to get out of the doldrums. It posted a 5.7% GNP growth last year, and 6.8% in the first half of 1988. All the indicators favor our achieving the 6.5% GNP target we set ourselves for the year.

We have a right to be proud of the progress we have made. Yet equally we have the duty to take the measures necessary to maintain and increase the growth momentum we have achieved.

The price of economic progress has been higher energy consumption. Thus, in 1987, the country increased its energy consumption by 6.5%, it is now using energy at the faster pace of 10.9%. Electrical consumption alone is 12.8%, with industry showing the highest demand growth rate of 15% among all sectors.

These statistics prove the progress that is being made. Yet equally they show the area of our greatest vulnerability.

Energy is the lifeblood of industry; the single most important factor for economic progress, not to say survival. But energy, to a great extent still, is not a natural resource of our country.

It behooves us therefore to take stock of our energy requirements, to review our native energy resources, and study the measures that must be taken to achieve greater energy independence and a wiser and more conservative utilization of the energy we generate and import.

We may be tempted to delay in this duty. There is a glut in the world's production of oil. But nothing is forever. The OPEC will one day achieve a consensus among its members and higher oil prices will again be the order of the day throughout the non-oil producing world. For that day we must make preparations.

Government has taken the significant steps.

We have organized training programs for your engineers to become energy conservation managers. We have already sponsored 69 training courses with a total participation thus far of 3,225 representatives from 1,120 government and private groups and 33 engineering schools. In addition, briefings are being conducted in schools and universities so that energy conservation becomes the natural reflex of a nation that is dangerously dependent on outside sources for the life-blood of its economy.

Government also offers to private industry energy audits for free. Thus far, 622 audits have been made.

The Federal Republic of Germany has been most helpful in our energy conservation campaign through its Rational Use of Energy project or RUE. I suppose the acronym expresses the warning that “We shall rue the day of higher energy costs and lower energy supply, if we do not act now to conserve energy.” The project gives expert management advisory services to energy-intensive industries.

We recognize that damage control, so to speak, is not enough. We must go on the initiative in finding more creative and efficient uses of energy.

Cognizant that new energy technology is expensive, we have set up, with the US AID, the Technology Transfer for Energy Management or TTEM project to spearhead the development of local energy conservation technology. The project, although new, has had notable successes, with PLDT and Benguet Corporation. Fully operational the project is expected to generate combined savings of nearly 1,234 megawatt hours of electricity per year. While this is a mere P2 million pesos, compared to the project cost of P5.2 million, we believe that over the long term we shall come out ahead.

We have started to offer tax incentives to industry for energy conservation measures and technologies, but the principal actor — and factor — of the program’s success remains the private sector, the main energy consumer. We are relying on this organization to galvanize the private sector in this campaign.

Other non-oil producing countries have risen to the challenge of high energy consumption and costs, and prospered remarkably. I see no reason why the same challenge before this country should not result in equal success.

Thank you.

Revised Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the celebration of the 40th International Human Rights Day

Revised Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the celebration of the 40th International Human Rights Day

[Delivered at the Philippine Training Trade Center (PTTC), December 10, 1988]

STANDING AGAINST HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATION

With the celebration of the 40th International Human Rights Days came the declaration of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. There is no better example of respecting human rights than the EDSA Revolution where people stood up unarmed for their human rights and for the human rights of the soldiers who opposed them. The President says that respect for human rights is the core value of our bloodless revolution and the single most important reason for the survival of democracy.

This celebration of the 40th International Human Rights Day pays tribute to the common bond of decency that proclaims all men as brothers. That bond is the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

We call it universal because all men, by their humanity, declare an unwavering commitment to respect those rights. The preamble of the Declaration is clear on this:

“The General Assembly of the United Nations proclaims this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and nations,

“to the end that every individual and every organ of society shall strive

“by teaching and education

“to promote respect for these rights and freedoms

“and by progressive measures

“to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance.”

I have quoted the preamble at length because we must return to the root for the true meaning and spirit of the commitment that the world made to itself after history’s most terrible conflict.

Wars had never been like this. It was not a war for economic advantage and military glory only, but one aimed at the annihilation of whole peoples simply for being who they were.

The war was a crime against humanity, for the aggressors denied the humanity of all who did not belong to their race and follow their creed.

It was a war where signal acts of human endurance were overwhelmed by shocking acts of inhuman cruelty. Acts committed by individuals against individuals – in military prisons, in concentration camps, in the charnel houses of the great dictatorships.

It is not surprising therefore that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights marks out the individual, and not just governments, as carrying a special obligation to promote, by teaching and education, respect for human rights; and by progressive measures, secure their universal and effective recognition and observance. Thus:

By specific order of the Human Rights Commission, detainees are accorded liberal visitation rights and their persons are secured against mental or bodily abuse.

By executive order, an extensive education and information campaign has been conducted to spread awareness and respect for human rights.

And finally, by living example, we, the Filipino people, taught the world how to respect human rights.

There at EDSA a people stood up unarmed for their human rights and for the human rights of the soldiers who opposed them.

There at EDSA an army responded with equal respect for human rights by not firing on the unarmed multitude. No army in the Western world would have shown such forbearance. What might have been the tragedy of Kent State became the miracle of EDSA.

There are those who question the human rights commitment of this nation and this government. I want them to prove their accusations. I, and everyone else concerned about the safety of democracy, have a stake in punishing the human rights violators in the military. The hand that can abuse a prisoner will have the mind to plot a coup d'etat. Such violations show an indiscipline and inclination to anarchy that a democracy cannot tolerate in its armed forces.

Until that time, I must say what the facts proclaim: That this new government has never adopted, by neglect or design, a policy or pattern of human rights violations for any purpose.

That there are sporadic violations of human rights in this country, I must acknowledge. We are only in the third year of regained democracy. The inhumanity of people obsessed by power or possessed by dogma, whether in the uniform of the regular army or in the casual wear of the insurgency, will be with us for some time yet.

But for as long as Filipinos have a democracy, human rights violations will never become the pattern and policy of government in this country.

Sadly, I cannot speak for all Filipinos. I cannot speak for those who refuse to adopt peaceful means to express their rejection of democracy. If there is a pattern of human rights violations, if there is a conscious policy of terrorism in this country, you will find it among them.

The government does not shoot traffic policemen to secure the fearful respect and cooperation of the people.

The government does not demand ransom from individuals as the price of their lives.

And we do not execute our fellow workers for their mistakes.

As every individual must respect the human rights of everyone, so must his human rights be respected by all.

"Everyone has the right of life, liberty and security of person.

"No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

"Everyone," says the Declaration, "is entitled to all the rights and freedoms" set forth therein.

That includes the policeman who falls to the pavement with a shattered head.

That includes the poor farmer whose children are killed or horribly disfigured because their homesteads have been chosen as the battleground of an ideology.

That includes the insurgent who is executed because he gave a second thought to democracy.

And that includes the leftists and labor leaders who were tortured and assassinated by the rightwing elements in the military.

Yet the same obligation to respect human rights that binds governments binds the killers of these people as well.

I cannot allow any accusation against the human rights commitment of this country and this government to go unchallenged – or uninvestigated and unpunished.

It is not a matter of pride, but of memory. It is a matter of self-preservation.

Those of us who lived in the shadow of violence under the dictatorship, will not allow it again to darken the door to human rights and freedom that we have opened for our people.

That there are violations, the Lupao massacre proves. That they will occur again is inevitable in any country riven by a rebellion led by fanatics.

I have made it clear that I intend to win the war against the insurgency. There will be no substitute for the permanent victory of democracy.

I have given the order for the vigorous prosecution of the war so that its early end will shorten the agony of this nation and hasten the recovery of its former strength and status in this region.

Yet, I will not accept the heat of battle as an excuse for brutality – towards the people we are pledged to protect, and even towards our enemies. Democracy needs force, but this government will not stoop to terrorism to survive.

I welcome the continuing concern of human rights groups, both here and from abroad, about the human rights situation in the Philippines. We need all the eyes that can be spared to uncover the abuses that still occur, even as we need every pair of hands to bind the wounds and bring the perpetrators to justice. I welcome most specially the recent vigilance of Congress, particularly the Senate.

Yesterday I met with some members of FIND (Families of Victims of Involuntary Disappearance). They were accompanied by Senator Wigberto Tanada. Also present at the meeting were: Executive Secretary Macaraig, Justice Secretary Ordonez, Chairperson Mary Concepcion Bautista of the Human Rights Commission, AFP Chief of Staff Renato de Villa, Brig. Gen. Rodolfo Biazon, Brig. Gen. Aguirre, Defense Undersecretary Quisumbing, and Special Presidential Counsel Azcuna.

Secretary Ordonez proposed and I approved the designation of city and provincial state prosecutors as “human rights coordinators”, whose immediate task will be to help relatives search for their missing kin in military camps and detention centers.

I shall set up a committee, to be chaired by a representative of the Department of Justice, which shall have as members representatives from the Office of the President, the Human Rights Commission, the Department of National Defense. There will be two representatives from private sector human rights groups. If Congress so desires, both houses shall also be represented in the committee. I shall take this matter up with the Congress at the earliest opportunity. This committee shall monitor the human rights situation so it can advise me on the proper measures to be taken.

This is a matter of the greatest urgency. What is at stake here is the life of democracy. We must be on our guard against the emergence of a pattern of human rights violation, against any systematic abuse of the people, because these are the harbingers of dictatorship. Martial Law in 1972 was preceded by systematic and widespread violence. The same violence may be the signal for another assault on our freedom. If only out of self-preservation, we cannot relax our vigilance.

Respect for human rights is the core value of our bloodless revolution. It is the single most important reason for the survival of the democracy we installed. Without it, we lose the meaning of our struggle against all who seek to destroy our freedom – whether fascist or communist. We shall be no better than our enemies; no better than the murderers of our husbands and children.

That will not happen.

Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Filipino farmers in Mindanao

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines Before the Filipino farmers in Mindanao

[Delivered at the Dolefil/Del Monte – NDC, Cotabato City, December 12, 1988]

A STRUGGLE AGAINST FEAR

The day is a significant milestone for a great number of Filipino farmers who became owners of the land they have worked, and partners of their former bosses. It is the single biggest land transfer to agrarian reform beneficiaries thus far. President Aquino commends the gesture of the multi-nationals to rise to the challenge of the times while she acknowledges the work done by the various government agencies.

Today we mark a milestone in the history of the Filipino farmer and in the history of multinationals in the Philippines.

We mark a milestone because we are distributing to a great number of Filipino farmers great stretches of agricultural lands that were operated and exclusively controlled by foreigners. In these lands, the Filipinos were mere workers, and the foreigners were virtually the landowners and bosses — benevolent ones to be sure. For the way these companies treat their workers has been a reproach to our own management practices.

Now the workers have made a giant stride — in their prospects of an even better life. For today they become owners of the land they have worked, and partners with their former bosses. It is our hope that this partnership will release an even greater burst of industry, a more copious flow of wealth, than these rich lands have seen.

Our achievement today is the fruit of a long and difficult struggle. That struggle has been mainly against fear. The fear of trying something new.

Of breaking with a tradition of bondage on the land that is centuries old.

Of breaking away from the fear that the ancient promise of agrarian reform will prove inconsistent with the modern and more productive practices of agriculture.

That we are here today to parcel the lands of some of the biggest multinationals around is a testament both to our fearless resolve to bring land justice to the people and to the wisdom and compassion of the multinationals who have joined with us, rather than opposed us.

This is the single biggest land transfer of agrarian reform beneficiaries thus far. Del Monte and NDC-Guthrie alone have transferred 15,300 hectares of land to 10,300 farmers and farmworkers. Dolefil has transferred 9,000 hectares which will benefit 7,000 farmworkers. Together, these transfers will benefit about 14 percent of the targeted beneficiaries under Phase One of agrarian reform in Mindanao.

The multinationals I have mentioned have risen to the challenge of the times. They have shown the wisdom to grow with our country, and to help our people attain their proper dignity as free and independent workers on the land. I hope that you, the multinationals, will continue in this generous vein. Your long and productive experience working these lands gives you an edge in know-how that I hope you will share with your new partners. I, on the other hand, assure you both that government will extend the fullest assistance in making this new partnership work.

I should like to acknowledge the work done by the various government agencies, such as the Departments of Agrarian Reform, Agriculture, and Natural Resources, and the Land Registration Authority in making this event possible. But their continuing dedication and work is essential to the success of the new partnerships we have forged. The National Development Company must be especially commended for its efficient management of the NDC-Guthrie joint-venture, which shall now directly benefit its workers. Unlike with other enterprises run by the past government and its friends, we are not picking up the pieces but spreading the benefits of a well-managed venture. We expect the NDC to continue providing the same talent and energy towards the success of other agro-industrial projects, and thereby show to the landowners that there is life and progress in other fields after agrarian reform.

In closing, I should like to address the other landowners in Mindanao. The multinationals, who had the most at stake in the old system, have dared to try the new. Their cooperation with agrarian reform is a challenge to Filipino landowners to show the same foresight and the same appreciation for the ancient aspirations of our people. Agrarian reform is the key to bringing to the vast majority of our people — not just to a select few — the fruits of the economic progress we are striving for. I know they will rise equally to the challenge.

Thank you and good day.

Message of President Corazon Aquino on the visit of Soviet Union Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the visit of Soviet Union Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze

[Delivered in Malacañang, December 22, 1988]

A MESSAGE OF CHANGE

The President says that the Soviet official's visit signals the Soviet Union's intent to assume her place among us as an Asian country. She welcomes the visitor as the bearer of a universal message of change with a plea for Asians to restructure our world to our respective national visions.

This is the first high level visit of a Soviet official to the Philippines in a long time. We view Mr. Shevardnadze's visits to this part of the world as a signal that the Soviet Union, through the Soviet Far East, will now assume her place among us as an Asian country. She comes at a most opportune time, on the threshold of the century of progress that is promised for the Pacific.

We remark the geographical fact that the greater and most promising part of the Soviet Union is in Asia, even as the Soviet Union herself cannot deny that the strongest driving forces in her history have come from its Asian parts.

We welcome the Soviet Union's renewed interest in her Asian heritage. We view that renewal without alarm, despite its great power, because under her new leadership, she comes to Asia not as to her Eastern front but as to the roots of her history and the place where her greatest economic and cultural progress will unfold. We look to the development of the Soviet Far East with equal eagerness, for the progress of any part of Asia can only add to the stability and progress of the whole.

More importantly, we welcome the Soviet Union, not only as a fellow Asian country, but as the bearer of a universal message of change. She comes with the message of perestroika. She comes with a plea that we Asians restructure our world according to our respective national visions, yet with due regard for the universal aspirations of humanity, just as the Soviet Union has bravely embarked on her own restructuring.

We note the congruence of our own desires for a prosperous and peaceful world with the goals expressed in the new thinking in the Soviet Union.

There is the goal of a world made safer from nuclear destruction by reductions in the destructiveness and deployment of nuclear weaponry.

There is the goal of a world made less cruel and bloody by the limitations on free market access to conventional weaponry, whose lethality equals that of nuclear weapons – as the millions of dead in recent conventional conflicts would testify, if they could speak.

There is the goal of a world made stable, secure and humane by just laws and fair conduct among nations, rather than intimidated into a fragile order by the terrifying prospect of destruction by superior powers.

There is the goal of a community of independent nations that have realized their unavoidable interdependence if they wish to survive the crises that are upon us already.

There is the crisis of the environment which is progressively being poisoned and destroyed — by a few for the few — to the prejudice of mankind and the future of the race.

There is the crisis of the international economy which is growing in the parts that need it least, and regressing in the parts that cry out for the alleviation of their shocking poverty and misery — the Third World which is being crushed under the burden of debts and protectionist policies.

There is the crisis of energy as the world prodigally finishes off the unrenowable sources of mankind's material progress and the foundation of civilization as we know it

And there is the crisis of humanity faced with the prospect of nuclear extinction.

This is the gravest crisis, yet also the area of greatest hope. For progress in this field has been truly remarkable in recent years. The INF treaty comes immediately to mind.

The earnest and fruitful talks between the great powers on issues of national security are an even more hopeful sign that the sorting out of problems and the search for solutions shall thenceforth be, in Mr. Gorbachev's words, "along the lines of dialogue" rather than the vectors of force.

That traditional foes can come to such far-reaching agreements on such deeply antagonistic issues as nuclear security gives the rest of us hope that the same cooperation can be universally achieved in areas of common concern, such as the protection of the environment and the limitation of the incidence and destructiveness of conventional wars.

The new thinking in the Soviet Union would have us all cooperate in achieving a new balance — not of terror, as in the past — but of interests as in the future that can be ours if we would only dare to attempt the new.

Ladies and gentlemen, please join me in a toast:

To our distinguished visitor Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze, one of the principal architects of the new stability in the world;

To the Soviet Union who has opened the Asian wing of her great house to the future in the Pacific;

And to the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, and the message of perestroika, and its challenge to us all to reach out to each other — over the barriers of national suspicions, ideological blindness, and political ambitions — and remake the world in the image of everything that is universal and good in mankind.

Za sovietski sayuz iye družbu. (To the Soviet Union and friendship.)

Toast of President Corazon Aquino at the State Dinner in Honor of U.S. Senator Richard Lugar

Toast
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the State Dinner in honor of Honorable Richard Lugar, Senator of the United States of America

[Delivered at the State Dining Hall, January 7, 1989]

A FRIEND OF DEMOCRACY

The President commends US Senator Richard Lugar as a committed man who led the group of US Congressional Observers to the Philippine Snap Election. Their presence, according to her, influenced significantly the final outcome of the events that led to the restoration of Philippine democracy.

In relation to the events that led to the restoration of Philippine democracy, we have praised the realists who saw at the last hour the situation for what it was and wisely acted accordingly. When people, Church and army united behind my victory, nothing could undo it. The most practical counsel was to accept it; the most dangerous folly to resist it.

To those who doubted our determination to vindicate our victory at the polls by a revolution in the streets, I made it clear that they were inviting the long-term displeasure of the next government for the short-term pleasure of the foredoomed incumbent.

Yet still we commend those who read the obvious and came down finally on the side of right and freedom. For it is always difficult to change old ways of thinking for the new, untried, and uncertain.

But the highest praise must go to those who see the future not as it must unfold, given the naked balance of forces, but as it must be given one's commitment to a certain vision of political freedom and human dignity.

Among such committed men is US Senator Richard Lugar, whose presence honors us and brings back vividly the selflessness of those days that now seem so remote from the ways of the present.

Senator Lugar, as we all know, led the group of US Congressional observers to the Philippine SNAP Election. As a foreigner, Senator Lugar will admit to only the passive role of observer of those fateful events. I think we are mature enough to acknowledge that Senator Lugar and his group did more than observe; they influenced significantly the final outcome.

Senator Lugar and his group did not agree to come and watch just any election that the dictatorship would stage. Their critical contribution started even before the SNAP Election when they laid down clear guidelines for a fair election.

Those guidelines became the watchwords of the Philippine struggle: NAMFREL accreditation, opposition representation in the COMELEC, recognition as Dominant Opposition Party, equal access to media, neutrality of the Armed Forces, a quick count by the COMELEC and NAMFREL, and the presence of international observers.

Given those conditions, the future was set for the restoration of Philippine democracy by elections. For all the people wanted was a chance to be heard, and their call would sound clearly for change.

By the same token, the violation of those conditions would hasten, rather than delay, the restoration of Philippine democracy – by a revolution. For all the people needed was a last straw to break the back of their patience.

Senator Lugar denounced the violations in the strongest terms. Yet if his statements were initially ignored by his government, they gave us the greatest encouragement here at home. He showed us a face of America we had started to despair of.

Somehow he managed to get himself invited to virtually every TV news program. He hammered on the message that for the US to back the dictatorship, in the face of its frauds, would be to march with a false and fallen friend into a foreign policy disaster. The truth of his message must have spoken for itself, for I am told that Senator Lugar can be as flat a speaker as I am reputed to be. Yet his message hit home and America officially came down on the side of freedom.

Senator Lugar served his country well by his actions in those days. Without him, there would be no Philippine-US relations to speak of by now. For, against the official line, Senator Lugar came right out and said that the preponderance of fraud was by the dictatorship. This mollified the national rage over the allegation that the people had committed fraud to match the fraud the dictatorship had perpetrated on them. Senator Lugar's words assured us that truth held an honorable place in the American pantheon of values.

Three years down the road from that fateful, almost fatal, turning point in Philippine-US relations and I believe that we shall need Americans like Richard Lugar as those relations evolve and adapt themselves to the emerging realities of our country, the region, and the Pacific as a whole.

We need men with the intellectual clarity to see things here for what they are: unavoidable and not always neat stages in a people's sense of nationhood coming finally to completion; and the sincere attempts of a developing nation to overcome its condition, and rise to the full height of its aspirations of material progress, social justice, and genuine sovereignty.

We need Americans of his faith that so long as our two countries share the same vision and practice of democracy, we shall always be friends and useful allies, genuinely concerned for the common safety yet understanding and respectful of each other's unique approaches towards that common end.

Senator Lugar is described in a short biography as "not a man of passion." That is good. For passion is dangerous to long-term relationships, for which the best ingredients are reason, mutual respect, commonality of fundamental values, and the steady trust of tested friendships, such as the friendship of Senator Lugar and our country.

Ladies and gentlemen, please join me in a toast:

To Senator Lugar and his wife, the best of health and continued success in all their endeavors.

To President Reagan, the American people, and the American vision of liberty and justice for all. Long may they live and prosper.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino to the Western Police District on the occasion of their 88th anniversary
Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Western Police District on the occasion of their 88th anniversary

[Released on January 9, 1989]

MANILA POLICE, MANILA'S FINEST

The Manila Police Organization has well deserved the honor of being called "Manila's Finest". It has proved that democracy can protect itself quite well if its guardians have just two basic qualities: loyalty and courage. The President said that an anniversary is not only a time for celebration but for reflection as well on the many members of the Manila Police who gave their lives to deserve its distinction as first among the forces of law and order.

Bago ang lahat, nais ko munang ipaabot sa ating mga panauhin at sa lahat ng ating mga kababayang Pilipino ang taos-pusong pagbati ko sa inyo ng isang Manigong Bagong Taon.

At sa mga kawani at tauhan ng Pulisya ng Maynila, nais kong makiisa sa inyo at sa mga taga Maynila sa pagdiriwang ng ika-88 anibersaryo ng pagkakatatag ng inyong kawanihan.

The Manila Police organization has held fast to the honor of being called "Manila's Finest." It has well deserved that honor, particularly in the period of General Alfredo Lim's forceful leadership.

It has discharged with distinction the traditional police role of maintaining peace and order in the capital city. It has added to that distinction by playing a signal role in the defense of democracy and in the stunning defeat of its enemies. It has proved, by its vigorous enforcement of the laws, its relentless suppression of political anarchy and plain criminality, that democracy can protect itself quite well if its guardians have just two basic qualities: loyalty and courage.

These qualities the Manila Police has in abundance, I am grateful to say.

As the oldest police organization the Manila Police is expected to provide the role model for police organizations throughout the rest of the country.

Its efforts to cleanse its ranks and impose internal discipline must have shown it that this is the more difficult and challenging task, a task as old as the first question of political science: Who will guard the guardians, who will police the police?

The Manila Police has been very conscious of the importance of this task, for on it depends the continuing faith of our communities in the primacy of law and order and in the usefulness of government.

I am pleased to note that the Manila Police has pursued relentlessly the cleansing of its ranks. Our communities need not fear that the continuing purge initiated by General Lim will reduce the forces committed to law order. By winnowing out all but the best, this process can only have a multiplier effect on the efficiency of the organization that will remain. Anyway, the pride of the Western Police District is not in its numbers but in its quality.

An anniversary is a time for celebration, especially when it marks the 88th year of an organization that is almost as old as Philippine independence. Yet it is also a time for bereaved reflection on the many members of the Manila Police who gave their lives so that it might continue to deserve its distinction as first among the forces of law and order. We honor them this morning by calling attention to that distinction, which is owed in no small part to their final sacrifices.

We take this occasion also to thank the many civic and barangay organizations whose cooperation enhance greatly the effectiveness of police forces. We take note also of the support extended by the Metro Manila Commission headed by Governor Elfren Cruz. I am particularly pleased at the help extended by media, which the Manila Police formally acknowledge this morning.

On the suggestion of General Lim, I would like to make special mention of the tremendous contributions of the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce, whose president is honored this morning. I am referring to the forty-one (41) brand new mobile patrol cars the Federation has donated to the Western Police District.

We are in a new year, on the threshold of the decade that will decide whether we shall realize the full potential of our country or settle for less. The past year was one of great progress, of many achievements that I think should be acknowledged. Yet, unquestionably, much remains to be done, particularly in the peace and order situation. I am determined that we shall make significant inroads into that problem this year. To that end, I want to relieve our police forces of many of the stumbling blocks that prevent them from doing a good job.

Take, for instance, the multitude of agencies authorized to investigate police abuses, such as the PC JAGO, the police court martial, the PC Inspector General, the CIS, the Provost Marshall, the Regional Staff Judge Advocate, the Regional Inspector General, the Regional Intelligence and Operation Unit, not to mention the Napolcom and the NBI. While law enforcement agents who violate the law deserve specially to be punished, the many more who adhere faithfully to their duties do not deserve such harassment.

To that end, and in recognition of the civilian character of the police forces, I shall initiate as a priority administration bill the amendment of PD 1850 reverting to civilian courts the prosecution of criminal complaints against policemen. Administrative complaints shall be the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Police Commission. The bill shall further provide that the Adjudication Board shall include a member from the National Police Commission, another from the Department of Justice, and a third from the civilian police organization.

To equalize opportunities for career advancement, we are studying the feasibility of a One-Year course for non-officer policemen that will graduate them as police lieutenants on a par with graduates of the Two-Year Philippine National Police Academy Bachelor Course.

I have instructed the National Housing Authority to accelerate its studies for more housing for police forces. In particular, I have instructed the NHA Director and the General Manager of the GSIS to immediately look into the possibility of a housing project for the Western Police District.

Several other proposals are under study, such as automatic job placement in government; and a four-year college scholar for at least one child or a chance to enter the PNPA under preferential admission rules.

I am directing the Department of Budget and the INP Director General to study the conversion into cash value of accumulated sick and vacation leave credits of policemen, even before their retirement, and to be paid on a yearly basis.

As the police command tasked to maintain law and order in the capital city, where the seat of government is located, I cannot over-stress the importance of your role. Nor can I exaggerate how well you have discharged it, particularly in helping to quell the last and gravest threat to democracy. As you are Manila's Finest, that day when you stormed and took Channel 4 and other rebel redoubts was your finest hour. Let it not be the last of such moments in the long and — I have no doubt — equally distinguished period that lies ahead for you.

I thank you for your service. The government commends you most highly for your professionalism. The people of Manila thank you for your sacrifices. Our nation honors you for your loyalty and courage, for your commitment to its safety and its freedom.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the multilateral aid plan Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the multilateral aid plan

[Delivered on January 19, 1989]

A SHARED CONCERN

With the initiation of the US Congress for a bi-partisan call for a multilateral aid plan for the Philippines and with the creation of the Coordinating Council of the Philippine Assistance Program, the President opines that we are now prepared to advance the activation of this plan for freedom, justice and progress.

Along with the restoration of democracy, we set out to secure the material progress that is essential to its long-term survival.

These were the challenges we faced:

To build from an utterly ruined economy,

To raise the living standard of a growing population living in the direst poverty,

To restore to its former strength and high standing, the economy of our country, and

To prepare this nation for the period of greater growth, yet also of fiercer economic competition, that lies ahead for the Pacific.

Motivated by the desire to be part of that future, yet fearful also of losing our precious freedoms in the sea of poverty that already engulfs the majority of our people, we set out to recover what we had lost and build higher towards our goals — freedom, justice and progress.

The process of attainment was simple: A democracy cannot survive with the majority of its people in poverty. Poverty cannot be eliminated without economic growth. Growth can be attained only harnessing the productive energies of private enterprise. And private enterprise cannot be productive unless liberated from state interference on the one hand, and supported by basic infrastructure on the other. The implementation has been far from simple or smooth-going.

Yet, we achieved a measure of success no one can pretend to overlook, and of which we are justly proud. By our own efforts — fettered by obligations and hampered by the consequences of the corrupt and mistaken practices and policies of the past—we made progress, astonishing progress. The challenge of growth with equity, rendered yet more difficult by the economic decline with which we began and by the crushing legacy of debt, was met vigorously by sweeping reforms that gave new life to the economy and a new faith in our country—among ourselves and among the nations who have stood up to be counted as our friends.

Yet, we have always known that the timely completion of our task, before regressive forces overwhelm our efforts, depends not only on ourselves but on timely and meaningful financial assistance from abroad.

The dilemma of growth and debt threatens the survival of democracies and must be a shared concern of the international community.

Its resolution is a shared responsibility.

The consequences of failure will be everyone's fate.

Recognizing these facts and inspired by the success of a similar effort in the past, four legislators from both Houses of the US Congress initiated a bi-partisan call for a multilateral aid plan for the Philippines. They proposed to repeat the assistance mounted for a Europe liberated from the Dictators for a Philippines liberated from its own.

In a parallel development, the leaders of seven leading industrial countries meeting in Toronto in June last year endorsed a similar proposal put forward by the President of the United States.

In response to this liberal and far-sighted initiative, I constituted a Task Force to develop, in consultation with sectoral groups, the framework of a program that will efficiently absorb the assistance contemplated by the initiative.

The work of the Task Force has reached the stage where it can only continue on the level of a Coordinating Council, able to draw on the resources, expertise and the coordinated actions of the various agencies and departments of governments and of groups in the private sector.

I have therefore created the Coordinating Council of the Philippine Assistance Program. The Council shall be a tri-lateral body with members of the Cabinet and representatives of the Congress, as well as of the private sector.

I am pleased that a distinguished citizen, Mr. Roberto T. Villanueva, has agreed to serve as my special representative to foreign governments and institutions for the adoption and early implementation of the international aid plan. He will act concurrently as Chairman of the Coordinating Council. In both capacities, he has stipulated that he will serve pro bono but in a full-time capacity. We all commend him for his high sense of duty and patriotism.

As Chairman, he is empowered to call on all departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of government to assist him in this task. I appeal as well to the private sector to lend him every cooperation and assistance. What he has committed himself to accomplish is for all of us.

My decision to draft a man of Mr. Villanueva's accomplishments and stature underscores the importance of the aid program in our over-all plan of development, and the critical part that the sector from which he comes will play in the success of both the program and our developmental efforts.

With the creation of the Coordinating Council and the appointment of its Chairman, we are now prepared to advance the activation of the multilateral aid plan.

When the initiative was made, it was asked if we were prepared for it. With the greatest confidence, pointing to our accomplishments to date, we answer: We are.

Thank you.

Toast of President Corazon Aquino in Honor of Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Thailand, Chatichai Choonhavan

Toast
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
In honor of Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Thailand, Chatichai Choonhavan

[Delivered at the Ceremonial Hall, Malacañang, January 26, 1989]

PEACE THROUGH PROGRESS AND PROSPERITY

The President wishes the Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Thailand, Chatichai Choonhavan, and his lovely wife, Khunying Boonwen Choonhavan, long life, greater success and happiness. She hopes for a stronger friendship and cooperation with Thailand, and a long and happy reign to His Royal Majesty, King Bhumiphol, the spirit and guiding light of their country's progress and prosperity.

We are honored by the visit of the Prime Minister of Thailand, Chatichai Choonhavan. The Prime Minister, I learned, is also the Defense Minister. In the past, he was Minister of Industry twice in the periods that we associate with the remarkable progress of Thailand which has made her a model for the populous, agro-industrial nations of Asia. He is the first prime minister in twelve years to serve as an elected member of parliament. His cabinet, largely composed of members of parliament, has been hailed as a new step in the development of democracy in the Kingdom of Thailand.

We can say of him that he has one hand on the helm; another, prudently, on the sword of his nation; and his shoulder, farsightedly, to the wheel of the economy.

The remarkable things that one could say, and learn, from Prime Minister Chatichai do not stop there.

In the progress and prosperity that Thailand has achieved under a succession of wise and dedicated ministers in the inspiring service of His Majesty King Bhumiphol, Prime Minister Chatichai has seen the key to enduring peace in an embattled peninsula.

The way to peace lies in removing the roots of instability and war: underdevelopment and poverty, and the suspicion and aggressiveness they foster in countries that see themselves as too weak to assume the posture of peace.

Prime Minister Chatichai has extended Thailand's hand of cooperation to the militant nations of Indochina; offering to turn, in his words, a zone of war into a zone of peace through the shared progress and prosperity of the nations whom fate has thrown together in that peninsula. If the gesture was totally unexpected coming from a country continuously under threat, the responses have been equally astonishing and hopeful from Thailand's "ideologically different" brothers in the area.

In the fraternal spirit in which the offer was made, so, it seems, has it been accepted. The Philippines and other Southeast Asian nations in the Pacific have good reason to hope that the tremendous energies that went into the fiercest war in recent memory will be directed with happier effect towards the progress and amity of all who must share the common destiny of this region.

Peace, it is said, is breaking out all over. Prime Minister Chatichai is making sure that this placid epidemic does not subside. He is feeding the fever through the region-wide replication of Thai progress.

The task that Prime Minister Chatichai has set himself is enormous, and he has proved himself equal to the task. Yet for his daring vision alone, he has our highest respect and admiration.

Many great and unprecedented things are taking place in Southeast Asia and the Pacific, things having to do with the materialization of the economic and political potential of the Region — for the further progress of its economies and the fuller enjoyment of freedom among all its peoples. But two achievements stand out for their similarity: both are conquests of fear — fear of one's own weakness, fear of one's perceived enemies. These fears fed the tragedies from which they arose and assured their endless repetition.

One of these victories over fear took place on a stretch of highway in the Philippines. The other in the hand of friendship and cooperation extended by a brave and wise man to his country's long perceived enemies.

Ladies and gentlemen, please join me in a toast to the Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Thailand, Chatichai Choonhavan, a major architect of the Asian peace and progress to which we all aspire, and to his lovely wife, Khunying Boonnien Choonhavan: long life, greater successes and happiness.

To the friendship and cooperation of our two countries — may they grow stronger and wider.

And to His Royal Majesty, King Bhumiphol, the spirit and guiding light of Thailand's progress and prosperity, a long and happy reign in the affectionate regard of his grateful people.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 2nd ASEAN Science and Technology Week

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 2nd ASEAN Science and Technology Week

[Delivered on January 30, 1989]

NEW AND EMERGING TECHNOLOGIES

The President welcomes the ASEAN Heads of Government in a joint declaration meeting to strengthen Intra-Asean cooperation in Science and Technology. In that declaration, a development of an intelligent and productive work force is called for. She added that Asean's growth lies in the development of further technologies and sharing them with the rest of the Asean region.

I am pleased to welcome all of you to the Philippines.

We are certainly honored to host the Second Asean Science and Technology Week.

At the Third Meeting of Asean Heads of Government in Manila in December 1987, all member States signed a joint declaration stating, among others, that we would strengthen Intra-Asean cooperation in Science and Technology to improve the quality of life in this part of the globe. This gathering is but one step in support of this pledge to help one another.

In developing countries, poverty and culture are often blamed for the creeping pace of Science and Technology. For it takes intensive education, specialized training and tremendous research to breed scientists. Then too, a huge outlay is needed to bridge the gap between the theoretical and the applied or practical sciences. Unfortunately, most of us in Asean do not have these finances. Thus, we suffer the irony of being economically disadvantaged due to our lag in technology. Which lag, in turn, is due to our being economically deprived. And so, pure science and research have become luxuries for a select, highly qualified few whose potentials are subsidized and gradually developed by whoever can afford it.

For some of us in Asean, technology has taken a back seat to other priorities. The needs of the majority are still the basics of food, shelter and medicine. So that whatever technologies we have developed have been directed toward feeding and housing our teeming millions, keeping flesh and bones together.

But let me ask you: If we are to become the newly-industrialized countries of the 21st century, should we, at this point barely a decade away, still continue to concentrate on basic needs alone? Must we still follow the old notion that third world countries should solve the problems of hunger and poverty only through traditional approaches? That, to my thinking, would relegate us to the status of forever developing. Of being perpetual receivers of second-hand processes and goods from better-developed nations. Of being favored dumping grounds of outmoded technologies.

I believe you agree with me on this. That is why your theme for this conference is "New and Emerging Technologies".

This is not to say that we should change our priorities. Our primary task is still to solve the problems of food, clothing and shelter. We need to do so, if we are to aim for peace and prosperity. We can pin our hopes on adaptive technology to increase our harvests. To maximize the use of our resources. To improve communication and transportation. To unify peoples fragmented by language, geography and beliefs. And while we do so, v/e can welcome more advanced technology so that we may compete in the world market, and thereby lift ourselves from the morass of poverty.

I fully support the two-pronged approach in Science and Technology that was included in the agreement drawn up at the Asean Summit of 1987. In that declaration, we called for the development of an intelligent and productive work force capable of keeping up with international advancements in Science and Technology while it evolves its own knowledge and experience from a Southeast Asian perspective.

Allow me then, to call your attention to this phrase – From a Southeast Asian Perspective. Today, we lag behind the West in Technology. And so we borrow: we borrow technology; we import sophisticated machinery and trained technicians to operate them; and at the worst, we import the whole product itself.

But someday we will become leaders in some scientific fields. This conference buoys up our hopes.

For now, we can, perhaps, take as models the experiences of our industrialized Asian neighbors. We can adapt. We can innovate. We can copy and then improve. Or, hopefully, we can draw our very own set of methods and processes, develop our own equipment to manufacture new, Asean-discovered, Asean-made products — but all from an Asean perspective.

The key to our growth is technological self-reliance. Only with it can we rid ourselves of any form of technology and import dependence. And, to a large extent, of that albatross around our necks called foreign debt.

But to achieve together this coveted rise in status, we need to share our knowledge, our resources with each other. We must balance out each other's needs. For instance, I understand that with all the gigantic strides that Thailand is making in new fields, the country is hard put getting the trained manpower to operate at optimum levels.

In the Philippines, we have a large pool of engineers and capable technicians. With a little retraining to suit the needed technology, an exchange of resources could be made possible: know how vis-a-vis manpower. With this, we can help each other out.

I want to emphasize the necessity of full cooperation among Asean member nations. For no single Asean nation has a monopoly of the scientific advances and resources needed to propel us all to the future as NIC's. I am glad to note that cooperation is clearly spelled out in your conference's objectives.

In the spirit of cooperation, therefore, each nation must identify its strengths and weaknesses in new technologies. I am aware of the broad range of specializations that you intend to compare in this conference. May I encourage you then, to be open with your latest discoveries, as well as your needs?

We, in the Philippines, are happy to share with the rest of the Asean region our modest discoveries in new and emerging technologies.

For instance, we have noteworthy accomplishments in software generation for information technology. We have made significant strides in Biotechnology for agriculture. From a native weed called Talahib, our Biotechnologists have isolated a nitrogen-fixing bacterium that reduces in half the nitrogen fertilizer input for rice and corn. Our forest biologists have succeeded in increasing the height, diameter, volume and bio-mass of trees.

Our scientists have generated simple, low-cost devices for dehydrating perishable rootcrops so that these may be converted into stable and ready-to-mix forms. I have also been informed of new approaches to animal feeding and new in-vitro fertilization techniques.

Our researchers have also established the possibility of utilizing pulverized charcoal as a substitute for imported fuels.

Likewise, we have formed a task force to identify the scientific and technological activities which will boost Philippine economy to the level of a newly-industrialized country by increasing our gross national product annually. By the turn of the century, hopefully, our annual growth rate shall have reached ten percent a year.

Let this growth be our humble contribution to the Asean dream of reshaping this region through technology.

It has been said that a country that does not undertake research is bound to stay hungry and frail and, therefore, politically unimportant. This is where our thrust towards new and emerging technologies in Asean becomes most significant. We cannot forever depend on handouts from the super-rich.

As I welcome you, so do I challenge you now, the best and the brightest of our Asean scientists and technologists. Your most important contribution to Asean's growth lies in your development of further technologies, truly Asean discoveries, that will pull us out of hunger, of sickness, of poverty. Technologies that will emancipate us from our dependence on non-Asean expertise. Technologies that will eradicate want and bring happiness and economic abundance to all of Asean.

Once again, I welcome you all and wish you success in this cooperative undertaking. Mabuhay kayong lahat.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the Luncheon with World Bank Officials

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the Luncheon with World Bank Officials

[Delivered on February 15, 1989]

OPTIONS FOR GROWTH

The President welcomes President Conable and his party to the Philippines and expresses her gratitude to him and the World Bank group for the assistance extended to the government to support the country's economic recovery, as well as for services through consultations, project missions and studies.

We are pleased to welcome President Conable and his party to the Philippines at a time of promise and continuing challenge.

In the autumn of eighty-six, I had the privilege of meeting with you, Mr. Conable (and Mr. Larossiere, your former counterpart at the International Monetary Fund), in Washington, D.C. We discussed the broad objectives of my government and the policies taken to reverse the debilitating decline in income and production bequeathed to us by the previous administration. You welcomed our restoration of democracy and endorsed our efforts to rebuild the Philippine economy. Shortly thereafter, your bank extended financial assistance to support our economic recovery.

By the end of 1988, the World Bank had approved 9 loans to this government for a total commitment of US$998 million. During this period, the international Finance Corporation of your World Bank group had also extended direct support to 10 private enterprises in the Philippines, through equity, loans, and guarantee operations, amounting to cumulative commitments of US$109.89 million. Your staff had rendered a wide-range of services through consultations, project missions, and studies that had contributed to our deliberation of policy options and formulation of projects. We are therefore grateful to you and the World Bank group for this rich range of assistance extended to my government.

From the nadir of three years ago, our economy has bounced back. Output is up for the third year with unemployment declining. Private enterprise has been reinvigorated by major political and economic reforms. Investments have recovered with business confidence restored. Exports have accelerated as inflation is kept within bounds. While this performance may stand out among heavily indebted countries, more needs to be done.

A majority of our people still live in poverty. We have to improve their condition and ensure that growth is broadly based to better their life. More jobs need to be created to absorb the unemployed and the 700,000 new additions to our labor force each year. Agrarian reform has to be accelerated with ownership broadened to millions of landless farmers. They in turn must be supported and transformed into self-reliant producers.

The thrust is to open up opportunities for harnessing their productive energies and channelling these to income generating activities. This would provide the foundation for enduring improvement in the well-being of all our citizens. The majority in poverty must have a stake in the creation of wealth of the nation. Their alienation from this process was the seed for insurgency that tears at national cohesion and drains limited resources from productive enterprise. Growth therefore has to be sustained with equity.

This task is fundamentally ours and best served by promulgating efficiency and productivity in the economy. However, our resources are severely constrained, with up to 30% of our foreign exchange receipts used to pay our external debt and 43% of our budget diverted to service both our external and domestic debts. For us to succeed, continuing assistance from the international community is essential.

To obtain the necessary inflows required for sustaining growth, we shall continue to work closely with the international community and the World Bank. With them, we will develop projects and programs deserving of support. Given our large overhang of inherited debt, it is imperative for us to maximize recourse to highly concessional assistance. We shall also continue to explore options with our creditors for debt reduction schemes to alleviate debt constraints on our growth. We look forward to initiatives from the World Bank in addressing and resolving this problem of debt.

President Conable, I have been informed of your heavy schedule and that of Mrs. Conable for the brief duration of your visit. Before your departure you would have met with government officials, members of the legislature and the business community, non-governmental organizations, and our lively press. You would have visited some project sites and acquired direct knowledge of poverty and environmental problems in the Philippines. In your dialogues and visits, you will gain insight into issues, problems, and how these are resolved in our democratic setting. With your long and distinguished service in the U.S. Congress, I am confident that you will appreciate the political process involved in arriving at national decisions on policy choices and look forward to your trip as a meaningful one that will be reflected in greater world bank support for projects and programs sensitive to our political environment.

Ladies and gentlemen,

May I invite you to a toast in honor of his Excellency, Mr. Barber Conable, President of the World Bank, and Mrs. Charlotte Conable, for their continued good health, happiness and success.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 5th Asian Parliamentarians' Conference on Population and Development

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 5th Asian Parliamentarians' Conference on Population and Development

[Delivered on February 17, 1989]

CHALLENGE TO PARLIAMENTARIANS

The President notes the issues to be tackled in the Conference that have a direct bearing on our respective countries' progress and prosperity. The challenge to Parliamentarians is to strengthen the population programs so that people may be fully aware of their options in attaining the desirable population levels in accordance with their conscience and moral beliefs.

It is my pleasure to welcome all of you to the Philippines for this 5th Asian Parliamentarians' Conference on Population and Development.

When Parliamentarians meet, it is but to be expected that the substance and processes of law will dominate the agenda.

This time it will come as no surprise if the high-flown rhetoric on the floor is heavily spiced with socio-economic and demographic jargon instead of legalese.

For you are gathered here, not to wrestle with the abstract but to address issues that have a direct bearing on our respective countries' progress and prosperity.

Those of you from highly industrialized economies have much to share with those of us from the developing countries in terms of how we can push up our GNP and pull down the levels of population. Japan, Singapore and even Malaysia have, through the years, managed to stabilize their population growth. So have other western nations that now seek a turnaround to raise fertility rates from estimated zero population levels.

On the other hand, policy makers in developing countries continue to be challenged by high birth rates that have outstripped the resources at hand.

This imbalance in the ratio between population growth and resources has resulted in low income levels, unemployment and underemployment, malnutrition and inadequate housing, education and health facilities.

In the Philippines, our task in government has been mandated clearly enough in the constitution in these words: "The state shall defend the right of spouses to found a family in accordance with their religious convictions and the demands of responsible parenthood."

As I see it, the challenge to parliamentarians is to strengthen the population programs adopted in their countries by appropriate legislative action. At the same time, the different governmental agencies and non-governmental organizations, taking their cue from such initiatives, can complement these programs by conducting broad information programs so that the people may be fully aware of their options in attaining the desirable population levels in accordance with their conscience and moral beliefs.

I wish all of you a most fruitful and meaningful dialog.

Good day and thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Commencement Exercises of the Philippine Military Academy

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Commencement Exercises of the Philippine Military Academy

[Held in Baguio City, February 19, 1989]

IDEALS FOR THE MILITARY

The President enjoins all Filipinos to dedicate the next generation of officers to the ideals of the Revolution: freedom, justice and national reconciliation. She urges the graduates to fight the enemies wherever they appear and threaten our people — the Communist terrorist in city and barrio, the right wing Conspirator in our military camps, and the lawless elements who seek to deny unity to our country.

This will be the last PMA class to have witnessed from this hill the great historic events that unfolded in our country below.

The Academy's commencement exercises have been moved closer to the anniversary of those events. Not deliberately to connect the two events, yet the change has produced the deepest symbolism.

Now, each generation of officers must step forward and take their duties in the shadow of the People Power Revolution of 1986.

Now, each generation of officers must take their commissions under the burden of proving themselves worthy of that event, and the obligation to uphold the ideals it represents.

In that light, I ask all Filipinos to join in dedicating the next generation of officers to the ideals of the Revolution: freedom, justice and national reconciliation.

Three years after EDSA, the freedom is unquestionable. But the work of justice has barely started. And national reconciliation is still a dream.

Yet the duty stands, incumbent on officers and men, on President and nation, to complete the work of justice and realize the dream of national reconciliation in the fullness of freedom that we enjoy.

Those who made the Revolution may never see reconciliation completed. For some, the wounds have been too deep to ever heal completely.

Yet we cannot give up.

We cannot concede that we and our posterity must forever array our forces on lines of opposing views-the Left against the Right, and both against the Center. For this would be the ultimate betrayal.

It would be the betrayal of those who fought and died, he and many others, in the dark night of the dictatorship for just such a reconciliation.

It would be a betrayal of the spirit of the people who turned a near bloodbath into a miracle of compassion.

No, the work must go on—to reconcile the factions that still threaten to rend our society, and the opponents of democracy to our unshakeable resolve to make it endure.

But if we cannot mend the quarrels and divisions of the past, at least let us not hand them down to the next generation.

To the enemies of freedom, the armed opponents of our government on the Left and the Right, I address these words:

Let us sit down and try to settle our differences by talk, and if we cannot, by all means let us do so by arms. But let us not infect the next generation, in civil society and in the armed forces, with narrow causes and partisan hatreds from the past.

Let us save the future generations for the task that still needs to be done: to reach by the work of every Filipino hand the goal that once united us—a nation free and just and peaceful, united and strong.

Let us keep the future pure for that end, especially the future that stands before us today in the proud uniform of idealism and sacrifice—the next generation of officers of the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

To the graduates of the Philippine Military Academy, Class of '89, I say, You are leaving the walls of this Academy at a time when important changes are taking place in the country. You will step forth from this day into a country of refired hopes, of real progress, and of better prospects of peace than our troubled land has had for a quarter of a century.

As you come forward to receive your commissions, you will receive into your charge the gains that our country has made in the past three difficult years.

These gains are very important. They were made in the face of the gravest threats and the most daunting challenges. Every step forward was bitterly contested, and stoutly held. Not an inch of ground was surrendered. In three years, we reversed this country's descent into economic collapse, political disintegration, and social revolution and started our ascent to the future.

It is so easily forgotten how bad the situation was. But those of us who have helped raise this country from desolation and despair remember it well. We built it up, stone by stone, in the teeth of our enemies, who mocked the halting progress of the country they had crippled. We plodded on, we persevered—to reach this day and beyond it to the future that we all seek.

Those who sapped the strength of this country will ask you to join them in exploiting its weaknesses. Ignore them.

Ignore them out of patriotism. Ignore them out of prudence.

This country, this government, and this leader have more strength than appearances suggest.

It is the character of democracy to look weak. It is the fate of its vanquished enemies to feel its strength.

Four years in this Academy have taught you your role in the scheme of progress. Your duty is to defend what your government and our people are building.

The intervention of the military in Philippine politics under the dictatorship and in the Revolution is supposed to have confused the military mind.

There is no confusion.

The military serve for honor and the sum of military honor lies in this: the professional soldier always obeys the Commander-in-Chief and never runs from a fight.

You have my orders. You know the enemy: the Communist terrorist in city and barrio, the rightwing conspirator in our military camps, and the lawless elements who seek to deny unity to our country. Fight them wherever they appear and threaten our people, our work, what we are striving to make of this country.

The battlefield is everywhere. That is the nature of the threat, the challenge to your intelligence and leadership. The mission is to protect our people and establish the social conditions of progress-law and order. The prize is the loyalty and respect of our people, the peace and prosperity of our country.

Your government cannot give you all the men and logistics for the task. You are expected to make up for the shortage of both with an excess of dedication and zeal. A lot will be expected of you, which only an extraordinary self-discipline and courage will enable you to fulfill.

You will be continuously under fire—from the guns of the enemy and the attacks of front organizations that seek to instill in the people fear and loathing, rather than confidence and respect, for the uniform you wear. At times it is you who will be painted as the enemy. But the discipline imbibed in this Academy will enable you to survive these assaults and complete your mission.

That discipline is also the key to breaking the insurgency. For what we seek to win in feats of arms are the hearts of men.

Let no one find in your actions faults that would prove to the people that the enemy is the better choice.

To the enemy, show the fighting qualities for which you have trained long and hard at the Academy. To the people show the utmost concern for their safety and the most careful regard for the human rights you are sworn to defend.

This is the fight into which you have asked to be called. All the rest is politics, of which this country is beginning to have too much.

The long grey line that passed in review this morning includes those of us, in or out of uniform, who share its spirit of total service. It extends beyond the graduates here to those who have passed before and left us memorials of their courage. It reaches farther back still to the birth of the nation, to the examples of our heroes, to the root of all service in the Republic: duty, sacrifice, and love of country.

Thank you.

To the Philippine Embassy Staff

[Held in Japan, February 23, 1989]

TO THE EMBASSY STAFF

The President thanks the Philippine Embassy Staff in Japan in keeping the friendship and respect between two peoples and enjoins the staff to continue their good work.

We are gathered here on a most solemn occasion — the funeral of the late Emperor of Japan. We came to share with the Japanese people the burden of their grief, as well as their joy and highest hopes for the reign of their new Emperor.

Japan is an important partner of Philippine progress. It is one of the most important players in Asia today and in the foreseeable future. We are fortunate that our two peoples have only the greatest friendship and respect for each other. That friendship has been well kept and encouraged by the Philippine Embassy staff and by our most able and dedicated Ambassador Ramon Del Rosario. His unflagging efforts to translate this tremendous fund of goodwill into concrete cooperation and assistance in Philippine developmental efforts deserve our highest commendation. That commendation he shares with the staff whose support and talents he has constantly attested. I thank you all for the good work you have been doing.

We are privileged to be here on a most important historic occasion — the funeral of a Japanese Emperor and the accession of another. It is the most important moment in the history of a most interesting, dynamic nation. We should remember it well that we may be able to pass the memory of it to our posterity. We, who are gathered here — members of the embassy, members of the Filipino community in Japan, are a part of that moment. That we are sharing it has forged a special bond between us.

I thank you again for what you are doing and urge you to continue the good work.

Mabuhay!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the burial of Emperor Hirohito

Speech
of

President of the Philippines
At the burial of Emperor Hirohito

[Held in Japan, February 23, 1989]

A LAST TRIBUTE

As the Japanese people shared the anguish of our struggle for freedom, as well as the joy of our victory, the President joins other world leaders in paying a last tribute to the late Emperor of Japan and the bright hopes for the reign of the new one.

We are leaving to join other world leaders in paying a last tribute to the late Emperor of Japan. In so doing, we express the desire to share with the Japanese people the burden of their grief at the final rites for their beloved emperor.

The emperor Showa's reign spanned the most momentous events in the history of Japan and the world.

His reign opened at the rising of the Japanese sun. It has closed in greater and truer glory – a peace-loving, more prosperous, and neighborly Japan

As the Japanese people shared the anguish of our struggle for freedom, as well as the joy of our victory, so do we, the Filipino people, open our hearts to their grief at the passing of their old Emperor and their highest hopes for the reign of the new one.

In the new Emperor's time we may see the fulfillment of his father's hopes at a time when the world was rushing into war. I quote the poem he wrote in January 1940, the month of his death 49 years later:

On		this		New		Year's		Day
We	pray		for	the	time	to		come
When		east,		west,		and		all,
Making		friends		with		one		another
Will share in a prosperous future.

I shall take to the Japanese people our condolences over their loss, and our congratulations at the new age that has opened for Japan and Asia — as expressed in the late Emperor's hope.

Before going, may I say that every provision has been made to assure the tranquility of our own state in our absence, not least the vigilance of a free people on the eve of celebrating their democratic victory. This is the most dependable provision of all.

I leave in the profound assurance of our own strength and common resolve to keep the flag of freedom flying in our country. I shall be back well in time to join you at EDSA.

Message of President Corazon Aquino to the New Japanese Emperor

Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the New Japanese Emperor

[Delivered at a toast on February 23, 1989]

LESSONS FROM THE EMPEROR

In this occasion, the President wishes the new Emperor a long and happy reign and hopes for the continuance of our two countries' abiding friendship and common resolve to see both our peoples progress further in wisdom and well-being.

I am very pleased to be with you this evening. Gathered here are some of the most important people in Japan whom the Philippines can count on as friends.

The occasion that has brought us together arouses mixed feelings. I can understand the sadness at the passing of one who was Emperor and spiritual guide to the Japanese state and people, and who was, to the rest of mankind, an example of kindness, humility, and complete devotion to duty, all the more remarkable for who he was. I was greatly honored and deeply moved to have made his brief acquaintance.

Yet the occasion is also one of even brighter hopes for the reign of the new Emperor. There is no question that in his reign, Japan's voice will be listened to with even greater regard than heretofore, in the councils of Asia and the rest of the world.

In the deliberations that must precede the entry of the world in the 21st century – whether held within our respective governments or between our countries – I hope that all shall keep in mind the words of the Emperor Showa:

*Would that the wise voice
Of the man in the street
Spoke daily to guide us,
That we might do no wrong
In performing our duties.*

In the last analysis, he is saying, it is to the welfare of the common people that the productive capacity and energies of all nations must be bent. Let us take inspiration from his great compassion for the small, and let our hearts, in his words, go out:

*To all our people
In a prayer for their well-being.*

I am deeply honored to be here in Japan on this auspicious moment in her history. And I am most sincerely pleased this evening to be among friends of the Philippines.

Please join me now in a toast,

To our two countries' abiding friendship, to our common resolve to see both our peoples progress further in wisdom and well-being, and

To the Emperor, a long and happy reign.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the 20th Anniversary of AIM

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines During the 20th Anniversary of AIM

[Released on February 28, 1989]

DEVELOPER OF MANAGERIAL TALENT

The President stresses the role played by the Asian Institute of Management (AIM) in the emerging economic dominance of Asia. She added that once upon a time, the AIM met the challenge of Asian growth. Now she gives it the challenge of Filipino progress. The AIM should continue its sharing of managerial expertise with the rest of Asia and must help our country, our government and our people scale the heights of progress to fulfill our dream of a peaceful, prosperous and progressive Philippines.

The Asian Institute of Management is called alma mater by some 13,000 managers from all over Asia, and the number is growing. That's quite a constituency for me to be addressing. Moreover, it is a constituency that is notable not only for its size but for the role it played in the emerging economic dominance of Asia.

The start of the AIM twenty years ago coincided with the beginnings of the Asia that now commands the respect and careful regard of its competitors in the West. Let me say therefore how very pleased I am to be here with you to mark this milestone in the history of the Asian Institute of Management.

It was 20 years ago that AIM started to fill the need for the managerial competence to release and direct Asia's tremendous productive forces, just then stirring into life. Far from being the exception in having this potential, the Philippines was ahead of her neighbors in concrete progress.

I will not repeat the sad story of missed opportunities, of poor foresight, of bad management, and of the outright deliberate twisting of economic priorities to suit private greed.

That is all water under the bridge. We have no time for regrets. The height of our fall from years of public mismanagement and public theft measures only half the height we must scale to catch up with the competition just here in Southeast Asia.

Our competitors were not standing still when we were falling back. Now, they have achieved such a high level of economic growth that they can well afford to match it with generous programs of social services.

We, on the contrary, must address two equally pressing priorities: economic progress and social amelioration. Both priorities press hard upon the same limited stock of resources.

Not the least of those resources is the managerial competence to put limited means to the most productive and honest use.

We have been getting, pre-eminently from schools like the AIM, the managerial skill to encourage and direct the growth of the private economy. As the distinguished record of this school shows, we have even supplied that talent to the competition. Give it to the Filipino, he can fall behind in anything, but not in the intellectual command of essential disciplines and in his generosity in sharing what he knows.

But an equal, if not greater need, urges itself on our managerial capacity: the need to prepare the ground for the great strides in industrialization and agricultural production, and in social services, that must be made. And they must be made quickly if we are to regain our former ranking in this region and to survive as a just, compassionate, and democratic society.

We need managers for development even more urgently than the managers we have so excellently trained to meet the bottomline of private profit. We need development managers not only on the level of the central government but, more importantly, on the levels of the local government units.

Somehow, political vision and practical programs founder on the reefs of managerial ignorance in the implementation stage. Somehow things get bogged down, and less gets done than we have a right to expect, given the time and resources devoted. We are frustrated because it seems that the best political will, like some rivers, will disappear in the sand before it gets to the sea. Too much is lost in the translation of programs into concrete works and real opportunities for our people.

We need development managers to carry through the programs to their only aim: a concrete improvement in the lives of the people, and in the prospects of our country for growth – and more growth.

Take the constitutional call for agrarian reform. This does not mean the mere subdivision of poverty on the land, but the increase of incomes and the general well-being of the vast majority of our people who live off the land. Passing out titles is easy. Making the land produce a decent life for the farmer, and a future for his children, that is the challenge. The aim was not the vindication of a certain idea of land justice, but the material improvement of rural life through infrastructure building and extension services that will increase productivity and incomes. So it is with every program, whether aimed at the farmer in the field or the worker on the shopfloor or in the office building. Words of the law and pronouncements of policy are not worth the paper they are printed on without the hands and minds that will make laws and policies work out in reality as they were intended to: To raise the people step by concrete step to a better life.

So it is with the Constitutional call to decentralize political authority and the expenditure of public resources. It is not the aim of the Constitution to merely spread the exercise of political power, or to decentralize opportunities for graft and waste. Decentralization has the same aim of improving the lives of our people by bringing public services closer to them.

In my talks with the provincial governors, I have come to appreciate how better attuned local officials are to the developmental and social needs of their people. I have also seen how badly competent managers are needed to meet those needs.

Competent development managers are needed to identify projects and see them through to completion. The need becomes particularly critical at this time as we compete for foreign development assistance. Our absorptive capacity for assistance in the public sector is being questioned. We have to show that we can use resources swiftly and productively. That nothing will go to waste or disappear into graft, and yet that something significant can be accomplished in record time. We have to show, not by mouth, but by action. We have to prove our capability to use further assistance by showing in completed projects what we can do with what we already have.

At present, the DAP offers short-term courses for development managers. DAP's output, however, may not be able to satisfy all the requirements of the prospective Philippine Assistance Program for new managers. I am, therefore, suggesting that AIM, in coordination with the DAP undertake a similar program that will turn out new development managers at a faster rate.

We are trying to de-regulate our economy, and even the public service. We must not only loosen, we must release completely the stranglehold of regulation that is choking private initiative and turning off local and foreign investments, and discouraging development assistance. I have started to believe that there is no regulatory aim that is worth the cost in lost opportunities and in frustration as a result of government regulation of economic activities. Not a single aim has been worth the delay nor the missed opportunity for more growth.

One of the most important measures of economic deregulation – the Kalakalan 20 program – has met with some resistance. The measure will hopefully become law very soon. This and other measures designed to release the productive power of Philippine industry and agriculture, on every level – from the big to the grass-roots – need friends in Congress to make them law, and managers in the countryside and on the shopfloor to make them work.

Once upon a time, the AIM met the challenge of Asian growth. Now I give it the challenge of Filipino progress.

The AIM, as its name “Asian” demands, should continue its generous sharing of managerial expertise with the rest of Asia.

But the AIM as central developer of Filipino managerial talent, must rise to that challenge. It must help our country, our government, and our people scale the heights of progress –

So we can catch up with our neighbors in Asia;

With the competition in the rest of the world;

And with our dream of a peaceful, prosperous, and progressive Philippines.

Thank you and good day.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino during the Annual District Conference of Rotary International District 381

Speech

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
During the Annual District Conference of Rotary International District 381

[Held at Manila Hotel, March 3, 1989]

HARNESSING PRODUCTIVE ENERGIES

YOUTH'S

The President commends the Rotary International District 381 on the occasion of its Annual District Conference and in sponsoring the academic scholarships and vocational training skills programs as well as youth development campaigns and its major components and asks for their continued support and involvement in PSYP.

Three years ago, we were in the process of settling down to the business of organizing and running a government that was to be truly democratic and free. Today, we can look back with pride and satisfaction on our accomplishments even as we are aware that more needs to be done.

The private sector is the major partner of the government in nation-building. For all the growth that the nation achieved in the past year, the grit and the will to bring about the needed gains belonged to the private sector. The significant growth of the past year vindicates our faith that while the government must do its part to create the stability and continuity needed to support enterprise, it is to the private sector that we must look to for the risks and the entrepreneurial daring to push our democracy toward a better quality of life.

On the other hand, the gains so far bear out the renewed confidence and optimism of our people. These gains do not mean a slackening of efforts but point to the necessity for an expanded partnership between you and your government.

I am very pleased that the Rotary International District 381 on the occasion of its Annual District Conference shall tackle the theme of nation-building. It goes without saying that each and every Filipino must be involved and must do his share.

But for today, I should like all of us to focus our attention on our youth.

I am aware that the Rotary International is currently undertaking significant programs for youth development. In particular, I would like to commend the academic scholarship and vocational skills training programs as well as the youth development campaigns being sponsored by the various Rotary International Districts in the country.

The country's youth played a key role in the installation of this government, not only during the crucial confrontations at EDSA but throughout the long, hard struggle for freedom. And lest we forget, it was often young Filipinos who had to make the ultimate sacrifice for their country.

Only a few days ago, we marked the Third Anniversary of EDSA. As in the two previous celebrations, we marked it with that odd mixture of solemnity and revelry often described as uniquely Filipino. And again, it was the youth in the forefront of things.

To be sure some quarters are quite critical of the manner by which we celebrate the historic event. The sight of young men and women dancing in the streets is seemingly incongruous, at first glance, with commemorating the heroism of the Filipino people and the serious business of rebuilding a nation.

However, there is a time for everything. A time for celebration and festivity and a time to roll up our sleeves and buckle down to work. As starkly illustrated at EDSA three years ago, youthful exuberance and daring need not be synonymous with mindless frivolity and folly. That the Filipino youth have time and again willingly laid their lives on the line is proof that they are an integral factor in Philippine national life.

But in our preoccupation with our own everyday concerns, national and business affairs are often judged as matters too serious to involve the young. With summer almost upon us, this misconception will doubtless be reinforced. For this season of the year is almost always associated with youthful energies being expended on frivolous pursuits or dangerous mischief.

This need not be so. Our youth have amply demonstrated that not only are they concerned about the future of this country but that they are willing to do something about it.

Thus let me announce today the launching of the PSYP program. PSYP stands for the President's Summer Youth Program, one which will give young Filipinos a chance to utilize their youthful zest and idealism in the development struggle and nation-building.

The focus of the PSYP will be youth involvement in productive endeavors. The program will not be used for political ends nor will it be used to build personality cults around certain individuals.

The PSYP will involve high school, college and vocational school students as well as out-of-school youth. Both the government and the private sector will be tapped to provide the means and the venue for youth involvement in this program. It is thus that I appeal to members of Rotary International and to other organizations to support and get involved with any or all of the PSYP components.

The PSYP has five major components: 1. summer work appreciation for students; 2. government internship program; 3. immersion and service outreach work; 4. summer camp and travel programs; and 5. culture and sports programs.

THE SUMMER WORK APPRECIATION PROGRAM FOR STUDENTS

This program will make available to the youth opportunities for exposure to actual work situation during summer and for them to develop the values of work appreciation and ethics. Likewise, a stipend equivalent to 50% to 75% of the prevailing minimum wage will be provided by the sponsoring company to the student participants who have entered into a training agreement for the duration of the summer period.

It will be launched nationwide by DOLE and it is expected to benefit a conservative target of 5,000 youths during the summer period.

The proposed guidelines for the program were drawn up together with the Employer Confederation of the Philippines (ECOP) and the Personnel Management Association of the Philippines (PMAP).

As businessmen, you are in an ideal position to support this program. Aside from giving our young people a chance to be productive, your own respective organizations will most likely benefit from the injection of fresh and idealistic energy and talent.

GOVERNMENT INTERNSHIP PROGRAM

Government will likewise offer a counterpart program. Internship programs in various government agencies, including government owned and controlled corporations, will be made available to the youth this summer. The program will give them a chance to be actively involved with the bureaucracy and public service. It is hoped that through their participation in government work, they shall be acquainted with the programs and projects of the government and thereby support and get more involved in the national effort to achieve stability and progress.

The Civil Service Commission (CSC) will be the lead agency for this PSYP component. As envisioned, students will be recruited on the basis of their field of study to work with the various agencies. For example, the Department of Environment and Natural Resources plans to recruit natural science students to participate in conservation programs while social science and journalism students will work on the information campaigns on the river revival and anti-pollution campaigns. On the other hand, out-of-school youths will be tapped for the Department's seedling production and anti-illegal logging programs. The Department of Public Works and Highways plans to recruit engineering and architecture students to serve as draftsmen while High School and vocational students will undergo apprenticeship in carpentry, plumbing, automotive mechanics, electricity and the like. The Department of Social Welfare and Development will recruit apprentices in its Day Care Centers as well as in its various welfare institutions. The Department of Education, Culture and Sports will recruit students to participate in its literacy campaign.

OTHER PROGRAM COMPONENTS

The immersion and service outreach component shall see students going out to the grass roots to render various basic services. The Department of Health, for example, is negotiating with the Association of Philippine Medical Colleges (APMC) so that student volunteers can render community health services and assist in the delivery of primary health care programs.

The summer camp and travel programs shall be handled mainly by the Department of Tourism (DOT) with the assistance of private travel companies. The intention is to package tours for students so that their appreciation of the country's history and culture will go beyond what they read in their school textbooks.

To round out the summer activities, the various public and private schools as well as the various local governments will be tapped for the promotion of sports and cultural programs on the municipal or even barangay levels.

The various agencies are now drawing up the detailed mechanics of the program and its various components. Neither is this concept radically new. It has been tried before in other countries with very good results. What we make of it here is entirely up to us.

I have designated the Office of the President Youth Affairs Secretariat (OP-YAS) to be the agency-coordinator and secretariat for the PSYP. They shall be linking with various non-government youth organizations and youth-serving institutions for the success of the PSYP. They shall also consult with these youth organizations and institutions, as well as the local private sector on possible new activities which can be included in the program. Together with the Cabinet Secretary, they shall monitor the progress of these programs, and ensure the full and active involvement of the youth. The OP-YAS shall submit, by the third quarter, a preliminary assessment of the program, and their recommendations to me. We want to see this modest program grow, hence I have instructed the OP-YAS to develop and recommend a comprehensive youth development program, in coordination with the concerned agencies, with the results of the PSYP as a start-up point. This shall be the government's response to our youth's development needs.

On the private sector's role, I should like to reiterate my appeal, not only for your support, but for your active participation in any or all of the program's components. Without your support and participation, I am afraid that this program will not have much chance of success. We owe it all to our youth to make it work.

And so I appeal first of all to Rotary International and to all the parents to support PSYP.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the launching of the Philippine Development Plan for Women

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the launching of the Philippine Development Plan for Women

[Delivered at the Heroes Hall, Malacañang, March 8, 1989]

FOCUS ON WOMEN

The President in her declaration of Women's Week and the whole month of March as Women's Role in History Month honors the women who preceded us in shaping our nation. She calls for the support of all concerned agencies to ensure full implementation of the programs and projects outlined in the Philippine Development Plan for Women. She thoughtfully adds that men should not be threatened by these stirrings for equality and development; they should instead encourage and support the efforts to elevate the status of women.

Greetings to all of you on International Women's Day. The Philippines also celebrates Women's Rights and International Peace Day today. I have also declared this week as Women's Week and the whole month of March as Women's Role in History Month. These meaningful celebrations demonstrate our solidarity with women all over the world in our common struggle for equality, freedom and peace.

As we celebrate, we also honor the women who preceded us in shaping our nation like Teodora Alonzo and the women of Malolos. All those who resisted traditional confines and restrictions to assert themselves. The peasant rebel women who fought side by side with the men like Gabriela Silang. The early suffragettes who were the forerunners of today's feminists. Above all, we pay tribute to the women who played a crucial role in the People Power Revolution at EDSA.

Many have told me that the greatest single event that projected the image of Filipino womanhood the world over was when a woman ended the country's 20-year subjection to a dictator. Given the opportunity to serve that I had, I am sure other Filipino women can also prove that they are indeed equal to Filipino males.

The past decades bore witness to the international awakening of women to their rights. Credit this mainly to the global women's conferences in Mexico, Copenhagen and Nairobi. In our country, the direct fruits of these consciousness-raising sessions were the creation of the National Commission on the Role of Filipino Women and the drawing up of blueprints to focus national attention on women's concerns in the fields of education, law, health and nutrition, labor, agriculture and others.

More recently, the persistent lobbying of women's groups succeeded in including a provision in our Constitution that ensures fundamental equality of women and men before the law. Its direct offshoot was the Family Code which should go a long way in eradicating the pockets of discrimination against women still existing in our society.

We have to admit that educating our people, to think of women as individuals who are entitled to rights and respect as much as their menfolk, is a tough problem. It is heartening, therefore, to note that we now have academic offerings on women's studies. My own alma mater, St. Scholastica's College, is leading the pack, as it were, in opening the eyes of women to their great potentialities. After my term, each one can aspire to become President.

Since I assumed this office, I have appointed more and more women to high-ranking and policy-making positions. Without exception, they have proven their mettle.

In my trips to the provinces, I have met very competent women managers who had been at the helm of their enterprises for several decades. I have met professional and technical female managers who perform as effectively as their male counterparts. We have many female decision-makers who can hold their own in the board rooms of predominantly male corporate boards.

Because many of our women in the rural areas are involved in the so-called underground economy, I am happy that the House of Representatives has passed on third reading the bill I certified to Congress that gives various kinds of incentives to countryside business enterprises. If enacted into law, these family enterprises will be encouraged to come out in the open. As you may know, we have entered into an agreement with J.C. Penney for the export of $20 million worth of goods to their outlets all over the United States. Much in demand are the artificial plants, papier mache, shell products, RTW and jewelry Accessories that our women are so expert at manufacturing.

At this point, we have to confront two vexing problems.

First, we must recognize and acknowledge the “invisible” Filipino woman. The ordinary woman in the farms and fishing villages, in the factories, the streets and in the homes. We must give value to the actual contributions she makes for the survival and well-being of the family, the community and the nation.

Having acknowledged her present contributions, we must then give the ordinary woman the opportunity to improve the quality of her contributions by liberating her from narrow stereotyped roles and broadening her options for growth and service.

In other words, we must recognize and give value to the work of the “ordinary housewife.” Then give her the necessary support to develop her other potentials.

Now the Philippine Development Plan for Women which we launch today is the major instrument for government action on the equality and development of women. I have issued Executive Order Number 348 approving and adopting this plan. All government departments, bureaus, offices, agencies and instrumentalities, including government-owned or controlled corporations are enjoined to take appropriate steps to ensure the full implementation of the programs and projects outlined in the plan. An appropriate focal point for women’s concerns or any other similar mechanism shall be constituted in these agencies.

The National Commission on Women, in coordination with the National Economic and Development Authority, is tasked with monitoring the implementation and periodic assessment of the plan.

Firmly believing in the importance and urgency of the Philippine Development Plan for Women. I call on all concerned to cooperate fully with its implementation. I also call for the support of non-governmental organizations in the private sector which are our allies in all aspects of our work in government. For my part, I will follow its progress closely through my regular meetings with the National Commission on Women. I do not want it said with any degree of credibility that under a woman President, the situation of Filipino women did not improve significantly.

A word on the vital role of media in combatting the prejudices against women. Oftentimes, they permeate the consciousness of the unwary through subliminal messages beamed through different forms of mass media. Advertisements sometimes depict women as objects of pleasure not as human beings. As second-rate citizens incapable of decisions beyond her kitchen and her wardrobe. To add further injury, media perpetuate these biases as frequently as they show these ads.

I urge the women's groups, therefore, to enlist media's support in their unrelenting campaign. And I ask media in turn to police their ranks, particularly the ladies, lest they lend themselves unwittingly to the cause they seek to destroy.

It is difficult for me to speak on the development of women without reflecting on my own life. I spent a lifetime as wife to Ninoy and mother to my children, willingly and lovingly performing the responsibilities of the wife of a politician, a political prisoner and, finally, a martyr. I bore and reared five good children of whom any mother would be proud and who have now begun to give me the pleasures of grand motherhood.

While I sometimes look back on that season of my life as a housewife with affection and nostalgia. I am sure that I would not be disloyal to the memory of Ninoy and my children if I admit that despite its obvious burdens, I value this stage of my life with its many challenges. For it has given me the opportunity to serve my country more directly and more fully. I believe that every Filipino woman deserves similar opportunities for growth and service.

As we celebrate now, let us remember that the support of our men is crucial to our efforts to elevate the status of women. To all Filipino men, I say: Do not be threatened by these stirrings for equality and development. The women are not anti-men. Nor are they governed by a destructive spirit of competition. However, they do want to be recognized for what they are and what they can achieve given the necessary encouragement and support from you.

Finally, let us remember that to fully realize our development, each has to realize her own self-worth first. The efforts start from us, ourselves. Government and other basic institutions in our society can only be supportive of our aspirations. And our efforts will bear fruit only to the extent of our sincere commitment – not just on paper, not merely in words, but more in deeds.

Let me hear you pledge that you will couple your support for this Plan with action.

Higit sa lahat, tayo ay kailangang magkaisa. Hindi lamang ang kababaihan kundi ang buong sambayanan. Sa ating mga balikat nakasalalay ang pagasa ng bayan na makamit ang kapayapaan, at kasaganaan at kaunlaran.

Maraming salamat sa inyong lahat.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Before the Federation of Filipino-Chinese Chambers of Commerce and Industry

[Held at the Philippine Plaza Hotel, March 10, 1989]

PIONEERS OF ENTERPRISES

The President enjoins the Federation to assist the government in its rural development program particularly in industry dispersal and livelihood generation to hasten the overall economic growth of the country. She also challenges the Federation to be more involved with the affairs of the nation by effectively generating investments and exports from their foreign counterparts to promote countryside development.

I am pleased to congratulate the members of this Federation on its 17th Biennial Convention. I am also pleased to note that your theme echoes my call for a more aggressive countryside development program for 1989. With the 169 Chambers of Commerce and Industry all over the country affiliated with your federation, I know that you can be a potent force as government's partner in the task of reenergizing our economy.

Let me refresh your minds with the past year's economic accomplishments in which the private sector had played a key role. Our GNP's growth at almost 7 percent in 1988 is a continuing improvement over the 5.7 percent we achieved in 1987 and the 2 percent in 1986.

Industry has been the leading sector of this growth with its gross value added at almost 9 percent, an improvement over the 8 percent in 1987.

1988 was also a banner year for investments and exports. For the first time in our country's history, investments in 1988, as registered with the Board of Investments, reached an unprecedented P31 billion in total project cost – eclipsing the P11 billion record breaker of 1987.

Also, for the first time in the country's history, Philippine exports broke through the US$ 7 billion barrier to reach US$ 7.07 billion in 1988.

We can now paint a rosier picture of our economy even as we open new opportunities for growth.

But we need to build on top of the gains we have so far achieved. We need to redistribute the growth that so far has been felt mainly in the cities. We have picked out rural development and livelihood generation through countryside development to hasten our overall economic growth. And it is in this area that I will primarily ask your help.

Allow me to point out that in the recent past, we have been encouraging legislation that would offer incentives to draw out investments by small and family-based enterprises. You are, of course, aware that the House of Representatives has passed the Countryside Business Enterprises Bill which I certified to it. The many small and family industries now operating underground will be encouraged to come out into the open and expand, after all the incentives in the Bill shall be operational.

We are also supporting public and private sector programs aimed at rural development such as industry dispersal. We have recently established Regional Industrial Centers aimed at providing the infrastructure that business needs to operate.

Our campaign for countryside investment has effected last year a 55% flow of total investments into the rural regions. Then, too, our “Tulong-Sa-Tao” program as of February 1989 has approved the loan application of 125 private voluntary organizations amounting to P36 million, to benefit 7,801 micro enterprises all over the country. From this, P32.5 million will be channeled to small businesses in regions outside the National Capital Region.

The Chinese in the Philippines have a long history of being forerunners of economic progress in the country. Of being pioneers of enterprises that still flourish today, I am asking you now to continue playing that role.

Additionally, I urge you to encourage your Taiwanese counterparts to invest here and avail themselves of duty-and tariff-free privileges that the Philippines enjoys under the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences. With Taiwan’s having graduated from the U.S. Generalized System of Preferences privileges, our country’s duty-free privileges should present the best incentive for Taiwanese investors to manufacture GSP-covered items in the Philippines.

As you are aware, Taiwan today is one of the Philippines’ most important investors with P2.31 billion or US$ 109.3 million investments in 1988 comprising 22.8% of total foreign investments. For 1989, we hope to increase Taiwanese investments by 50%.

The approval of the Board of Investment’s Board Resolution No. 046 last February 23 which spells out the basic rights and guarantees of Taiwanese investors in the country will enhance the attractiveness of the Philippines as an investment area.

Corollary to this, our BOI will put up a one-stop shop investment center in Taiwan to offer services that will help the Taiwanese save time. This center will provide information, counselling, pre-processing, information completion, identification, investment mission, travel assistance and coordination services.

The Department of Trade and Industry is closely coordinating with the Department of Foreign Affairs and the Immigration Office to grant multiple access visas so that Taiwanese investors will have ready access to us.

Lastly, as you know, I have appointed a new BIR Head in the person of Commissioner Jose Ong. He has pledged to improve collections, for taxes are the lifeblood of our nation’s progress. In turn, I have assured him of my full support in the exercise of authority and powers vested in him. Help him with this task, and you shall have helped me and our country.

I take this occasion to announce that your government will not tolerate citizens and residents who sap the strength of the country by their refusal to pay taxes or by paying way below what is due from them. I am determined to put a stop to all these. If persuasive efforts will fail, I will be constrained to apply the full force of the law on them.

Let me close by challenging you to be more involved with the affairs of the nation. How you can effectively weave together the national concerns of generating investments and exports from your foreign counterparts to promote countryside development is the challenge which you will address in this convention. I am sure that your sincere commitment will bring about significant results. I look forward to hearing about your resolutions to assist countryside development.

I thank you and bid you a very fruitful convention.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the PDP Laban Convention

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the PDP Laban Convention

[Held at the Ninoy Aquino Stadium, March 18, 1989]

LINES OF ACTION

In meeting with the PDP-Laban, the President says that she is also willing to attend the convention of other parties if invited. She adds that a multi-party principle is intended to take in advance every shade of opinion and every kind of interest. Likewise, she urges everyone to work together for the advancement of the nation.

I am happy to be here today upon the invitation of Senator Nene Pimentel. Last year I had told both Speaker Mitra and Senate President Salonga that if I were invited by their respective parties I would attend their conventions. The multi-party principle is intended to take in and advance every shade of opinion and every kind of interest. Yet the result should not be a universal standoff but rather the advancement of the nation – on the broadest front, if possible, but never to stop moving because this is necessary. For there is a lot of catching up that we must do.

With due allowance to inevitable differences among leaders, parties, and groups, the ground for agreement should be equally broad and compelling: we are first Filipinos: no one else will care for us as we do. We are also tested friends and long-time campaigners for democracy. The enemies of freedom are powerful against each of us individually, but powerless before our unity.

Within the wide framework of our democratic faith, let us work together where we agree, and respect each other where we do not. And never doubt each other's patriotism.

The deepest concerns of your party are among the most pressing issues that I have addressed.

We have pushed hard for the kind of regional autonomy that will improve the living standards of the communities involved, compensate for their weaknesses and build upon their strengths. We are not for the kind of autonomy that will merely perpetuate the underdevelopment of these regions and leave their communities far behind the rest of the nation to which they must be tied by bonds of indissoluble union. We are first Filipinos before anything else.

Much has been achieved in the devolution of power, authority, and control of resources on local governments. We want this enshrined in a new local government code that will be a covenant guiding the relationship between national government and local governments.

We also want to give regional autonomy to our Muslim brothers and the Cordillerans whose histories and unique cultures must be recognized as different yet enriching the one country to which we all belong.

We have gone further, in line with the constitution, to encourage the growth of non-governmental organizations to harness the energy and idealism of communities.

We have committed to honor all our legitimate obligations. What we are seeking are repayment terms consistent with the imperative of growth – given the growing demands of a growing population that is fired by the high expectations that go with political freedom. Thus we have negotiated hard for fairer terms of payment. We have made our chief appeal to reason: in our economic progress lies the best assurance that we shall discharge our proper obligations.

It is the basic thrust of this government to generate the resources for our needed growth through the more efficient use of our resources and by convincing our friends abroad that we are serious about our desire for progress and are prepared to pay for it in necessary sacrifices.

Thus, the tax system has been reformed to enhance revenues and introduce greater equity into the system. All tax exempt privileges were removed effective December 1986. To the extent possible, everyone should pull his own weight unless the national interest and the wellbeing of our people require the extraordinary assistance of government. We shall build this country strength upon strength, and, to the extent we can, without nurturing any weaknesses. To that end, we shall gradually open our economy to the full range of competition, strong in the confidence that we shall make the grade.

Transparency is the first principle of democratic government, before which all other considerations must bow. For we have the greatest confidence that the people will always understand what is foremost their affair: the government of their country and determination of their future.

Past and ongoing negotiations on international security and on financial and economic affairs, particularly the foreign debt, have been thrown to public debate. The need for a wider and more formal exchange of views on this critical issue is recognized. But at the end of the road government has had to make decisions – not the best in a perfect world, but the best, I can say with confidence, in the imperfect circumstances in which our country finds itself today.

The country's natural resources must be preserved and developed, for what is a country if not its natural wealth and its people. The devastation that has been visited by the greed of commerce, the corruption of officials, and the ignorance of men on our fair country has got to stop. Floods and other natural calamities signal that it is almost too late. Extraordinary measures are needed to stop the denudation of our forests, the pollution of our waters, and the poisoning of our air, and turn the tide of devastation into the progressive recovery of the ancient wealth and beauty of our land.

Equally must we regain the preeminence we enjoyed as one of the best and most widely educated nations in the world. The mind is the best resource of a country, and if we do our work well, it is potentially infinite. We have achieved near universal education at 98.5 percent and are working hard to improve its quality. We have introduced free high school education. Yet we recognize that we are still far behind the wide proficiency in the hard sciences that is key to swift modernization. We must work together to fill this gap.

We are committed to the complete and meaningful implementation of the Comprehensive Agrarian Reform Law. The law was fully debated and every interest on the land was considered. The law contains the irreducible minimum of land justice for the farmer. The implementation of the law is my responsibility and it will be done to the letter.

We recognize poverty and injustice as the roots of insurgency. The first is buried deep in the structure of our economy and the second in the attitudes of officials and the institutions of society. The structural reforms that we have been implementing have started to bear fruit in an economy once again on the move, in noticeable improvements in living standards, in gradually pulling out the roots of poverty. More recent measures seek to unleash, by de-regulating the economy, our people's boundless ability to generate wealth.

While the reform of the justice system is properly the domain of a co-equal branch, the magnitude of the problem of judicial delay and corruption calls for the combined efforts of all the branches to meet this basic demand of communities, which is also the first principle of political community : justice. Education must be geared to sharpening our people's awareness of their rights.

I have given some of my thoughts and outlined the initiatives I have already taken in areas of common concern. I understand that you will proceed from here to discuss these issues further, in the light of new developments and your own experiences at the grassroots. I look forward to the results of your discussions, for I believe that there is much that Filipinos can learn from each other.

I am pleased to be a part of this search for the best approaches to the future we all desire for our country. I hope that we can continue to share the common ground of patriotism that the presence of so many here has opened up. Before politics, country must come first.

We must show that today and everyday of our lives.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino at the 92nd Army Day

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines At the 92nd Army Day

[Held at Fort Bonifacio, March 21, 1989]

ARMY: THE PEOPLE IN UNIFORM

President Aquino pays tribute to the people in uniform whom she expects to gift the people a future of peace, amity and progress. She urges army and society to grow together and improve together to make a better country for ourselves and our children.

Today we celebrate the 92nd anniversary of the Philippine Army as a prelude to celebrating the 91st anniversary of our Independence. This is fitting and proper. For in celebrating Army Day we lay stress again on the martial virtues that make national independence meaningful and real.

It is not surprising that we are celebrating the creation of our country's army before we celebrate the anniversary of its birth. For everything that is good can be born only after a struggle. And all struggles are won only by courage, by daring and hardiness, by feats of arms – in short, by the acts and virtues that make up an army.

The army that was created 92 years ago defeated one imperial power and lost only by the betrayal of a friend. Yet that army went on to fight the wars of that uncertain friend, and fought them with honor.

The Army fought in Bataan but did not fall with it. It carried on by guerrilla action to keep hope alive until the country's Liberation. The Army's battalion combat teams fought in Korea; its civic-action teams helped in Vietnam.

It has fought continuously perhaps longer than any other army in the world – for we have had a festering insurgency. Yet, where larger and better-stocked armies failed, it broke one Communist insurgency. And it is taking the initiative again against a second rebellion. Yes, the Army today has quite a tradition to live up to.

What is an army? you might ask. An army is the people in uniform, I will answer; as others before me have answered. This is an unchanging truth. The army is the image of the state, and the reflection of the society it defends.

The state that fields the Army today is a state dedicated entirely to the wellbeing of our people, to the material progress of our country, and to the increase of our influence for good abroad.

The society which that army defends, is not yet what we would wish it to be. But it is moving in the direction of being a society worthy of the sacrifices the Army daily makes in lives, in crippling wounds, in long absences from family, and in other hardships, as it crosses the length and breadth of our land to put down its enemies.

We look to the Army to show us the stern virtues that we need to reform our society and make our country strong: honor, duty, self-sacrifice, the willingness to give all for country.

As the people is the Army in uniform, the Army integrates itself back into the people through service. Service on every level affecting the security of our communities, and even, through civic-action, their material wellbeing.

Today we honor that service in the stirring example of Sgt. Francisco Granpil who is this day given the Medal of Valor. Sergeant Granpil is the sixteenth to receive this award for bravery in action over and beyond the call of duty and human expectation. His example shows that the Filipino is the equal to any challenge that arises, to any threat that can be thrown against his country and his people.

Army and society must grow together and improve together – welding might and good to make a better country for ourselves and our children.

After years of confusion under a corrupt dictatorship, the Army has found its bearings in unqualified loyalty to constitution and state, and ready obedience to the authority of the Commander-in-Chief. We have adopted the best strategy for an ever changing situation. “To advance is to win,” goes the military maxim. “When in doubt, attack!” That is what the new Army has done. We have taken the war back to the enemy.

In 1988 alone, the Army conducted 54,702 small unit combat patrols – almost 150 patrols a day. We must now make sure that the ratio of patrols to contacts, through efficient tactical intelligence, will bring us conclusive victories. But, unquestionably, this is an army on the move again.

Special Operations Teams dismantled the political infrastructure of the CPP in one year and won back the support of 845 communist-infested barangays.

Our camps are constantly moving, our troops are harassing the enemy, preventing him from massing and disrupting the work of rebuilding the country. Our equipment is worn and battered. Yet the Army fights on with whatever lies at hand.

Still, it must train harder. It must acquire in every part the qualities that make armies formidable: long habits of regularity, great exactness of discipline, and great confidence in competent commanders.

But, all in all, we can say that the fighting spirit is back, the combat skills are improving. We are building our strength not on defense but on the attack. As Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, I appeal to the Congress to give us the numbers and the logistics to carry the war to a swift and conclusive end. Even as we need audacious troops to sweep the enemy before us, we need militia to secure the communities we have liberated against the return of the communist foe.

Above the heat and din of battle, we feel the first fresh wind of peace. Our people want to turn their energies from war, their hearts from fear, and their thoughts from mere safety – to peace, to friendship, to community, and to progress.

The Army whose 92nd anniversary we celebrate today swears to give this future of peace, amity and progress as their gift to the people from which it comes. Every soldier swears it in the Code that rules his life:

“I am a Filipino soldier. I will fight all forces that would destroy the freedom and independence of the Filipino people.

“I am a Filipino soldier. I will uphold the supremacy of civilian authority over the military in war, or in peace.

“I am a Filipino soldier. I will live and die in the true Filipino tradition of valor and honor, duty and loyalty.

“To all these I pledge my life, my treasure and my sacred honor.”

Toast of President Corazon Aquino in Honor of Mr. Stephen Solarz

Toast of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines In Honor of Mr. Stephen Solarz

[Delivered in Malacañang, April 1, 1989]

LA FAYETTE OF OUR REVOLUTION

Although there are different views and opinions from the US Congress regarding the Multilateral Aid Initiative for the Philippines, the President gives credit to Mr. Solarz's leadership for bringing them together in support of a Philippine aid plan.

We are pleased to welcome again our country's true and most constant friend.

Mr. Stephen Solarz comes to brief us on the latest developments in the Multilateral Aid Initiative – America's concrete expression of support for the ideals we proclaim as the animating spirit of our two democracies.

Reports of the latest developments preceded Mr. Solarz. We have viewed the tape of the subcommittee proceedings on the Philippine assistance plan chaired by him.

The views there expressed were a complete education, not least about America's view of the world and the place of the Philippines in its international priorities. We listened carefully and came away with a greater appreciation of our friends than with deprecation for the smaller views that others hold of our country and our efforts.

The thrust of the proceedings did not escape us. Largely through Mr. Solarz's efforts, a bi-partisan consensus is forming in the US Congress for a multilateral aid initiative for the Philippines. To what extent, when, and how it will materialize remains unsettled.

Speaker of the House James Wright gave me a yellow rose of Texas at the US Congress. He proved the sincerity of his tribute to our revolution by speaking up for the multilateral initiative. Indeed, the United States spends hundreds of billions in vain to arrest the narrowing safety of its nuclear shield when it might go forward at much less expense, and extend more amply and surely the influence of its beneficent example.

Senator Dole applauded my home run at the US Congress but thought I was bit overpaid for it. He obviously hasn't followed professional baseball carefully. I was happy to see that he has changed his mind after visiting the Philippines and seeing for himself the parity of our exertions with the challenges we face, and the disparity of the material means available to us.

These and other distinguished men and women in the US Congress and in the Executive concluded individually that such an initiative is critical to the continuing freedom of one side of the Pacific and to common safety of both. Yet we must credit Mr. Solarz's leadership for bringing them together in support of a Philippine aid plan.

The subcommittee hearing showed at least that the United States understands the problems and the peril of democracy in our country.

No one pleaded ignorance of the broad outlines of the challenges we face; a few expressed doubts about the utility of helping overcome them.

We too understand the problems the United States faces with its deficit; the paucity of its means in relation to its aim of helping the Philippines, and the ranking of that aim among America's geopolitical priorities. The experience is not new. When pressed by La Fayette to go on the offensive because the French court was impatient with the slow progress of American arms, Washington gave what has become a stock reply these days: "We must consult our means rather than our wishes."

It was a bad time for America.

Long on debts, short on supplies, plagued by the uncertain loyalty of its troops, its currency devaluating – the young American democracy had only its foreign friends to depend on, even for forces in the battlefield.

We have not gone that far in our requests for help. So I think it goes a little far to say that we regard America as a dairy cow and that we are asking her to pay us for the privilege of taking her for a ride, as one US Congressman put it. May we assure you that Filipinos wouldn't dream of taking a cow for a ride. And milk is not popular with Filipinos.

To those who still fault the pace of our recovery and progress, we say, "We must consult our means and not our wishes." Agrarian reform must wait on the resources that will make it more than just the equal division of property rights to a miserable existence on the land.

The contribution the US proposes to make, while small in relation to the total assistance required, is critical, for it sends a signal to the rest of the world. We hope that signal is sent. Needless to say a change of heart would send another signal to these countries – and still another message to our own people.

The success of this first small step towards a fully-fledged aid plan is not certain. Yet, it is never too early to express our country's gratitude and affection for one who has stayed by her in the struggle that is far from over. You have always known this, Mr. Solarz, and so have stayed the course with us, unlike so many whom we remember gratefully as having stayed only for the celebration of our freedom.

You know that we can't achieve our goal of a free and prosperous country with one stroke, but by a long sustained effort, using every resource that comes to hand, putting every shoulder to the wheel, and hoping but not stopping to wait for others to add their strength to our own. But we shall always pause from our exertions to enjoy the fresh wind of sincere friendship that comes from America in you.

I want to thank you most specially for defending the memory of the Filipino soldiers and partisans who gave their lives so that both our countries might be free. Throughout the Pacific, only two nations can honestly erect monuments to freedom out of the gravestones of their heroes – Americans and Filipinos. Let no one forget that. We are not as rich as those whom America more readily defends these days, but we are not poor in heroes for democracy even at this late date.

Ladies and gentlemen, please join me in a toast to the good health and success of Pres. George Bush and of our country's truest friend – Stephen Solarz. Now more than ever, the La Fayette of our Revolution.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Labor Day

of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Labor Day

[Delivered on May 1, 1989]

GROWTH WITH EQUITY

The President says the government has always been active in laying the groundwork towards labor empowerment. She cites a number of measures to help the work force of the country, among them the empowerment of unions to increase their access to policy and decision making. She butts for economic growth with equity, an economy that creates employment opportunities, increases family incomes, and a future for children. Labor, she states, must be assured of its dignity and just reward.

Today we honor in a special way the men and women on whose toil our nation moves.

As I said last year, we must follow a course that translates real economic growth into addressing the social and economic needs of our workers. The task is to build an economy that creates employment opportunities, increases family incomes and ensures the delivery of social services that will give our workers the essential requirements for health, for housing, and for education.

From the day our people entrusted me with the Presidency, I have made this vision clear. I want economic growth with equity. I want the worker to be its direct beneficiary. This means food on his table, a roof over his head, and a future for his children. For while government must assure the investor the proper climate for business, with greater reason must it assure labor of its dignity and just reward.

Last year, the incidence of strikes went down by 39% compared to the 1987 figure. With the relative calm in the industrial front, much was gained. For this, I pay tribute to the responsibility and maturity of the labor movement. Yet no gain is ever enough. We must preserve what we have achieved. We must sustain the momentum.

This is possible only when industrial peace prevails. Peace, not apathy. A peace by involvement and consensus, not by force and imposition.

I am encouraged by your action of promoting the welfare not only of your members but that of their families as well. You have set up credit and multi-purpose cooperatives, extended emergency loans and housing assistance, provided health services, and conducted labor education and specialized training. I would like to see more of you involved in these projects that complement government's thrust to provide employment opportunities and augment incomes.

Encouraging as these developments are, your achievements underscore the need for more responsible organizations and less of individualism and self-seeking. Records of the Department of Labor and Employment show that only 10 percent of our 9.3 million wage and salary workers are organized, and of this number only 4 percent are covered by collective bargaining agreements.

Pro-labor laws alone cannot and will not guarantee protection from exploitation and abuse. Not even a pro-labor government can shield workers from oppression. Unions can serve as a formidable counter-force against social inequities and injustices. What labor needs is empowerment that can only spring from the genuine support and involvement of the working masses, even as the exercise of their rights must be within the responsible and disciplined framework of the law.

This government has always been actively laying the groundwork towards labor empowerment. In 1987, I issued Executive Order 111, which abolished the one-union, one-industry policy and lowered the membership requirements for union registration. This year, to further hasten unionization and encourage collective bargaining, we have provided for automatic certification elections, and in unorganized firms, a mere petition of a legitimate labor organization is sufficient. A worker can now become a member of the union on his first day of employment.

Empowerment of unions also means increased access to policy and decision-making. There will be stronger labor representation in the proposed regional wage boards and in the restructured National Labor Relations Commission. And as soon as the question is finally resolved by the Supreme Court, I shall appoint more sectoral representatives from labor in Congress.

The alleviation of poverty, by creating job opportunities and keeping the prices of basic goods and services at affordable levels, continues to be the principal thrust of government. Within this context, we continue to be guided by a wage policy that considers most importantly, the interest of the poorer segment of our working class who do not, as yet, enjoy the benefits of unionism and collective bargaining.

Much as this government would have wanted fully to accede to your demands, we are, at this time, unable to do so. Legislating a minimum wage that will drive up prices beyond our control and reduce prospects for employment will deprive most workers of the opportunity to enjoy the benefits of growth and negate the gains we have so far achieved.

A P15-increase for Metro Manila and a minimum increase of P6 for the rest of the country is the most viable option available.

I would like to see the day when trade unions shall be able to organize a significant number of our workers so that they can themselves negotiate for even higher wages and greater benefits. I am concerned that by regularly legislating minimum wage increases, we may erode the gains trade unionism has made in the field of organization. The future lies in less dependence on government and more on self-organization and collective bargaining.

We are likewise concerned about our fellow workers in government. For them, we have budgeted P4.7 billion to cover salary adjustments. And I look forward to the passage by Congress of the proposed salary standardization plan for a longer-term solution to this problem.

Let me now take this opportunity to redeem the pledges I made to you last year. While the unemployment problem continues to stagger us, we were able to provide jobs for more members of our labor force. The unemployment rate averaged 9.7 percent last year, down from 11.2 percent in 1987 and slightly lower than the projected 10.6 percent.

The number of Filipinos looking for additional work decreased from 33.6 percent of the labor force in 1987 to 32.5 percent by end of 1988.

We made inroads in solving these problems as a result of increased investments, which placed our economic recovery on firmer ground, and increased assistance for people-based businesses, and small-and medium-scale enterprises in the countryside.

To disperse economic opportunities to rural areas, we launched a national livelihood program. Now being carried out by eight of our departments, it accounts for 35 livelihood projects. As of today, these projects serve 162 groups and benefit 450,000 persons most of whom are farmers, fishermen, rebel returnees, out-of-school youth, disabled persons, displaced domestic and overseas workers and their families whose incomes fall below the poverty level.

A total of P28 million from the National Livelihood Support Fund has been made available to the DOLE to finance livelihood projects of workers and their families as part of the department's social investment project.

I would like to meet with you again to discuss how the unions can best pursue these programs and the manner in which government can best assist you. I would like to get project proposals from you for which we can make funds available. I am directing the Department of Labor and Employment to provide the necessary support services for the early submission of such proposals for my action.

While the focus is on economic recovery and employment, we did not waiver from the pledge to bring about improved social conditions through the delivery of social services:

(a) Phase I of the CARP, a pillar for rural transformation, is already being implemented. Since 1986, 132,253 land emancipation patents covering 116,441 hectares have been given to farmer beneficiaries. This represents a 535 percent increase of the total land area distributed during the entire 13 years of land reform under the previous administration. Last year, some 16,000 farmworkers in Del Monte and DOLE plantations were awarded about 20,000 hectares. In Agusan del Sur, 1,368 farmworkers were awarded 7,266 hectares from the NDC-Guthrie estates and plantations.

(2) From the increased budget for 1988, we set aside a record P17.9 billion for education. This allowed us to implement the free secondary education program. The program brought enrolment in public secondary education to over 2 million. DECS also implemented a service contracting scheme for public high schools. For schoolyear 1988-89, a total of 52,249 students were enrolled in the 1,130 participating private schools.

I have also approved in principle the proposal to provide tuition subsidy in lieu of another round of tuition fee increases. The DECS is now studying how the subsidy can be funded.

(3) We also passed the Generic Drugs Act. Together with the national drug policy, this will effectively reduce the cost of medicine and medical services. And even as malnutrition, malaria, tuberculosis and schistosomiasis continue to disable many of our countrymen, the NEDA Board has approved for funding the Philippine Health Development Project III. This will provide our low-income communities with effective health services.

(4) Total government housing assistance last year resulted in the construction of 56,405 units, up by 110 percent over that registered in the previous year. We have expanded housing benefits for marginal and low-income groups. 17,648 units were completed in 1988. Interest rates for housing loans were also cut from 12 to 9 percent. For non-members of the GSIS, SSS, HDMF and PAG-IBIG, the government launched the community mortgage program in Manila, Cebu and Davao. This is to help 120,000 family beneficiaries attain security of land tenure. Furthermore, on-site services and basic facilities, such as public faucets and electrification, will continue to be provided to low income groups.

(5) Last year, we rolled back the price of petroleum products three times to keep inflation down to 8.7 percent. Following these price cuts, we obtained the commitment of manufacturers and traders to freeze prices till the end of the year. I must tell you, however, that oil prices abroad have gone up, putting pressure to increase oil prices in our country. I have therefore tasked a committee composed of the NEDA, the DOLE, the Department of Finance and the Energy Regulatory Board to postpone any such hikes by looking at the limited options we have on hand. I cannot promise that there will be no price hikes. But I shall seize every opportunity to cushion the adverse impact of any price increase on our people.

Isa sa mga paksang humahati at gumugulo sa atin ay ang Letter of Intent at ang Memorandum of Economic Policy na iniharap natin sa International Monetary Fund. Itong LOI na ito ay binigyan ng kung anu-anong kahulugan na bumabagabag sa kalooban ng ating mga kababayan. Nais kong bigyan ng diin na kahit kailanman ay hindi ako papayag na ang ating pag-unlad ay mabigo upang mapasaya lamang ang ating mga pinagkakautangan.

Hindi tayo tatalikod sa ating mga pananagutan ngunit ang ating unang pananagutan ay sa ating bayan.

Bilang pangwakas, isang hamon ang inihaharap ko sa inyong lahat – Palakasin pang lalo ang kilusang manggagawa upang ito ay maging mas mabisang puwersa sa ating lipunan. Sa isang malakas, demokratiko at responsableng kilusang manggagawa nakasalalay ang kaligtasan ng ating mga kalayaan, ang kasiglahan at kaunlaran ng mga manggagawa, at ang pagtatanggol ng kanilang karapatan.

Salamat po at magandang araw.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on her visit to Tawi-Tawi

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On her visit to Tawi-Tawi

[Delivered in Tawi-Tawi, May 5, 1989]

PROMISES KEPT

The President, in her return visit to Tawi-Tawi, asks that the government focus on developing livelihood opportunities for the people and urges to use effectively and efficiently all the resources that we have to demonstrate to our people that this government can and will make things happen.

Mga minamahal kong kababayan.

Assalamu aleikum.

Peace be with you.

I have come back to report that what I had promised I have delivered.

In February last year, I made two promises. I pledged that this government would take the necessary steps to extend meaningful autonomy to Mindanao. Today, both the Senate and the House of Representatives have passed on third reading their respective bills formulating an organic act for an autonomous region in Mindanao. The people of Tawi-Tawi will have the chance to decide whether to join this autonomous region or not.

The Senate and the House will still need to meet in a conference committee to reconcile their two versions of the Organic Act. I have constituted a cabinet level liaison committee to work with Congress on this crucial issue.

The task of charting a course towards autonomy has been complex and controversial. The attention we have focused on the issue of autonomy reflects our concern and commitment to address a political problem that has imperiled peace in our country. Mindanao is a national concern that deserves the full involvement of our leaders.

It will take the collective wisdom of our legislators to insure the passage of an organic act that upholds our constitutional commitments, addresses the aspirations of our people, specially those from Mindanao, and provides for an administrative framework more conducive to the effective delivery of services. The organic act must be consistent with the constitution, acceptable to our people and workable in practice.

The last criterion connects to the second promise I made last February. I reported to you then the message coming from the most depressed areas in Mindanao. The people in these communities were not unaware of political issues. But a more urgent concern was their lack of basic services.

A new structure of government such as the Organic Act will create is not sufficient. That new structure must also improve upon the government's ability to meet the basic needs of our people. I remain convinced that we shall find it difficult to attain the peace and stability we seek if we are not able to improve the conditions in which our people live.

I promised you last year that the government would take the necessary steps to reduce the burden borne by the poorest among our people. We have taken in the last 15 months some measurable steps towards this end.

Last year, Bongao could get water from their faucets for only one to two hours a day. The Bongao water system I inaugurated today can now deliver potable water to 700 households the whole day, and to an additional 300 by year end. In addition, over a hundred artesian wells and five water catchment tanks have been constructed over the last year to provide water to other municipalities.

The upgrading and expansion of Sanga-sanga runway now makes Tawi-Tawi's air connection to the rest of the country less dependent on the uncertainties of the weather. It will now be easier for the government to monitor the progress of projects on Tawi-Tawi.

When I came in February last year, TAWELCO could only provide power for four hours during the day. Several months before my arrival, power service had been increased to eight (8) hours. Today, I switched on TAWELCO'S 24-hour service in fulfillment of my promise made during my last visit here. I direct NPC President Ernesto Aboitiz and NEA Administrator Rodrigo Cabrera to ensure regular 24-hour power service from this day on.

Many of you know the problems that hampered the implementation of our projects here. But you also know that we have persevered and with the help of your governor, your mayor and your other local officials, we have prevailed.

I hope that my return today serves to demonstrate some fundamental points about the thrust of my government. First, the priority given to Tawi-Tawi reflects an exercise in affirmative action. If we have given special attention to Tawi-Tawi, it is because Tawi-Tawi has been isolated and ignored for so long. We are in part compensating for this neglect.

Second, my return visit underlines my commitment to "follow through." This is a message I want clearly communicated to the bureaucracy. We do not have all the resources that we need. But the resources that we do have, we must use effectively and efficiently. Our task is not to produce plans. Our task is to deliver the goods and the services. We must demonstrate to our people that this government can and will make things happen.

Apparently, this message has already reached some of our countrymen and persuaded them of our good faith. Since July 1988, over 750 rebels have decided to abandon the armed struggle and rejoin the mainstream of society.

This year, I have asked that the government focus on developing livelihood opportunities for our people. For Tawi-Tawi, I have directed key line agencies to work with the provincial government in developing the seaweed industry. Already, Tawi-Tawi accounts for almost 85 percent of the total Philippine seaweed production. I have asked Secretary Dominguez of the Department of Agriculture to allocate initially P1.0M to assist seaweed growers in the various municipalities of Tawi-Tawi and to take the lead in establishing a seaweed processing facility to produce alkali-treated seaweeds for domestic and foreign markets.

The DA will also identify the areas ideal for seaweed growing. Together with the Southern Philippines Development Authority, it will train and organize seaweed growers and assist them in securing loans. The Development Bank of the Philippines will provide financing to the processing center which will be operated by a cooperative to be organized by the DA. The Department of Trade and Industry will assist in strengthening the domestic and foreign markets of the seaweeds.

Outside of the seaweed industry, as explained by Secretary Dominguez, the Department of Agriculture will initially make available through its lead program some P1.32 million for projects in such areas as cassava production, goat raising, and fish and marine products processing.

The Department of Trade and Industry will also assist Tawi-Tawi in exploring opportunities in the pandan mats and shellcraft industry. P1.5M from the National Livelihood Support Fund will be made available through PBSP through NGOs and PVOs to finance micro enterprises in the province.

To provide additional livelihood opportunities, I would like to mention the Mag-aaral Saka-unlaran Project of the Department of Agrarian Reform and the Tawi-Tawi Agricultural College. With this project, we expect to see a good number of our local agricultural graduates become direct beneficiaries of three (3) hectare farmlots each which they will eventually own under the CARP. The selected agricultural graduates can transform the allocated 3 hectare farmlots into model demonstration farms and transfer new farming technologies to their communities.

To ensure continued development of the province, the Philippine Ports Authority has allocated P2.5M for the rehabilitation of the concrete pier of the Bongao Commercial Port and P10.0M for the improvement of the Sitangkai Port.

The initiatives I have announced today provide some opportunities, open some doors for the people of Tawi-Tawi. It will take the effort, enterprise, and the vigilance of the people to make government programs succeed.

We know that resources invested by government have not always reached the intended beneficiaries, or produced the desired benefits. You yourselves must be vigilant that the limited and precious resources government is able to mobilize are not stolen or squandered away. The people must become full partners of government in the pursuit of development and peace. I am confident that the people of Tawi-Tawi will measure up to this responsibility.

Now, I would like to introduce to you the members of the cabinet and other government officials who have accompanied me:

Secretary				Sonny				Dominguez
Secretary				Philip				Juico
Secretary				Joe				Concepcion
Cabinet		Secretary		Ping		de		Jesus
Presidential	Adviser	on	Rural	Development	Secretary	Edilberto	de	Jesus
Undersecretary	Ben	Diokno	of	the	Department	of	Budget	and

Toast of President Corazon Aquino in Honor of Prime Minister Noboru Takeshita

Toast
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
In Honor of Prime Minister Noboru Takeshita

[Held at Malacañang, May 6, 1989]

SPECIAL FRIEND BRINGS HOPE

The President is grateful for the critical role of His Excellency, Noboru Takeshita in shaping a new order in Asia. As the Philippines rose from economic and democratic devastation brought by the last regime, the clearest and most encouraging, answer came from Japan in the form of concrete measures of economic relief under His Excellency's tenure. For this, the country is deeply grateful.

It is a great pleasure for me to welcome Your Excellency and Mrs. Noboru Takeshita once again. We in the Philippines consider you to be a good and true friend – sympathetic to us in our present situation and most helpful in the search for solutions to our problems.

As heads of our respective Governments, we have met on two different occasions in the past, first at the ASEAN Summit Meeting in December 1987 in Manila and then during the state funeral of His Majesty Emperor Showa last February in Tokyo. During those meetings I was impressed by your warm sincerity as a neighbor and a staunch ally.

Your present visit in the region provides another proof of the importance and high regard you attach to the countries of ASEAN as Japan's partners in the search for political stability and economic progress in this part of the world. During your tenure as Prime Minister you have always paid sympathetic attention to ASEAN concerns and problems. For this we are extremely grateful.

Because of our long history as neighbors, the relations between the Philippines and Japan have always been close. We have shared the same ideals of democracy, peace and freedom as members of the Free World. We subscribe to the same political and economic principles in our search for prosperity and the well-being of our respective peoples. We bear true faith and allegiance to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Since I assumed office, the Japanese Government has shown strong support for my Administration in the urgent task of restoring democratic institutions, rehabilitating our economy and promoting economic growth. The generous assistance that Japan has extended during the past three years has been invaluable in enabling us to achieve the progress that we have so far made. During Your Excellency's tenure, the level and scope of Japanese assistance have steadily increased.

Your Excellency will be best remembered by the Filipino people for your enthusiastic response from the very start of the Multilateral Aid Initiative proposed in early 1988 to promote economic growth and strengthen democracy in the Philippines. We are highly appreciative of your unwavering support for the Philippines expressed on many occasions – during the G-7 Summit Meeting in Toronto in mid-1988, at your last conference with President Reagan in Washington in January of this year, at your first meeting with President Bush last February, and at our meeting in Tokyo.

To highlight your support, Japan has kindly offered to host an enlarged Consultative Group meeting on MAI and the Philippine Assistance Program in Tokyo. During your meetings with President Reagan and more recently with President Bush, the necessity of launching PAP this year was stressed. The meeting in Tokyo will serve as the forum for this project which is of paramount importance to the Filipino people.

I will not deal with the details of PAP tonight. Suffice it for me to say that it offers a unique opportunity for the Philippines to unshackle itself from the bonds of poverty and join the long march towards progress and development. PAP will trigger a social and economic process that should enable us to share in the rich promise of a coming Age of the Pacific, as we stand on the threshold of the 21st century. And it is, therefore, the fondest hope of our people that this Program be launched at the soonest possible time.

We are thus deeply pleased and honored to welcome Your Excellency, Prime Minister Noboru Takeshita. For you have led in the shaping of a new order in Asia and of a new role for Japan in the world.

And closer to home, you have with singular attention focused on the cause of Philippine recovery and progress in the great councils of economic powers. As we looked for a sympathetic response to the necessity for economic relief to assure the survival of Philippine democracy, we found the clearest and most encouraging answer from Japan.

Through personal efforts and supportive policies, Your Excellency has applied Japan's enormous influence to initiate the significant and concrete measures of economic relief for the Philippines. Your action showed a rare perception of the linkage between the material well-being of peoples and the harmony of nations, the prospect of enduring peace and continued progress throughout the world.

May I now express our deepest appreciation to Prime Minister Noboru Takeshita, whom history will mark as the first of the leaders of the new Japan, and whom we shall gratefully remember for all time as a special friend of our country.

Ladies and Gentlemen, may I ask you to join me in a toast to the continued good health, long life and happiness of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan. Mabuhay!

of

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
At the First Asian Conference on Street Children

[Delivered at the Heroes Hall, Malacañang, May 8, 1989]

NEW HOPE FOR STREET CHILDREN

The President thanks the organizers of this conference for holding this first conference in the Philippines and for raising public awareness on the plight of children who work and live on the streets. She announces the creation of the Fund for Street Children to be used solely for the welfare of the street children.

I am glad to be with you today for this first Regional Conference on Street Children in Asia. Both as President, and as a mother, I share your view that there is an urgent need to help the most underprivileged of children in the world – the street children.

I would like to thank the organizers of this conference – UNICEF, CHILDHOPE, the National Council of Social Development Foundation of the Philippines, Inc., and all other organizations of participating Asian countries, for the decision to hold this first conference in the Philippines. This must be in recognition of our country's having pioneered in a nation-wide program in 16 cities to respond to the needs of street children.

As I welcome all foreign participants of this conference to the Philippines, so do I give the assurance that we stand ready to share with them the country's experience and frustrations in implementing the various programs to help the street children of the Philippines.

I laud CHILDHOPE and its collaborating agencies for raising public awareness internationally on the plight of children who work and live on the streets. Also, for providing an international network of technical and material linkages for projects on street children.

It cannot be denied that the world's future is in our children. Indeed, "The Child is Father to the Man." So, what kind of world will the future hold if the child of today who will become the man of tomorrow, is an abused, uncared for child?

No single age group requires more of our attention than the children's group. And there is no single children's group that now deserves our collective concern more than these children under 15 years of age who are threatened by exploitation, abuse, neglect and abandonment – the street children.

The term "street children" may be newly-coined, but the problem itself is as old as poverty, and as menacing as death itself. The street children of today are the same children that Dickens and Dostoyevsky wrote about centuries ago. Our street children are the Oliver Twists of the Twentieth Century.

They are an offshoot of burgeoning cities that breed growing slums, the ultimate product of an upsurge of rural-to-urban migration that has sent millions of families to the metropolis in search of hope and a share of the city's prosperity. Nowhere is this phenomenon more bitterly felt than in Third World countries which many of us in this hall represent.

A recent study on Philippine street children shows this profile. More than 85% of them have parents of low education levels who are jobless, or self-employed as laborers, street vendors and scavengers. They usually come from large families. Many are from broken homes, where either or both parents live with other men or women. This heartbreaking portrait shows a breakdown in the moral fiber of their origins – their homes – such that they finally choose to separate from the harsh realities in their dwellings only to find harsher realities in the streets.

Most abandoned children earn a living vending cigarettes, flowers or candies, while many survive by scavenging, begging, and indulging in criminal activities as prostitution or pickpocketing. In their early age, they learn that survival is the ultimate name of the game. Thus, they grow up battered physically and psychologically, hardened by their constant brushes with rejection and exploitation. Theirs is the grim picture of a future of unceasing ignorance, poverty and hopelessness.

Having recognized this growing problem in the Philippines many years ago, our Department of Social Welfare and Development started a pilot project in 1983 to identify and assist street children in major cities throughout the country. Since then, the concern for street children has been shared by other Departments of our government such as the Department of Education, Culture and Sports, the Department of Justice, the military, particularly our National Police and the Philippine Constabulary and our Department of Tourism. From several non-government agencies such as civic and the religious groups, sprang the National Council of Social Development Foundation of the Philippines, and umbrella organization of government agencies and NGOs and a member of CHILDHOPE.

Our government's commitment to the goals of child survival and development is but in response to our state policy enunciated in the Constitution that "The State recognizes the vital role of the youth in nation-building and shall promote and protect their physical, moral, spiritual, intellectual and social well-being." Implementing this mandate are our Family Code, the Child and Youth Welfare Code and several other statutes and administrative rules and regulations.

In keeping with the government's commitment to improve the lot of our street children, I would like to announce the creation of the Fund for Street Children under the President's Social Fund. We are allocating P20 million for this fund, to be managed by the Presidential Management Staff. The fund shall be used solely for the purpose of expanding the capabilities of existing programs of member organizations of the Council for the Welfare of Children, the National Council of Social Development and other independent NGOs.

Street children are a perennial presence in growing cities. Experts say that if the trend of rural-to-urban migration continues, by the year 2000, more children will be growing up in urban areas than in rural villages.

Now we are the first to recognize that the program we have launched for our street children is mainly for rehabilitation; for cure rather than prevention. But if we must totally eradicate this blight in our national lives, we must address our efforts to the roots of the problem – the structures of poverty dependency and underdevelopment. This is particularly true for us in Asia. Unless we can stamp out these causes, we shall only live along the fringes of development, continuously suffering from the vicious cycle of poverty that breeds ignorance and injustice.

I know you share my vision for a better tomorrow for this country and for the world. That is why you are here today. So let us all join hands in moving the rest of the world into acknowledging the problems of the street children, and finally doing something about it – all in the spirit of the Lord and Master when He enjoined one and all to "Suffer the little children and forbid them not to come unto me for of such is the Kingdom of God."

I wish you all a fruitful conference and a good day.

Welcome Message of President Corazon Aquino to the Keidanren Mission

Welcome Message
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
To the Keidanren Mission

[Released on May 18, 1989]

A MUTUALLY ADVANTAGEOUS PARTNERSHIP

The President welcomes the Keidanren Mission whom she expects to see enough of the country to form a sound judgment in committing Japanese industry to participate in the new development and progress of the Philippines. She enjoins the technological and financial power of Japan in developing riches of our country and bringing a measure of prosperity to the Filipino people.

May I extend to the Keidanren Mission a warm welcome and may I express our deep appreciation for the effort they have made to see our country for themselves. The schedule of the Mission is rather tight, yet I hope they will see enough to form a sound judgment committing Japanese industry to a larger participation in the development and progress of the Philippines.

The Keidanren Mission comes to us with impressive credentials going by its distinguished membership alone. Yet it comes as well with the highest endorsement of the Government of Japan.

We reviewed with your Prime Minister the status of our countries' economic partnership, and the tremendous potential for mutual advantage that yet remains to be tapped. We hope at this meeting to impress upon this Mission the same sense of promise with which your Prime Minister came away from our meeting.

We have made tremendous progress in this country. I will say with the same confidence that we have made tremendous progress in absolute terms. We have achieved this progress hand-in-hand with the restoration of democratic institutions and guarantees, and without derogating in the smallest particular from our international obligations. Indeed, we have bought our recovery and progress only with our own determination, dedication, and industry, and with the assistance extended to us by such friends as Japan.

We hope that this assistance will be increased, for there is a great deal more to do before our economy is fully recovered and set on a steady course of progress. But we hope even more that this assistance will take the form of mutually advantageous investments made by Japanese business in the future of the Philippines. For our faith in private enterprise is boundless. And in none more so than in Japanese private enterprise which has raised Japan to unparalleled economic power.

We should like you to join us in focusing some of the technological and financial power of Japan on developing the riches of our country and bringing a measure of your prosperity to the Filipino people. We extend this invitation towards a greater partnership in terms that will be mutually advantageous.

Many of your colleagues have preceded you. Japanese industry and trade have long been significant factors in Philippine economic growth. Our country is not new and unknown to our Japanese friends. The only thing new is a government committed to make the greater partnership we offer work better than it has in the past.

As Japan rises to still greater heights of technology and economic progress, it behooves her to spread the foundation of her progress to the rest of Asia – particularly to nations critical to the security of key sources of energy and raw materials such as the Philippines. More importantly, the spread of material prosperity to new countries like the Philippines – the opening of new markets, the spread and enhancement of purchasing power to newly developed nations – can only redound to the even greater prosperity of Japan.

This part of the world is coming closer in a tighter weave, and our fortunes are more and more tied to each other. I ask you to accept the offer of greater partnership that we hereby extend for the development of the Philippines, to the mutual advantage of our two peoples. Welcome and may your Mission be a great success.

Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 72nd anniversary of the Department of Agriculture Speech
of

Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines

On the 72nd anniversary of the Department of Agriculture

[Delivered on May 26, 1989]

BACKBONE OF THE NATION

On the 72nd Anniversary of the Department of Agriculture, the President honors and congratulates our farmers and fishermen who form the backbone of our nation. Her dream is to see the farmer and the fisherman standing proud and secure in the thought that the government as their partner is continually creating an environment conducive to agricultural growth.

First, I would like to greet all the Filipino farmers and fishermen today. Mabuhay kayong lahat, mga kababayan kong magsasaka at mangangisda!

As we celebrate the Department of Agriculture's 72nd Anniversary, we honor once again our farmers and fishermen who form the backbone of our nation. This is the least that a grateful people can do for the agriculture sector, which comprises 70% of the population and employs half of our labor force. For our farmers and fishermen not only feed the nation, they contribute approximately one-third of our Gross National Product and nearly one-third of our export earnings. Who is to dispute that indeed, they are the salt of the earth?

I am also happy to welcome our Asean neighbors who have come to celebrate with us the first ever Asean Farmers Week. Their presence adds significance to this year's celebration. They likewise prove again that the commitment towards Asean cooperation forged here during the 3rd Asean Summit remains just as strong.

We in this region have been blest with long coastlines and peninsulas crisscrossed by bodies of water. It follows, therefore, that fishing, long before other industries were developed, was the mainstay of the very early inhabitants of our countries, our forefathers.

Having been so lavishly endowed by Nature, it is but our duty to cherish our waters and its marine life. Unfortunately, modern technology has brought about despoliation of our natural resources. Industrial toxic wastes pollute the waters, thus poisoning all forms of life that abound therein.

If only to preserve mankind, all of us are called upon to make common cause with fishermen and farmers to arrest the wanton destruction of what is both our staple food and principal means of livelihood.

Today, as we celebrate, we give due recognition to this year's outstanding agricultural workers and organizations for what they were able to achieve, thus providing models that the rest can well emulate. I, therefore, congratulate all our awardees for surpassing themselves. While I urge you winners and all past awardees to make striving for excellence a habit, I also ask you to share your techniques with your neighbors, in true Asean spirit.

This year's theme – "Higit sa Isang Butil ang Hangad at Handog ng Magsasaka" – is an apt choice. For despite the tremendous contribution of the farmer and the fisherman to the nation's economy, they have received so little in return. As an agricultural nation like most of Asean, the Philippines is expected to give its farmers and fishermen a better deal than what they have now. Benefits for them have been long overdue.

This government has, therefore, taken steps to improve the conditions of those who toil in the farms that there may be adequate food on their tables. We are pump-priming rural economy through support programs to enable our farmers to lessen production cost and correspondingly increase their profits. These programs are what we can now share with our Asean friends.

In November 1987, the Department of Agriculture launched the Rice Productivity and Enhancement Program (RPEP) that provided farmers with subsidized fertilizer through a “buy-two, take-two” scheme. The program covered 624,000 hectares in 70 provinces, and by April 1988 had distributed fertilizers to more than 400,000 farmer – beneficiaries, increasing harvest by 8.78% cavans per hectare.

Encouraged by last year’s success, we will soon implement an expanded version of RPEP, involving not only fertilizer subsidies, but also funds for other production and marketing needs.

And then, we take pride in being the first country to adopt Integrated Pest Management (IPM) as a national crop protection policy. That was in 1986. Since then, IPM has significantly increased farmers’ profits, reduced health hazards and decreased pest outbreaks.

To encourage lending to our credit-starved farmers, we have launched the Livelihood Enhancement for Agricultural Development (LEAD) program last year.

Under LEAD’s bank-assisted program, loans provided by banks to farmers’ groups are backed by government guarantee mechanisms which assume up to 85 percent of the risks involved.

Our programs have delivered results even in the short haul. Our agricultural exports earned a total of US$1.7 billion in 1988, indicating a growth of 13% over the previous years’ exports. Worthy of particular mention is the phenomenal growth of the local prawn industry from an inconsequential rank to the 3rd ranking export as of last year, bringing in around US$250 million. On the local front, average farmgate prices of principal agricultural commodities have risen steadily since 1986, gaining for our farmers additional gross revenues of P8.86 billion. Hence, I also congratulate the officials and all employees of the Department of Agriculture for giving importance to what our farmers and fishermen have been doing to help increase productivity.

This government, as you can see, is committed to give the millions of farmers and fishermen in the countryside their just share in the process and benefits of development. I am confident that with closer coordination between government agencies and the people’s full cooperation and support, agricultural development will proceed despite difficulties.

We, members of Asean, all aspire to be among the newly industrialized countries in the 20th century. Three years ago, I made a commitment to place agriculture and the farmer at the center of the nation’s recovery program. There is no contradiction in these two statements. For, as the Philippines slowly veers towards industrialization, it continues to anchor itself on agricultural production.

For such is my vision of the farmer and the fisherman – standing proud and secure in the thought that the government as their partner is continually creating an environment conducive to agricultural growth. This is how we can give to the millions of farmers and fishermen in the countryside their just share in the benefits of development.

Here is where I find parallels between the Philippines and the other Asean countries. Being similarly-situated and having almost similar economic levels, with few exceptions, our countries have similar agricultural-related problems. It is to our common benefit that we share our experiences and adaptive technologies with each other.

For Asean is friendship. Asean is sharing. And as we share our strengths as well as our woes, we can develop together in a manner that none of us could achieve singly.

Finally, I congratulate again all the awardees for agriculture. And to the Department of Agriculture as well as the organizers of the Agri-Aqua Fair, my felicitations for work well done.

Magandang araw sa inyong lahat.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino before the Integrated Bar of the Philippines

Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines Before the Integrated Bar of the Philippines

[Delivered at the PICC Meeting Room, June 3, 1989]

VIGILANCE AND CORRUPTION

AGAINST

GRAFT

The President calls on private organizations such as the IBP to help in assuring the most efficient use of the country's resources and to call our attention not only to outright graft but also to bureaucratic mismanagement and delay. She looks to the lawyers as the strongest arm in the fight for honesty and adds that their first obligation is to do justice to their country and to give their client the best defense under the law, not outside the law.

I welcome this opportunity to address the members of the Integrated Bar of the Philippines and its distinguished guests. The three branches of government are well represented here by some of their top officials. We have as well the heads of the IBP's 78 chapters throughout the country. The country's legal lights shine nowhere more brightly than here.

But for a call of the heart that I could not deny, I would include myself among you. I was a pretty good law student when I got married. As it is, I stand with Magsaysay outside the tradition of lawyer-presidents. Only history will tell whether the country was better for having lawyers for presidents.

The legal minds of our country are here gathered in answer to the call that has been sounded by a nation conscious of the weakness it inherited from the past, and eager to go forward:

The bickering must stop, the waste must end, and the graft that yet remains must be uncovered and punished. Our limited time and resources must be more strictly conserved for the task that yet remains: The long-delayed fulfillment of our people's age-old dream of freedom, justice, and progress.

Even as you enter into yet another political exercise, this time for your own sector, we are heartened by the simultaneous assertion that this will not be just another political exercise, but an occasion for high moral commitment: The commitment to take a stronger hold on the elusive goal of honesty, in the public service and throughout our society.

That corruption exists in the public and private sectors is admitted by the decision of the Integrated Bar to establish anti-graft bodies in each of its chapters.

Corruption must be stopped not only where it ultimately cashes in — at the disbursement offices of the government — but before it gets started: in board rooms, in law offices, and in the backrooms of government departments and agencies.

The Judiciary has made several initiatives to speed up the administration of justice on the theory that justice delayed is not only justice denied but a clear invitation to corruption.

The Judiciary is trying to re-instill in lawyers on the bench and across the bar a compelling sense of the high mission with which they have been trusted: the delivery of the highest service of the State — justice to one and all. There is a note of urgency in this effort, for at no time is society more in danger than when people finally despair of getting justice.

The new order in our country came to power on the crest of moral outrage over some of the worst examples of official corruption and private greed in the history of mankind. No small part of that corruption was prepared by lawyers and validated by judges from the legalization of dictatorship to the systematic plunder of the national patrimony. As one constitutional expert observed, while dictatorship was set up by one man, it was legally constituted by a majority of the Supreme Court in 1973 over the vigorous and admirable dissent of a valiant few.

Worse than usurpation and graft, is the legalization of crimes by the artifices of a corrupt justice system. It is lawyers in the end who make this possible. The fruits of official crime cannot be enjoyed until they are “legalized” and I put that in quotation marks — with the help, among others, of lawyers.

The commitment herein made by the Integrated Bar evinces a determination of the Philippine legal profession to prevent yet another travesty of its noble mission, and to lend its considerable expertise to the prevention, detection, and the punishment of graft and corruption.

In that mission, the help of the common citizenry is indispensable. Temptation is everywhere, and weakness is in us all. It behooves us to exercise a wide and unrelenting vigilance. We need every pair of eyes, here and abroad, to alert us against the resurrection of the past. That is how the corruption of the previous regime was uncovered. It is the prying eyes of Filipinos at home and abroad that will expose the houses of corrupt officials in California, New York, and New Jersey.

We are encouraged by the linkage that the IBP has established with various private sector initiatives for transparency in all transactions, in government and in business.

We have to lick this problem, on which the credibility of our national effort of recovery and progress depends.

In this regard, I repeat my warning: Nobody is above the law.

In fairness, we should not condemn officials before the evidence is in; yet for the common safety, we cannot delay the investigation and punishment of official crimes.

Even in the face of public criticism, we shall always be fair to officials who are recklessly accused of crimes, yet we shall never relent in our resolve to maintain the highest integrity and competence of government.

I call on the private sector, on organizations such as the IBP, to help us in assuring the most efficient use of our resources. We ask you to call our attention not only to outright graft but also to bureaucratic mismanagement and delay.

But laudable as these initiatives are of people-powered vigilance against graft and corruption, the real battle must be fought within each of us. No one in government will receive bribes, if no one in the private sector will give them.

I look to you, the men and women of the law, to be among the first to win this battle in your hearts. Over and above being counsel and defender of your clients, you are officers of the court, charged equally with judge and prosecutor to pursue justice for all. Your duty is to give your clients the best defense under the law, not outside the law. As lawyers, your first obligation is to do justice to your country.

Our country looks to you therefore as its strongest arm in the fight for honesty. We are confident that you will come through for us, for the Filipino people.

On that note of confidence, I wish you a successful convention. Good day and thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the 88th anniversary of the Supreme Court

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the 88th anniversary of the Supreme Court

[Delivered on June 9, 1989]

IMPROVING THE JUDICIAL PROCESS

As men and women of the highest integrity, intelligence and wisdom and with a new Code of Judicial Conduct, the President believes that proper deportment of judges in the disposition of justice may reflect more honor on the Bench and generate a greater respect for the law throughout our society.

According to a constitutional law expert, the President – equally with the Court – may interpret the Constitution in her own lights as part of her duty to uphold and defend it. The Court owes her interpretation the deference due to a co-equal and preeminent political body. Naturally I am extremely pleased with this reasoning, but I am not kidding myself. The last word in the Constitution and the laws is still the Court's.

The theory is that all three branches are equal. The reality is that one is more equal than the others when it comes to the Constitution. Therefore, from an equal to one who is more, may I as President extend to the Supreme Court my best wishes and our country's congratulations on its 88th anniversary.

It is not meet for me to lecture the Court and the vast judicial system on duties it knows far better than I. Yet it behooves me at this juncture to express to you the growing concern of our people over the deterioration of the image, not to say the substance, of Philippine justice.

The greatest peril we face is not in the economy nor from any external threat, but in the disenchantment of a people with their own society when that society denies them justice.

We are troubled to hear it said in this country justice cannot be had, unless it is bought. That, as usual, is an exaggeration. Yet it proves the case that the just and honorable work done by the vast majority of our judges is easily undone by the handful of exceptions to the general integrity and competence of the courts. Yet this false but spreading view of a corrupt justice system, may spell the end of the democratic faith that was born with our freedom three years ago.

I would not raise this problem publicly for it reflects sadly on us all. Yet, standing before men and women of the highest integrity, intelligence, and wisdom in our country, I must raise it. For I believe that you, if anyone, can do the most about it.

The value of assets immobilized in litigation is already beyond estimation. The insecurity of property rights because of judicial delay has had a far more chilling effect on further investments in our economy than the insurgency. We are distressed to hear people say that if they cannot get justice from the government, they will take it into their own hands.

The spread of common crimes undermines our sense of security at home and in the streets. The failure to punish corporate crimes undermines our faith in economic opportunities and in the general fairness of our society and government.

The structural weakness of our economy, the legacy of debt, the corrupt values that linger from the past regime, all these continue to take a terrible toll on our country. Yet the heaviest toll is exacted by one simple act repeated again and again throughout our society: a man is denied justice, not in the streets, but in the courts.

We—the Court and the Executive—share the primary responsibility of doing justice to the people. Equally, I might add. The new Constitution gives the Judiciary the fiscal and administrative independence to pursue its mandate free from any influence, other than that which the judges invite. The Court has used this independence and discretion most widely towards the solution of the problems of our justice system.

The problem of delay has been seriously tackled by the Court. The judges have been put on notice to dispose of cases within defined periods. The judges, I understand, would like to serve the same notice on the Supreme Court.

A new Code of Judicial Conduct has set forth in unmistakable terms the proper deportment of judges in the dispensation of justice, so that their work may reflect more honor on the Bench and generate a greater respect for the law throughout our society.

We hope that the Executive has done its part to help. We have tried to speed up budgetary allocations for court house construction and for the relocation of the high Court to premises commensurate with its high dignity and vastly expanded responsibilities. The help comes late, but better than never. For too long, the temples of Philippine justice—our courthouses—have reflected the shameful neglect that justice has suffered in our country. We hope that the new allocations and constructions will reflect the first priority we have put on justice.

Infrastructure is basic. We must show towards the work of justice the respect it deserves. Yet a more difficult job remains: improving the judicial process and the men who run it so that justice may come through more easily.

This is largely the work and responsibility of the Honorable Court. The best that I can offer would be, not suggestions, but rather this commitment: I stand foursquare behind your efforts and will do all I can as Chief Executive to make them succeed. Give the word and it shall be done, if it lies in my power. The fate of the nation hangs on your success. That is the sum of what I have tried to say in these remarks.

Congratulations and thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino upon signing of Wage Bill

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Upon signing of Wage Bill

[Delivered on June 9, 1989]

NEW LAW FOR WORKERS

With the signing of the Wage Rationalization Act, the President believes that the wage increase under this law will be sufficient to cushion the impact of price increases. She adds that management and Government should work together to maintain industrial peace essential for the improvement of productivity and investor confidence.

We have just signed into law Republic Act No. 6727 known as the Wage Rationalization Act. In signing this, the following points must be stressed:

First, we believe that even with the expected increase in power rates and prices of petroleum products and other selected goods and services, the P25 – P20 – P15 wage increases provided for under this law will be sufficient to cushion the impact of said price increases.

Second, labor, management and Government should now work together to soften the inflationary impact of the wage increase on our people, particularly on the unemployed. Productivity at the enterprise level should now be improved in order that the added labor cost brought about by this wage increase need not be passed on to the consumers. I have instructed the Department of Labor and Employment to give priority to the establishment of productivity improvement schemes, to be undertaken with the active participation of employers and organized labor. At the same time, I consider it essential to the improvement of productivity and investor confidence that industrial peace at the workplace be maintained.

Third, labor and management should strive to improve and strengthen further the collective bargaining process so that in the future, wage-fixing and the determination of other terms and conditions of employment shall be in their hands.

And finally, with the creation of the Regional Tripartite Wages and Productivity Boards, the authority to fix wages is now devolved to such bodies, and henceforth, there shall be no need for Congress to intervene in wage fixing. We concur with the policy stated in this law that such Boards are in the best position to determine the appropriate wage rates, taking into account regional socio-economic differences and industry peculiarities.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT PORTAL – EDITED AT THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE PHILIPPINES UNDER COMMONWEALTH ACT NO. 638

Speech of President Corazon Aquino upon signing of Private Education Assistance Bill

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
Upon signing of Private Education Assistance Bill

[Delivered on June 10, 1989]

A WORTHWHILE INVESTMENT

Education has always been the top priority of this government. This is the reason why the government is providing substantial assistance to private education. The President is positive that the Department of Education, Culture and Sports will work towards the smooth and speedy implementation of this law.

It is with a very special sense of pride and satisfaction that we sign into law this bill providing government assistance to students and teachers in private education, since we are aware that this represents in many different ways, truly landmark legislation.

It is in the first place a bold step forward into government providing substantial assistance to private education. This bill makes real in a very decisive manner the constitutional mandate for the integration of the public and private school systems, and recognizes what we have all known and taken for granted: that private schools serve as partners of government in delivering to our citizenry the public service of education.

This bill also represents perhaps the widest coverage of direct individual assistance to our citizens. When school opens this Tuesday, more than 1.7 million out of our country's 2.5 million private high school and college students will get some form of individual assistance from government, in tuition supplements, textbooks subsidies, scholarships, and allowances. The impact of such concrete help to millions of families in an area as important to them as education will be felt throughout the whole country for a long time to come.

Finally, we are proud of this landmark piece of legislation, not just because of the product, but also because of the process. We know that the final shape of this bill was forged at the anvil of public scrutiny, with constant inputs in public hearings, media, and other venues from students, parents, faculty, administrators, and other concerned publics. We know it was forged in an atmosphere of sustained collaborative consultation, not just between both houses of Congress, not just among the different executive departments, but also between the legislative and executive branches as well, with technical groups working collaboratively and jointly to see that deliberations in different fora were proceeding within a common framework and objectives.

As we sign this bill into law today, we are aware that while it represents a meaningful first step to assist private education, much remains to be done. It is therefore not a panacea that will solve all problems, and not all will be happy. Schools will want larger increases, teachers will want greater protection, students will want wider coverage of tuition subsidies. But this represents the best and most realistic response to the present situation, and it now remains for the Department of Education to work towards the smooth and speedy implementation of this law, and for the beneficiaries to cooperate with this implementation positively and wholeheartedly.

Education has always been the top priority of this government. In the first budget approved by this administration, education was immediately restored to its primacy as the sector with the largest budget. The following year, legislation was enacted making public high school education free of tuition for its two million students, for the first time in Philippine history. This year, we are now assisting 1.7 million private high school students with close to one billion pesos. Unlike most other forms of government expenditures, the commitment of resources to the education sector does not produce instant results. But we are confident that when this commitment eventually bears fruit in the better educated generations to come, it will be vindicated as ultimately the wisest use of our resources.

Vin D'Honneur Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Philippine Independence Day

Vin D'Honneur Speech of Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino President of the Philippines On Philippine Independence Day

[Delivered on June 12, 1989]

We celebrate the 91st anniversary of Philippine Independence in a different light than last year's. Then it seemed that peace was breaking out all over. That the divisions among the great powers had healed along the lines of a shared concern for the common survival in the nuclear age. And that warring states had seen the folly of wasting more in lives and treasure than they would ever acquire in victory.

The compassionate road to freedom first mapped out in this country three years ago seemed capable of limitless extension. The gentle flame of our example ignited similar freedom movements in other countries, where freedom made major strides. And if freedom has yet to reach its final goal in all the countries concerned, one could still say that the process was irreversible.

Irreversible because, freedom once tasted, cannot be forgotten. And because, at a certain point, a contagion of courage can never be contained.

It seemed last year that the world was becoming a common country, as governments reached avidly for peace and peoples marched resolutely towards freedom. In such a world, the measure of nationalist distrust that is indispensable to a nation's safety must yield to an unguarded optimism about the possibilities of international cooperation and sharing.

Recent events prove that the declared aspirations of statesmen, the declared policies of great powers, even the noble dreams of men of good will must yield before realities. The reality of powers, institutions, and forces long established by history. And of the inability of men to see except through the prism of their fears.

Recent events teach us that we must fall back upon true nationalism as the first strategy for the national safety and for international order. That we must indeed, as I said last year, burn with a forward ambition to be strong at home before we trust our national security and economic progress to forces abroad.

So last year I said, let us make a start in true nationalism. Let government and people join in winning a more meaningful independence – of states from external influence; of people from fear, poverty and injustice.

In so doing, we are not turning our backs on the goals of international security, stability, cooperation, and friendship but rather contributing more meaningfully to those goals.

There are only two superpowers and their desistance from destroying each other and the rest of the world along with themselves is sufficient to establish the peace. But for the multitude of small powers, our best contribution to international peace and security is the political stability of our societies and the material progress and well-being of our peoples.

The enduring pact of international concord and peace will not be written on paper by the leaders of great powers but in the hearts of men satisfied with the country that they, and no one else, has built in freedom and dignity.

By looking each to his own country's safety and to his own people's progress, we can all look forward with more assurance to a world of enduring peace.

Ladies and gentlemen, please join me in a toast:

To the progress of each of our countries so that together we can achieve peace in the world.

To my countrymen, I would like to propose a special toast. Let us toast those whose defiance in the face of certain defeat, and whose courage in the face of death must remind us of the degree of commitment necessary to achieve the goal we have set: a strong and truly independent Philippines. We had a measure of it once when we struggled to be free. We must have it yet again to be strong as a nation. Mabuhay!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Independence Day [Filipino]

Talumpati
ng
Kagalang-galang Corazon C. Aquino
Pangulo ng Pilipinas
Sa Araw ng Kalayaan

[Ipinahayag noong ika 12 ng Hunyo, 1989]

KARANGALAN AT KAPURIHAN

Sa pagdiriwang natin ng ika-91 anibersaryo ng ating kalayaan ay muling sinariwa ng Pangulo ang ating nakaraang pakikibaka sa EDSA upang muling maibalik ang ating demokrasya na matagal ding nawala dahil sa isang diktador. Ang pakiusap niya sa lahat ng Pilipinong nagmamahal sa kalayaan ay huwag sayangin ang ating ginugol upang maibalik ang demokrasya. Mag-sikap tayo at magkaisa patungo sa kaunlaran at kasaganaan.

Ngayong araw na ito ay ipinagdiriwang natin ang siyam-napu't-isang anibersaryo ng ating kalayaan. Siyamnapu't isang taon na ang nakalipas ngunit noong nakaraang tatlong taon lamang tayo napansin at pinagmasdang mabuti ng buong mundo. Sa pamamagitan ng telebisyon, nalaman ng lahat, na dito sa dako ng mundo, ay may isang lahi na marunong ipaglaban ang kalayaan sa pamamaraang mapayapa. Ang nagawa natin noong Pebrero 1986 ay hinangaan ng buong mundo at ibig tularan ng ibang mga bansa. Nakita ng mga dayuhan sa kanilang mga telebisyon ang "People Power" sa EDSA. Nakita nila ang mapayapang pag-aalsa ng mamamayang Pilipino. Nakita nila ang mga madre at pare na nagdarasal ng rosario. Nakita nila ang katakut-takot na tao, mga matanda at bata, mga babae at lalake, na sama-samang ipinaglalaban ang demokrasya. At pagkatapos ng apat na araw, nagulat sila nang makita nila ang pagtatagumpay ng "People Power". Napaalis ang diktador at ang inyong abang lingkod, na dinaya sa halalan ay naging pangulo sa pamamagitan ng "People Power".

Dahil sa nakita nila sa telebisyon, inakala ng mga dayuhan na napakadali ng ating rebolusyon. Akala ng iba ay naganap ang pagpapaalis ng diktador at pagbabalik ng demokrasya sa loob lang ng apat na araw. Ngunit kayo, mga minamahal kong mga kababayan at ako, alam natin ang tunay na kasaysayan ng pagbabalik ng ating kalayaan. Pahintulutan po ninyo na sariwain ko sa inyong isipan ang totoong pangyayari.

Noong nagdeklara si Marcos ng "Martial law" noong Setyembre 23, 1972, iniutos niya ang pag-aaresto at pagkukulong ng daan-daang tao. Ang unang mga nakulong ay ang aking asawa, si Ninoy Aquino, kasama sila Pepe Diokno, Chino Roces, Monching Mitra, Soc Rodrigo, Max Soliven, Jose Mari Velez, Nap Rama, Teodoro Locsin Sr., Joe Concepcion, Bren Guiao, Amando Doronila at marami pang iba.

At hindi lamang nawalan ng kalayaan ang marami nating kababayan- nawala rin ang tinatawag nating "freedom of the press". Ang pahayagan, ang radio at ang TV ay inilagay sa kamay ng diktador. Ang ating tinatanggap na balita noon ay censored ng diktador. Ang katotohanan ay ipinaglihim sa atin. Iyon lamang gusto ng diktador ang lumalabas sa pahayagan at nakikita sa telebisyon at naririnig sa radyo. Parami nang parami ang ikinulong noong panahon ng "Martial law". Talagang sinindak ng diktador ang mga tao. At dahil sa takot marami ang nagsawalang kibo na lang.

Salamat na lamang at may mga magigiting pa ring mga Pilipino. Sila ang unti-unting gumawa ng paraan upang gisingin ang kapwa nila. Nagising muli ang mamamayang Pilipino noong 1978 noong halalan para sa Interim Batasang Pambansa. Iyon din ang pagsilang ng Partidong LAB AN. Dalawampu't-isang kandidato ng LABAN ang humarap sa mga kandidato ng KBL dito sa Metro Manila.

Noong April 6, 1978 ginanap ang "Noise Barrage". Marahil natatandaan pa ninyo na parang bagong taon ang nangyari noong April 6. Halos lahat dito sa Metro Manila ay nag-ingay upang ipahiwatig nila sa bayan na panig sila kay Ninoy at sa mga kandidato ng LABAN. Ito ang unang pag-kakataon na nalaman ng mamamayang Pilipino na marami palang ayaw na kay Marcos at maraming ibig bumoto para sa mga kandidato ng LABAN.

Nagulat si Marcos at upang sugpuin itong nagising na pagpupunyagi ng mamamayang Pilipino, dinaya niya ang halalan at natalo ang lahat ng kandidato ng LABAN. Hindi pa nasiyahan si Marcos sa pagdaraya. Pinaaresto niya ang mga kandidato at opisyal ng LABAN at ikinulong. Kasama rito si Senador Lorenzo Tanada, Soc Rodrigo, Nene Pimentel, Tito Guingona at marami pang iba. Nung ikinulong itong mga lider na ito, medyo bumaba ang “morale” ng mga na sa oposisyon. Ngunit tuloy pa rin ang pagmimiting nila at pagpapalano kung papaanong maaakit ang kanilang mga nakararaming mga kababayan upang tumulong sa paglaban sa diktador.

Ilang taon pa ang dumaan. Noong ika-dalawampu’t isa ng Agosto 1983, bumalik si Ninoy sa Pilipinas mula sa Amerika. Bumalik siya upang makiusap kay Marcos na isauli ang demokrasya. Binaril siya sa paliparan. At ang pag-aalay ni Ninoy ng kaniyang buhay ang naging Simula ng pagbabago ng maraming Pilipino. Nawala ang kanilang takot. Dalawang milyon ang nakiramay at nakipaglibing. Ipinakita nila na nakikiisa sila kay Ninoy. Ipinakita nila na nakikiisa sila sa mamamayang Pilipino na ayaw ang diktador. Nag-umpisa na ang “rally” at mga demonstrasyon pagkatapos ng libing. Nagkaroon tayo ng halalan ng Batasan noong 1984. Lumaban ang oposisyon at sa tulong ng mga mamamayang Pilipino, halos tatlungpung porsyento ang nanalo sa mga kandidato ng oposisyon.

Sumunod ang “snap elections”. Maraming hrap at sakripisyo ang dinanas nating mga kababayan noong “snap elections”. Maraming nag-volunteer upang tumulong sa kampanya. Marami rin ang nagsanay kung papaano nilang maipagtatanggol ang mga “ballot boxes”. Marami rin ang sumali sa mga “rally” at nagpakita ng kanilang pakiki-isa sa mga lumalaban para sa demokrasya. Nakita natin kung anong pagdaraya ang ginawa ni Marcos at ang kanyang mga tauhan noong “snap elections”. Nakita rin natin ang katapangan ng ating mga kababayan na nagbantay sa mga ballot boxes. Hindi iilan sa mga tumulong sa ating kampanya ang nabaril at napatay. Isa na riyan si Evelio Javier ang dating gobernador ng Antique.

Noong iprinoklama ng batasan si Marcos raw ang nanalo sa halalan, hindi tayo pumayag. Dito mismo sa lugar na lito nagkaroon tayo ng “Tagumpay Ng Bayan Rally” na dinaluhan ng halos kalahating milyong tao. Sinimulan natin ang ating “boycott movement.” Sa halip na nawalan ng pag-asa, lalong lumakas ang paninindigan natin. Ipinagpatuloy natin ang paglaban upang ibalik ang ating demokrasya.

Kung kaya’t noong nangailangan ng “People Power” sa EDSA, maraming handa na manindigan, sapagkat marami nang mamamayang Pilipino ang matagal nang naghihintay at nagsu-sumikap upang ibalik ang ating demokrasya.

Katakut-takot na hrap, pawis, luha at dugo ang inialay natin upang ibalik ang ating kalayaan. Hindi iisang tao at hindi iilang Pilipino ang nagmalasakit upang malasap nating muli ang kalayaan. Huwag na huwag nating kakalimutan itong bagay na ito.

Kaya ngayon, ipinakikiusap ko sa lahat ng Pilipinong nagmamahal sa kalayaan — huwag nating sayangin ang ating ginugol upang maibalik ang demokrasya. Huwag nating lusta-yin ang mga natamo nating biyaya.

Ang mga makasarili, masakim at mapagmataas ay mata-tagpuan sa lahat ng dako. Kailangan ko po kayo, ang mga mamamayan, upang labanan ang mga ito. Kayo po ang aking inaasahan at mapapagkatiwalaan. Sama-sama nating sugpuin ang kasinungalingan sa pamamagitan ng katotohanan, karahasan sa pamamagitan ng pwersang legal, ang mga taong walang kakayahan sa pamamagitan ng kanilang pagtitiwalag, ang mga katiwalian sa pamamagitan ng paggamit ng buong bisa at lakas ng batas.

Ang katuparan ng kalayaan ay nasa atin . . . sa ating pag-sisikap at sa ating pagkakaisa.

Sa susunod na taon, nais ko pong tumayo muli dito at ipahayag na natapos na natin ang ating sinimulang gawain sa kapakanan ng kalayaan. Nais kong ipatalos sa ating mga kababayan lalong-lalo na sa mga naghihikahos na tayo ay masiglang patungo na sa kaunlaran at kasaganaan. Ang kahihayan ay nasa nakaraan. Tanging karangalan at kapurihan ang nalalabi – karangalan sa ating nagawa, karangalan sa ating sariling kakayahan, karangalan sa ating katapatan, at higit sa lahat, karangalan bilang Pilipino.

Mabuhay ang Pilipino.

ACCELERATED RURAL DEVELOPMENT THROUGH DECENTRALIZATION

The President commends several municipalities for the outstanding performance of their respective People's Economic Councils (PECs). Since the mayors are the leaders representing the countryside, the President urges them to develop the countryside and be accountable for the delivery of basic services and facilities in their areas. She stresses that the increase in their authority would require improved performance and greater accountability to their constituents.

When we met a little over a year ago, I proclaimed that your election had completed the structure of our democratic system. Then I said . . . "Now, let's get down to business." Today, I would like to commend those of you who really did so.

Last October, during the National Convention of the People's Economic Councils (PECs), I personally commended the municipalities of Alfonso (Cavite), Porac (Pampanga), Rodriguez (Rizal), Tarlac (Tarlac) and Tiboli (South Cotabato) for the outstanding performance of their respective PECs. Likewise, I would like to laud the municipalities of the National Capital Region for exhibiting an 80.69% over-all tax collection efficiency. You have done well indeed!

Today, we meet again to strengthen our resolve to achieve our common vision: develop our country by developing your areas – the countryside – where most of our people live.

The program that heralds this is clear: Accelerated Rural Development. If we are to reduce underemployment and unemployment and distribute our gains to the greatest number, we must push for social and economic development in all our towns. The rural masses should not wait any longer for the gains of urban development to trickle down to them. No, the process must be renewed and we must act swiftly and with firmer resolve than before.

Here is where each of you plays a crucial role in this priority program. You are in the forefront of government's fight to conquer poverty. For you are the leaders representing the countryside. You have been elected to provide your respective constituencies with better roads, adequate water supply and power, basic health and educational services and facilities, ample livelihood opportunities, and easy access to other basic services. You are, therefore, accountable for the delivery of these basic services and facilities.

I am aware that for so long, much has been asked of you but so little has been given in terms of authority and resources to enable you to carry out your programs. Let me make it clear to all of you this morning that I do not intend to ask you to help fight poverty and insurgency without giving you the wherewithal to achieve them. I am convinced that if this country is to move forward, to grow at a rate and pace consistent with the aspirations of our people, we have to decentralize much of that authority wielded by the national government. And your national government is taking steps to remedy the overly-centralized system we inherited from the past regime.

If you recall, the last time we met, I promised you that the national government shall strive to provide "a wide channel for two-way traffic in ideas and feedback between the people and the government." This past year, you saw a real grassroots presidency at work. I have directly consulted the local governments through my regional and provincial visits as well as during my regular meetings with the Regional Development Council Chairmen, Provincial Governors and City Mayors. Just recently, another link has been established between the national and local leaderships – the Presidential Action Line System (PALS). The PALS is designed to provide immediate and expeditious response to the requests and concerns of local government units which are sent to the Office of the President. Under this system, senior officials are designated as action officers to directly act on local requests in behalf of their respective departments. Thus, you can now be assured of faster reaction time from the national government with regard to your letters.

However, that singularly difficult task of greater devolution and deconcentration still eludes us. We must continuously move towards making every municipality a self-reliant community with the local Chief Executive empowered and provided with enough resources to truly manage on his own. To this end, I have filed and will be filing vital legislation which will bring about genuine decentralization.

A little over a month ago, I submitted to Congress a legislation which will increase your share in the Gross National Internal Revenue collections. Specifically, the bill provides that local governments will get 20% of the total Internal Revenue collections. On top of this, an additional 5% is set aside as incentive to local government units that can demonstrably increase their Real Estate Tax collection efficiency. The Internal Revenue Allotment (IRA) will be distributed and automatically released within the first 10 days of the month, as follows:

- 30% to provinces
- 25% to cities
- 35% to municipalities
- 10% to barangays

The municipalities will get the biggest share of the IRA. In fact, when your share is added up to that of the barangays, this adds up to a full 45% of the total Internal Revenue allotted to local government units.

The same Bill abolishes the mandatory contributions which eat up much of your limited funds and which you have always been asking to be rescinded. The proposed Bill abolishes the 18% contribution to the PC/INP and the 7% contribution to hospitals, and to the Mayors of Metro Manila, the tax accruing to the Metropolitan Manila Commission under PD No. 921.

The Special Education Fund Tax is converted into a purely local tax, the proceeds of which shall accrue entirely to local government units, and divided as follows:

- 50% for the local School Board
- 50% for the local General and/or Infrastructure Fund

What do all these mean in terms of additional revenues to you?

When the Bill is approved by Congress and implemented by January 1990, and I have high hopes that this Bill will be approved this year, you may expect an increase, as your share of the IRA, of at least 100% over what you have received this year. For some of the local government units, the increase could be as high as 200%.

In absolute terms, for 1989, the budget for IRA and LGRSF/STA is P5.42 billion. For 1990, the budget for IRA is P13 billion, an increase of P7.58 billion or 140%. The share of the municipalities is P4.55 billion while the barangays is P1.30 billion.

Adding that part of your budget which used to be released to the PC/INP and to hospitals, you will have substantive increases in your budget which will be at your disposal.

I would also like to inform you that all of the abovementioned provisions relative to the IRA of LGUs have also been incorporated in the CY 1990 Budget which I will soon transmit to Congress.

Therefore, we will soon have two mechanisms in which to achieve our mutual goal of providing greater national revenue shares to local units.

The revenues you need are provided for in this legislation as well as in others, like the legislation increasing your share of the fees imposed on the exploitation of natural resources. But increasing revenues is not enough. You also need the authority to effectively and efficiently carry out your programs, as you have cited in the resolutions you submitted to me this morning. In response to some of these resolutions, I will be endorsing the proposed Local Government Code as an administration measure. In this connection, I would like to acknowledge the contribution of Senator Aquilino Pimentel, whose Bill, S.B. 155, was the source of many provisions of the proposed Code.

Three of your Resolutions are already addressed in the proposed Local Government Code, namely:

- * The Omnibus Resolution containing specific requests for greater devolution of powers to local units;
- * Second, requesting for certification of a proposed Local Autonomy Act; and,
- * Third, regarding the Philippine Constabulary and the Integrated National Police.

I shall deal with the rest of the Resolutions later.

Meanwhile, let me cite to you other features of the proposed Code:

- * The National Police personnel assigned to your municipalities shall be under your operational supervision and direction;
- * You shall have appointing power over all local government personnel whose salaries or whose operating expenses are mainly paid from local funds, except for treasurers and assessors who will be appointed by the Department of Finance from a list of eligibles nominated by the Local Chief concerned;
- * You shall exercise administrative supervision over field personnel of the Executive Departments involved in the delivery of basic services. Moreover, within 18 months from the effectivity of the Code, said Executive Departments shall transfer the corresponding appropriations and funds (other than those from programs and projects) to the local government unit concerned;
- * You, as members of the local Prequalification Bids and Awards Committee, shall have an active part in the construction, operation and maintenance of projects which are funded locally and/or receive funding or financial counterpart assistance from the National Executive Department, subject to the specifications, cost standards, and performance audit as may be prescribed by said National Executive Department;
- * The Local Tax Code has been updated to allow local government units to have more discretion in deciding as to the subject of local taxes and the amount of such taxes. Specifically, the Local Tax Code has set only tax floors in order to allow your respective municipalities to decide the appropriate amount to impose for your own needs.

These last three address portions of your Omnibus Resolution for increased authority at the local level.

The other major provisions in the proposed Local Government Code will empower you – as political leaders and as Area Development Managers – to perform your duties smoothly. But, as your authority and resources increase, so does your accountability to your constituents. Hence, we have in the Code provisions on Initiative and Referendum on Legislative Matters and the recall of elective officials. Just as your authority is increased, so will I exact improved performance from each of you. I will not hear of the highest town official utilizing his powers to benefit a few favored men. And I will expect that this devolution of powers will be felt immediately and equally by all.

I have been told, that some, if not most, of local officials are not ready and prepared to assume greater responsibilities. But if we do not implement decentralization now, then when will we do it?

I am convinced that only through decentralization can we truly achieve peace and progress. The over-centralization of powers in the government during the past regime was prompted by the craving for power and the material greed of those in the central government then. My administration has wisely learned from the past, and now foresees a stronger and more effective management of government services that will truly reach the grassroots.

I will now respond to your other requests:

I shall refer your requests for the adoption of local government innovations, as well as the allocation of P40 million for the construction of a Mayors' Center, to the concerned Departments for serious study and consideration.

On your proposal for the removal of Congressional Privilege of Realigning Government Projects, let me clarify that this provision in the General Appropriations Act (GAA) does not in any way diminish the authority of the Executive Branch to plan and implement projects, both at the national and local levels. A provision in the GAA provides that any realignment should be made within 30 days.

Regarding the proposed amendments to existing laws on the implementation of Barangay Road Projects, this matter is still being studied by the Department of Public Works and Highways.

The standardization of mayors' salaries, as well as those of other local government executives, is already included in the proposed Standardization Bill now pending in Congress.

On your request for a 30% discount on plane fares and preferential accommodation treatment with discounted rates in Hotels, I must tell you that I cannot grant such a request. I have repeatedly assured our people that no one serving the people under my administration will be granted special favors or privileges that will set them apart from everybody else.

Finally, regarding your request for quarterly meetings with me, I think you all know that I am regularly meeting the Provincial Governors – once every quarter – and the City Mayors – once every four months. I am extending my invitation to the officers of your League to attend my meetings with the City Mayors. The next meeting is scheduled on Tuesday, June 27, 1989.

Allow me now to reiterate my determination to continue adopting measures to increase your powers. This commitment to decentralize is also an unequivocal expression of my confidence in your ability to be my partners in steering the country towards a better future. Our people have great expectations. And I share the expectations of our people. You will fulfill our hopes for a better life.

We have the policies and structures in place. Let me now end by saying . . . “Let’s get moving – and fast!”

Thank you and Good Morning.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on the Coalition for Transparency Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On the Coalition for Transparency

[Delivered on June 19, 1989]

WEEDING OUT CORRUPTION

The President reacts to the critics of this government. She cites the consequences of the past administration's thievery in the foreign debt, the poorly-planned and bankrupt industries and the corruption that was institutionalized in every local government, civilians and military. With the help of the Coalition and its proposals to combat corruption, together with a long and meaningful cooperation between those who share the same spirit of service to the nation, she hopes the country will be able to attain its goals.

I will go straight to the point.

Many of those who are gathered here represent the spirit that believed it had put hope into power in 1986. You are gathered again because disenchantment has started to set in. And you wonder if 1986 was worth it.

Whether it was worth it or not, whether our freedom with the uncertainty it has brought is better or worse than the certitude of slavery, I leave for you to answer. The answer to that question I will leave to you. No one can tell you to think anything but what your honest thoughts and feelings dictate. Yet I believe I owe it to you to personally answer some of my critics.

Being who they were under Marcos, it would insult the spirit of this assembly and the memory of the Philippine struggle for freedom, to answer them directly. But you, who care for this country, deserve to hear the answers.

You have heard it all: the incompetence and corruption of this government, the violation of human rights that were the core of its political commitments, the sorry state of the economy.

Where these critics get the face to criticize on these points is beyond me.

They ask why have we come only this far in our economic recovery? I will tell you why. Because it has taken this long to just get out of the black hole they dug in our pockets when they were in power.

When I came to power, we wrote off P130 billion in bad loans to those who held positions of power and conflicting interest under Marcos in just two financial institutions: PNB and DBP.

Let me give you a few examples:

CDCP alone, over P10 billion lost;

Cresta Monte companies, over P2 billion lost – and taken by those who wax so indignant over corruption today.

I directed the Tanodbayan to prosecute these cases and expressed the hope that the Sandiganbayan would give them first priority. It was imperative that Philippine creditworthiness be re-established by the timely prosecution of defaulters.

To date, not a single case has advanced beyond the preliminary stage. It is said that this too is the Executive's fault.

No, it is not. If I intervened in the judicial process, I would be accused of political vendetta. I have therefore left the law to take its course alone and the courts to face the judgement of the people. To that end, I have directed the PNB, the DBP, and other government financial institutions to release the complete and detailed list of all behest loans so that the people will understand the pernicious delay in the prosecution of those who plundered our country. The time-honored and constitutional protection of judicial independence is no excuse for inaction.

It is said that we must stop using Marcos as an excuse for the Aquino administration's shortcomings. No, we cannot. The truth has rights that political convenience and the opposition's desire for national amnesia cannot compromise. Justice, not amnesia, is not what we had in mind when we called for reconciliation.

Marcos and his cronies are not just symbols of the past, but the reality of the present.

We live and suffer the consequences of their thievery in the foreign debt which we are striving to pay without starving our children and choking our progress;

We live and suffer the consequences of their thievery in the poorly-planned and bankrupt industries that we can neither dispose of nor re-active without losing more money;

We live and suffer the consequences of the corruption that Marcos institutionalized in every level of government, civilian and military;

We live and suffer the legacy of our loudest critics.

Those who finished off the Philippine economy are the loudest in decrying the slowness of the recovery even they cannot deny because they are cashing in on it.

With strength borrowed from the money they stole, they have turned their weapons to reopen the wounds they inflicted on the body of our country when they were in power – poverty, insurgency, and debt.

Some will say that it is not who says it that is important, but what he says. No, it is important. Because the minute we allow the guilty to instruct the innocent on morals, all morality loses its force.

My critics have assailed the so-called corruption of my government, but these critics, not I, have the hidden wealth to conceal.

My critics call my government weak, but it is they and not I who spend their waking moments weaving plot after failed plot to overturn the government.

Yet, despite the fact that I have never imprisoned any political opponent nor ordered any ward leader to manufacture falsified election returns, there has been greater stability in the land than in the last five years of a dictatorship that stopped at nothing, not even murder, to impose it.

What is galling is not what these critics say, but that they dare to say it. That thieves should preach honesty. That the untruthful should counsel truth. That the ignorant should lecture on policy.

And that those who connived in the plunder of our country should prescribe the manner of its revival in their hands.

The future will not take instruction from yesterday's men. Nor shall we take the truth from those who made a good living from lying. The spring cannot rise higher, nor be cleaner than its source.

That said, unquestionably something has gone wrong. Corruption has returned, if not in the same scale certainly with equal shamelessness.

This cannot be. It is not our intention to appear honest and competent only in comparison to our enemies.

We must – and I will – wage a relentless effort to weed out the corruption that has resurfaced in our midst. The campaign must spare no one – neither friends who helped in the campaign nor the enemies who abetted the dictatorship; neither those who drop our names nor those who malign them. No one will be spared.

The war on graft and corruption must be matched by a war on slack and indecision in government, on those whose reckless conduct has called the honor of this government into question. No one is indispensable. I intend to address not only the people's dismay over corruption but their despair over inaction. Too much depends on the success of this venture. For what is at stake here is the people's continuing faith in democracy, in the force of moral values and law.

I am aware that the values we seek to bring about through democratic method and honest example cannot produce overnight results. Yet, let there be no mistake on the score: we shall not lose by inaction and default what we have painfully gained by the most deliberate and strenuous efforts:

What we have won, we shall keep. And on what we have accomplished, we shall build higher. Yet the manner of building cannot be like EDSA. Not in a flash, but by unerring steps shall we build the future.

I am heartened that this is also how the Coalition intends to proceed: To build a moral order stone by honest stone, by the living example of each and every person converted to its vision of morality in government, in the community, in the family, and in himself.

Breaking down the task to manageable portions is how I like to proceed. When I called for a boycott, I targetted only a softdrink to test whether the will and means to accomplish little was there, before I made commitments to do more.

In the same vein, the Coalition for Transparency looks first to the moral renewal of its individual members before calling for the reformation of society and government. Before a man can preach, he must ask himself has he paid his correct taxes. Before a man can inveigh against influence-peddling, he must consider if he does not have a pending favor with any public official. Before a man demands transparency, he must be certain that he too can stand without fear in the light.

As a first step, I target the customs and importation. We made significant progress in facilitating exports, but the bottleneck in importation remains and smuggling has become so rampant that the labor-intensive textile industry's very survival is in question.

First let me make it clear to quell all speculation. Customs Commissioner Mison is staying and has my full backing in any measures he cares to take, particularly those he has proposed to the Coalition, such as the non-stop processing in the release of shipments; and the organization of the Customs-Industry Consultative Council to bring in the private sector in the formulation of Customs policies and procedures.

I look forward to receiving specific proposals from the Coalition on the means to combat corruption. This meeting heralds, I hope, a long and meaningful cooperation between those who share the same spirit of service to the nation.

The path you and I shall take will not be easy. Friends will be lost and enemies will grow desperate. The reward for our efforts will not be praise but more villification from those who see no place in our tomorrow.

Our reward must come mainly from each other: in the confidence of our common sincerity, in the gradual attainment of our goals, and in the spirit of a shared enterprise for the common good such as we have not enjoyed since EDSA. Let the spirit of service return. The campaign against corruption will succeed only when society, moved to its moral core, will no longer have anything to do with it, and when wealth by itself can no longer buy our respect or a welcome in our homes. It is here, in this fundamental task, that you have the major role to play. With God's help we can only prevail.

Thank you.

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Navy Day

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Navy Day

[Delivered on June 23, 1989]

THE NAVY'S VIGILANCE

The first duty of an armed forces is the defense of its country's boundaries and the first line of national defense is in its surrounding waters. This is the duty of the Navy, to secure the nation from internal and external threats. The President pledges full support for the modernization of the navy, to build a strong force outfitted to discharge their mission.

The Armed Forces of the Philippines has had the longest fighting experience of any military force in the Region outside Vietnam. And it has fought against the most tenacious enemy since that famous conflict. By and large, the Armed Forces has carried out its mission well. While this is Navy Day, however, I cannot help but comment first upon a matter that touches us all — Commander-in-Chief and Armed Forces.

I refer to the sorry image of the profession of arms at this time. Soldiering has become identified not with the noblest calling of man, but with the most sordid activities of the criminal syndicates. I grieve for the Armed Forces, at the injustice it is suffering.

I grieve for the tens of thousands who gave their lives to preserve the territorial integrity of the Republic and to keep the communist foe from turning our free country into a slave state. The shameful actuations of a few have insulted the vast majority of our fighting men who are, even at this moment, turning fields of fire into fields of honor.

What a few have done to the proud institution of the Armed Forces is beyond sympathy and forgiveness. Punishment commensurate with the damage done to the honor of the Armed Forces must be dealt out. We must restore the shine to the sword of state and make it again a trusted weapon for the national defense and for the advancement of the nation's honor and destiny.

Our most potent weapon is not the rifle nor the artillery so much as the superior example of our forces over those of the enemies we fight. The scalawags in carnappings and holdups have left us weaponless in the most important battle of the rebellion — the battle for the hearts and minds, the trust and respect of our people.

I have directed the Secretary of Justice to apply the full force of the law so that the stain on the shield of the Republic will be wiped off by the severity of the justice that is done.

That said, I turn to the Philippine Navy and proudly salute it on its 91st anniversary.

The existence and pre-eminent role of a navy in a country such as ours is self-evident. The first duty of an armed force is the defense of its country's boundaries. It goes without saying that, for an archipelago, the first line of national defense must be drawn in its surrounding waters. That line is drawn and held by the Philippine Navy.

With the inadequate equipment at hand, the Philippine Navy has nonetheless discharged its mission well. The contingency most feared by our strategists has to date been prevented — massive arms landing that will give a quantum leap to the insurgency threat. For this we must thank the vigilance of the Navy.

We have this also to thank the Navy for. Its readiness to challenge any state that trenches upon our territories. That readiness has kept open our maritime options for economic development in such key areas as fishery, offshore oil, and submarine mining.

We need every resource at hand to meet the challenges to our country: the challenge of poverty, the challenge of development and progress for a fast growing population, and the challenge of our destiny to become what we once were: the freest, most progressive state in Asia.

Our fishery resources are being depleted and destroyed at an alarming rate by foreign fishing concerns. As a country equally comprising land and water, this is equivalent to the foreign seizure of our entire industrial capacity.

The Navy has done quite well with very little, and much of that little is obsolete. Yet great dangers threaten from overseas. It behooves us therefore to build a navy equal to those threats. We have therefore embarked upon the long overdue modernization of the navy. We need a navy that can move fast and with the power to impress upon intruders the substance of our commitment and oath:

To uphold the Constitution that defines the historic boundaries of our state;

To see to the faithful execution of the laws that preserve the national patrimony for Filipinos, maintain the order of society, and advance the economic welfare of our people;

And to proclaim to all and sundry the pride of our name and the reputation of our arms.

You and I share a commitment and a vision. Part of that vision of a strong country, impervious to threat, calls for a strong navy. I pledge to you my full support to build a navy outfitted to discharge the mission we have outlined in our oath.

Mabuhay ang Hukbong Dagat ng Pilipinas!

Mabuhay ang Filipino!

Speech of President Corazon Aquino on Air Force Day Founding Anniversary

Speech
of
Her Excellency Corazon C. Aquino
President of the Philippines
On Air Force Day Founding Anniversary

[Delivered on July 1, 1989]

OUTDO YOURSELF AIR FORCE

The Air Force plays a critical role both in war and in peace: as a major support to ground units battling against enemies of the state and as transporter of medicine, relief goods, and medical workers to disaster-stricken areas here and overseas. With a new fleet of jet aircraft and helicopters, and with a renewed sense of duty, the Air Force is expected to outdo itself.

Men and women of the Air Force, today is a landmark in your history. This is the first time we celebrate this day as your founding anniversary. I signed Proclamation No. 397 on April 3, 1989, changing your May 2nd anniversary date to July 1st in keeping with the nationalist spirit of our Armed Forces. On this day, in 1947, the Air Force attained the status of a distinct service command of the Armed Forces of the Philippines.

There is yet another reason to celebrate. Today we welcome 45 graduates of the Philippine Air Force Flying School into the PAF. Now you are one with the pride of our skies. You are to enter an unbroken tradition of heroism from the action taken by Captain Jesus Villamor and his men in 1941 in meeting the Japanese foe to the noble decision of Colonel Sotelo and his men in joining the struggle against the dictatorship. Rest assured, there will be no shortage of opportunities for heroism in the future.

We are engaged in a bitter struggle that will decide whether Filipinos shall live free or die, whether what our people have built by sacrifice these past three years shall be the spoils of our enemies' victories or the foundation of a future of freedom, justice, and progress for our children.

Let me impress upon you the critical nature of your role in the present war against the insurgency. The air support you provide to our ground forces have oftentimes spelled victory or defeat. The timely arrival of the Air Force has been known to turn a massacre of our boys into a rout of the enemy. The Air Force has logged 642 flying hours in 592 sorties in combat operations to support our ground units.

Men of the Air Force, I salute your accomplishments.

Yet the work of the Air Force is not confined to combat. First in war, first in peace, the Air Force has been in the forefront of relief missions not only in calamity-struck areas of our country but even in foreign lands. Last year alone, you flew 22,129 hours on disaster relief operations, transported 35,000 pounds of medicine to Bangladesh, and airlifted over 6,000 military and civilian patients to medical aid centers. You repatriated 97 Filipino workers from Singapore. You have shown that the Filipino need not wait upon war to declare himself totally for country.
